as we have already said, that the power possessed by the House of Commons was incompatible with the Constitution and could not be exerted by the House, it was yet explicitly decided that from the power to legislate given by the Constitution to Congress there was to be implied the right of Congress to preserve itself, that is, to deal by way of contempt with direct obstructions to its legislative duties. In Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra, which was also a case of false imprisonment for arrest under a warrant issued by order of the House in a contempt proceeding, although the want of right of the House of Representatives to exert the judicial-legislative power possessed by the House of Commons was expressly reiterated, the question was reserved as to the right to imply an authority in the House of Representatives to deal with contempt as to a [538] subject-matter within its jurisdiction, the particular case having been decided on the ground that the subject with which the contempt proceedings were considered was totally beyond the jurisdiction of the House to investigate. But in In re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661, 17 S. Ct. 677, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 1154, the principle of the existence of an implied legislative authority under certain conditions to deal with contempt was again considered and upheld. The case was this: Chapman had refused to testify in a Senate proceeding and was indicted under § 102 of the Revised Statutes [2 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 532] making such refusal criminal. He sued out a habeas corpus on the ground that the subject of the refusal was exclusively cognizable by the Senate and that therefore the statute was unconstitutional as a wrongful delegation by the Senate of its authority and because to subject him to prosecution under the statute might submit him to double jeopardy, that is, leave him after punishment under the statute to be dealt with by the Senate as for contempt. After demonstrating the want of merit in the argument as to delegation of authority, the proposition was held to be unsound and the contention as to double jeopardy was also adversely disposed of on the ground of the distinction between the implied right to punish for contempt and the authority to provide by statute for punishment for wrongful acts and to prosecute under the same for a failure to testify, the court saying that "the two being diverso intuitu and capable of standing together," they were susceptible of being separately exercised. And light is thrown upon the right to imply legislative power to deal directly by way of contempt without criminal prosecution with acts the prevention of which is necessary to preserve legislative authority, by the decision of the Privy Council in Kielley v. Carson, 4 Moo. P. C. (Eng.) 63, which was fully stated in Kilbourn v. Thompson; supra, but which we again state. The case was this: Kielley was adjudged by the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, [539] guilty of contempt for having reproached a member "in coarse and threatening language" for words spoken in debate in the House. A warrant was issued and Kielley was arrested. When brought before the House he refused to apologize indulged in further violent language toward the member and was committed. Having been discharged on habeas corpus proceedings, he brought an action for false imprisonment against the Speaker and other members of the House. As a justification the defendants pleaded that they had acted under the authority of the House. A demurrer to the plea was overruled and there was a judgment for the defendants. The appeal was twice heard by the Privy Council, the court on the second argument having been composed of the Lord Chancellor (Lyndhurst), Lords Brougham, Denman, Abinger, Cottenham and Campbell, the Vice Chancellor (Shadwell), the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (Tindal), Mr. Justice Erskine, Lushington and Baron Parke.

The opinion on reversal was written by Parke, B., who said:

"The main question raised by the pleadings, . . . was whether the House of Assembly had the power to arrest and bring before them, with a view to punishment, a person charged by one of its Members with having used insolent language to him out of the doors of the House, in reference to his conduct as a Member of the Assembly—in other words, whether the House had the power, such as is possessed by both Houses of Parliament in England, to adjudicate upon a complaint of contempt or breach of privilege."

After pointing out that the power was not expressly granted to the local legislature by the Crown, it was said the question was "whether by law, the power of committing for a contempt, not in the presence of the Assembly, is incident to every local Legislature."

"The Statute Law on this subject being silent, the [540] Common Law is to govern it; and what is the Common Law, depends upon principle and precedent.

"Their Lordships see no reason to think, that in the principle of the Common Law, any other powers are given them, than such as are necessary to the existence of such a body, and the proper exercise of the functions which it is intended to execute. These powers are granted by the very act of its establishment, an act which on both sides, it is admitted, it was competent for the Crown to perform. This is the principle which governs all legal incidents." And after quoting the aphorism of the Roman law to the effect that the conferring of a given power carried with it by implication the right to do those things which were necessary to the carrying out of the power given, the opinion proceeded: "In conformity to this principle we feel no doubt that such an Assembly has the right of protecting itself from all impediments to the due course of its proceeding. To the full extent of every measure which it may be really necessary to adopt, to secure the free exercise of their Legislative functions, they are justified in acting by the principle of the Common Law. But the power of punishing any one for past misconduct as a contempt of its authority, and adjudicating upon the fact of such contempt, and the measure of punishment as a judicial body, irresponsible to the party accused, whatever the real facts may be, is of a very different character, and by no means essentially necessary for the exercise of its functions by a local Legislature, whether representative or not. All these functions may be well performed without this extraordinary power, and with the aid of the ordinary tribunals to investigate and punish contemptuous insults and interruptions."

There can be no doubt that the ruling in the case just stated upheld the existence of the implied power to punish for contempt as distinct from legislative authority and yet flowing from it. It thus becomes apparent that from a [541] doctrinal point of view the English rule concerning legislative bodies generally came to be in exact accord with that which was recognized in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, as belonging to Congress, that is, that in virtue of the grant of legislative authority there would be a power implied to deal with contempt in so far as that authority was necessary to preserve and carry out the legislative authority given. While the doctrine of Kielley v. Carson was thus in substantive principle the same as that announced in Anderson v. Dunn, we must not be understood as accepting the application which was made of the rule to the particular case there in question since, as we shall hereafter have occasion to show, we think that the application was not consistent with the rule which the case announced and would, if applied, unwarrantedly limit the implied power of Congress to deal with contempt.

What does this implied power embrace? is thus the question. In answering, it must be borne in mind that the power rests simply upon the implication that the right has been given to do that which is essential to the execution of some other and substantive authority expressly conferred. The power is therefore but a force implied to bring into existence the conditions to which constitutional limitations apply. It is a means to an end and not the end itself. Hence it rests solely upon the right of self-preservation to enable the public powers given to be exerted.

These principles are plainly the result of what was decided in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, since in that case in answering the question what was the rule by which the extent of the implied power of legislative assemblies to deal with contempt was controlled, it was declared to be "the least possible power adequate to the end proposed" (Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat 231), which was but a form of stating that as it resulted from implication and not from legislative will, the legislative will was powerless to extend it further [542] than implication would justify. The concrete application of the definition and the principle upon which it rests were aptly illustrated in In re Chapman, supra, where, because of the distinction existing between the two which was drawn, the implied power was decided not to come under the operation of a constitutional limitation applicable to a case resting upon the exercise of substantive legislative power.

Without undertaking to inclusively mention the subjects embraced in the implied power, we think from the very nature of that power it is clear that it does not embrace punishment for contempt as punishment, since it rests only upon the right of self-preservation, that is, the right to prevent acts which in and of themselves inherently obstruct or prevent the discharge of legislative duty or the refusal to do that which there is an inherent legislative power to compel in order that legislative functions may be performed. And the essential nature of the power also makes clear the cogency and application of the two limitations which were expressly pointed out in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, that is, that the power even when applied to subjects which justified its exercise is limited to imprisonment and such imprisonment may not be extended beyond the session of the body in which the contempt occurred. Not only the adjudged cases but congressional action in enacting legislation as well as in exerting the implied power conclusively sustain the views just stated. Take for instance the statute referred to in In re Chapman where, not at all interfering with the implied congressional power to deal with the refusal to give testimony in a matter where there was a right to exact it, the substantive power had been exerted to make such refusal a crime, the two being distinct the one from the other. So also when the difference between the judicial and legislative powers are considered and the divergent elements which in the nature of things enter into the determination of [543] what is self-preservation in the two cases, the same result is established by the statutory provisions dealing with the judicial authority to summarily punish for contempt, that is, without resorting to the modes of trial required by constitutional limitations or otherwise for substantive offenses under the criminal law. Act of March 2, 1831, 4 Stat. 487. The legislative history of the exertion of the implied power to deal with contempt by the Senate or House of Representatives when viewed comprehensively from the beginning points to the distinction upon which the power rests and sustains the limitations inhering in it which we have stated. The principal instances are mentioned in the margin* and they all except two or three deal with either physical obstruction of the legislative body in the discharge of its duties, or physical assault upon its members for action taken or words spoken in the body, or obstruction of its officers in the performance of their official duties, or the prevention of members from attending so that their duties might be performed, or finally with contumacy in refusing to obey orders to produce documents or give testimony which there was a right to compel. In the two or three instances not embraced in the classes we think it plainly appears that for the moment the distinction was overlooked which existed between the legislative power to make criminal every form of act which can constitute a contempt to be punished [544] according to the orderly process of law and the accessory implied power to deal with particular acts as contempts outside of the ordinary process of law because of the effect such particular acts may have in preventing the exercise of legislative authority. And in the debates which ensued when the various cases were under consideration it would seem that the difference between the legislative and the judicial power was also sometimes forgotten, that is to say, the legislative right to exercise discretion was confounded with the want of judicial power to interfere with the legislative discretion when lawfully exerted. But these considerations are accidental and do not change the concrete result manifested by considering the subject from the beginning. Thus we have been able to discover no single instance where in the exertion of the power to compel testimony restraint was ever made to extend beyond the time when the witness should signify his willingness to testify, the penalty or punishment for the refusal remaining controlled by the general criminal law. So again we have been able to discover no instance, except the two or three above referred to, where acts of physical interference were treated as within the implied power unless they possessed the obstructive or preventive characteristics which we have stated, or any case where any restraint was imposed after it became manifest that there was no room for a legislative judgment as to the virtual continuance of the wrongful interference which was the subject of consideration. And this latter statement causes us to say, referring to Kielley v. Carson, supra, that where a particular act because of its interference with the right of self-preservation comes within the jurisdiction of the House to deal with directly under its implied power to preserve its functions and therefore without resort to judicial proceedings under the general criminal law, we are of opinion that authority does not cease to exist because the act complained of had been committed [545] when the authority was exerted, for to so hold would be to admit the authority and at the same time to deny it. On the contrary when an act is of such a character as to subject it to be dealt with as a contempt under the implied authority, we are of opinion that jurisdiction is acquired by Congress to act on the subject and therefore there necessarily results from this power the right to determine in the use of legitimate and fair discretion how far from the nature and character of the act there is necessity for repression to prevent immediate recurrence, that is to say, the continued existence of the interference or obstruction to the exercise of the legislative power. And of course in such case as in every other, unless there be manifest an absolute disregard of discretion and a mere exertion of arbitrary power coming within the reach of constitutional limitations, the exercise of the authority is not subject to judicial interference.

It remains only to consider whether the acts which were dealt with in the case in hand were of such a character as to bring them within the implied power to deal with contempt, that is, the accessory power possessed to prevent the right to exert the powers given from being obstructed and virtually destroyed. That they were not, would seem to be demonstrated by the fact that the contentions relied upon in the elaborate arguments at bar to sustain the authority were principally rested not upon such assumption, but upon the application and controlling force of the rule governing in the House of Commons. But aside from this, coming to test the question by a consideration of the conclusion upon which the contempt proceedings were based as expressed in the report of the select committee which we have previously quoted and the action of the House of Representatives based on it, there is room only for the conclusion that the contempt was deemed to result from the writing of the letter not because of any obstruction to the performance of legislative [546] duty resulting from the letter or because the preservation of the power of the House to carry out its legislative authority was endangered by its writing, but because of the effect and operation which the irritating and ill-tempered statements made in the letter would produce upon the public mind or because of the sense of indignation which it may be assumed was produced by the letter upon the members of the committee and of the House generally. But to state this situation is to demonstrate that the contempt relied upon was not intrinsic to the right of the House to preserve the means of discharging its legislative duties, but was extrinsic to the discharge of such duties and related only to the presumed operation which the letter might have upon the public mind and the indignation naturally felt by members of the committee on the subject. But these considerations plainly serve to mark the broad boundary line which separates the limited implied power to deal with classes of acts as contempts for self-preservation and the comprehensive legislative power to provide by law for punishment for wrongful acts.

The conclusions which we have stated bring about a concordant operation of all the powers of the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, express or implied, as contemplated by the Constitution. And as this is considered, the reverent thought may not be repressed that the result is due to the wise foresight of the fathers manifested in state constitutions even before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States by which they substituted for the intermingling of the legislative and judicial power to deal with contempt as it existed in the House of Commons a system permitting the dealing with that subject in such a way as to prevent the obstruction of the legislative powers granted and secure their free exertion and yet at the same time not substantially interfere with the great guarantees and limitations concerning [547] the exertion of the power to criminally punish,—a beneficent result which additionally arises from the golden silence by which the framers of the Constitution left the subject to be controlled by the implication of authority resulting from the powers granted.

It is suggested in argument that whatever be the general rule, it is here not applicable because the House was considering and its committee contemplating impeachment proceedings. The argument is irrelevant because we are of opinion that the premise upon which it rests is unfounded. But indulging in the assumption to the contrary we think it is wholly without merit as we see no reason for holding that if the situation suggested be assumed it authorized a disregard of the plain purposes and objects of the Constitution as we have stated them. Besides it must be apparent that the suggestion could not be accepted without the conclusion that under the hypothesis stated the implied power to deal with contempt as ancillary to the legislative power had been transformed into judicial authority and become subject to all the restrictions and limitations imposed by the Constitution upon that authority,—a conclusion which would frustrate and destroy the very purpose which the proposition is advanced to accomplish and would create a worse evil than that which the wisdom of the fathers corrected before the Constitution of the United States was adopted. How can this be escaped, since it is manifest that if the argument were to be sustained those things which, as pointed out in In re Chapman, supra, were distinct and did not therefore the one frustrate the other—the implied legislative authority to compel the giving of testimony and the right criminally to punish for failure to do so—would become one and the same and the exercise of one would therefore be the exertion of, and the exhausting of the right to resort to, the other. Again, accepting the proposition, by what process of reasoning could the [548] conclusion be escaped that the right to exert implied authority by way of contempt proceedings in so far as essential to preserve legislative power would become itself an exertion of legislative power and thus at once be subject to the limitations as to modes of trial exacted by the guarantee of the Constitution on that subject. We repeat, out of abundance of precaution, we are called upon to consider not the legislative power of Congress to provide for punishment and prosecution under the criminal laws in the amplest degree for any and every wrongful act, since we are alone called upon to determine the limits and extent of an ancillary and implied authority essential to preserve the fullest legislative power, which would necessarily perish by operation of the Constitution if not confined to the particular ancillary atmosphere from which alone the power arises and upon which its existence depends.

It follows from what we have said that the court below erred in refusing to grant the writ of habeas corpus and its action must be and it is, therefore, reversed, and the case remanded with directions to discharge the relator from custody.

And it is so ordered.

NOTE.

Power of Legislature to Punish Person Other than Witness for Contempt.

In a considerable number of cases involving the punishment of witnesses for contempt of the legislature the courts have asserted by way of dictum that the English Parliament has inherent power to punish for contempt and have doubted whether a like power was possessed by the Congress of the United States or the legislatures of the several states. See the notes to Ex p. Parker, 7 Ann. Cas. 874; Sullivan v. Hill, Ann. Cas. 1916B 1115.

The reported case appears to be the only decision in the United States passing directly on the power of a legislature to punish a person other than a witness, for contempt. In holding that the House of Representatives has no inherent power so to punish, the Supreme Court takes the view that the legislative branch of the American government is not vested with judicial powers, such as characterize the Parliament of England, saying that so to construe the powers expressed in the Constitution would be to destroy the distinction between the judicial and the legislative departments. It is held, however, that the house has the power to punish for contempt, when such action is necessary to preserve the legislative authority expressly granted. This holding of course excludes any question of judicial power.

The question of the power of a legislature to punish for contempt arose in Kielley v. Carson, 4 Moo. P. C. (Eng.) 63. In that case Kielley was found guilty of contempt for using insulting and threatening language to a member of the Newfoundland assembly, outside the house. On appeal the decision was reversed on the ground that the legislature had no implied power to punish for contempt, nor had the House of Commons of England expressly conferred such power. The court speaking through Mr. Baron Parke said: "It is said, however, that this power belongs to the House of Commons in England; and thus, it is contended, affords an authority for holding that it belongs as a legal incident, by the common law, to an assembly with analogous functions. But the reason why the House of Commons has this power, is not because it is a representative body with legislative functions, but by virtue of ancient usage and prescription; the lex et consuetudo Parliamenti, which forms a part of the common law of the land, and according to which the High Court of Parliament, before its division, and the Houses of Lords and Commons since, are invested with many peculiar privileges, that of punishing for contempt being one. And, besides, this argument from analogy would prove too much, since it would be equally available in favor of the assumption by the council of the island, of the power of commitment exercised by the House of Lords, as well as in support of the right of impeachment by the assembly—a claim for which there is not any color of foundation. Nor can the power be said to be incident to the legislative assembly by analogy to the English courts of record which possess it. This assembly is no court of record, nor has it any judicial functions whatever; and it is to be remarked, that all those bodies which possess the power of adjudication upon, and punishing in a summary manner, contempts of their authority, have judicial functions, and exercise this as incident to those which they possess, except only the House of Commons, whose authority, in this respect, rests upon ancient usage. Their lordships, therefore, are of opinion, that the principle of the common law, that things necessary, pass as incident, does not give the power contended for by the respondents as an incident to, and included in, the grant of a subordinate legislature.”

CITY OF EDMONTON.

Canada Supreme Court—December 11, 1916.

54 Can. Sup. Ct. 443.

Streets and Highways — Injury from Defect — Liability of Municipality — Notice of Defect.

A municipality charged by its charter with the duty of keeping sidewalks in repair is liable for an injury to a pedestrian from a defect in a sidewalk produced by a long continued practice of driving wagons over the walk at that place, though the municipality had no actual notice of the defect.

[444] Appeal from the judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, 9 West. W. R. 1287; 33 West. L. R. 851, which reversed the judgment of McCarthy J. at the trial, and dismissed the plaintiff's action with costs.

The material circumstances of the case are stated in the head-note and the questions in issue on the present appeal will appear from the judgments now reported.

Chrysler K. C. for appellant.

Lasfleur K. C. for respondent.

A. G. Mackay & Co., solicitors for appellant.

J. C. Bown, solicitor for respondent.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is an action brought by the appellant to recover damages for injuries caused by the defective condition of a sidewalk built by the corporation respondent for the use of the public.

The charter of the City of Edmonton (sec. 507) in express terms imposes upon the corporation the legal duty to keep the sidewalk in a reasonable state of repair and at the same time gives it authority to take all necessary measures to prevent the sidewalk becoming a danger to the public making use of it in the exercise of their right (sec. 237).

It is not disputed that the sidewalk was out of repair, that the appellant was making a proper use of it under the belief that it was in good condition and that as a result he was injured as alleged in his statement of claim.

There is in consequence no doubt that the appellant [445] had a civil action against the respondent to recover compensation in damages for his injuries unless we are prepared to overrule the decision of this court in Vancouver v. McPhalen, 45 Can. Sup. Ct. 194.

An action is given for breach of a statutory duty irrespective of whether the act done would be a wrong apart from the statute.

In Dawson v. Bingley Urban Dist. Council [1911] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 149, Farwell and Kennedy, L. JJ. put the matter in this way: That where a person is one of a class for whose benefit a statutory duty is imposed, he is on breach of that duty entitled to maintain an action for damages occasioned to him by the breach unless the statute has indicated an intention to exclude that remedy.

In the case of Maguire v. Liverpool [1905] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 767, Vaughan-Williams, L. J. asserts the same general rule as do Farwell and Kennedy L. JJ. in the Bingley Case, and treats the immunity of the authority in respect to the non-repair of highways as an exception due to the particular history of the highways. But in Vancouver v. McPhalen, the distinction is very clearly made between those English cases in which the duty imposed is, as Sir Louis Davies says, one transferred from a body or authority on or with whom it previously rested and which body or authority was not itself liable in civil actions for nonfeasance (page 196) and cases in which the duty is created and imposed in the charter calling the corporation into existence. The general rule is that every public duty presumably gives rise to a private action in favour of a person injured by its breach and I know of nothing in the history of the highways in Edmonton [446] which would justify creating an exception to that general rule in the case of breach by nonfeasance in respect to their repair.

But it is said that there is no proof of notice to the City of Edmonton of the existence of the hole in the sidewalk which caused the appellant's injury and that in consequence no liability attached. In Vancouver v. Cummings, 46 Can. Sup. Ct. 457, Ann. Cas. 1913A 685, Mr. Justice Idington speaking for the majority of this court said (p. 466):—

"I am, despite dicta to the contrary, prepared to hold that, unless in some such case as I have suggested, the question of notice or knowledge does not arise, and that in all cases where the accident has arisen from the mere wearing out or apparent wearing out, or imperfect repair of the road, there arises upon evidence of accident caused thereby, a presumption without evidence of notice that the duty relative to repair has been neglected."

My brother Anglin describes the circumstances under which the sidewalk became dangerous to the public using it and it is unnecessary for me to add anything to what he says beyond this. As a necessary consequence of the improper use to which it was put, to the knowledge of the corporation, the sidewalk became out of repair and a danger to those obliged to pass over it. The hole actually made in the sidewalk as a result of that improper use and which was the direct cause of the accident was allowed to remain unrepai red for over twenty-four hours, and the city police whose duty it was to report such conditions passed the place frequently. In these circumstances I am bound to hold, in view of the opinion expressed in Vancouver v. Cummings, that there arises a presumption without proof of notice that the duty relative to repair has been neglected. On the authority of Mersey Docks, etc. v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. (Eng.) 93, at p. 121, I would add, [447] it must be taken as an established fact that the respondent had, by its servants, the means of knowing the dangerous state of the sidewalk, but was negligently ignorant of it. If the knowledge of the defect would make it responsible for the consequence of not having it repaired, it must be equally responsible if it was only through its culpable negligence that its existence was not known to them.

The appeal should be allowed with costs.

DAVIES, J. (dissenting).—After much consideration of the facts in this case I have reached the conclusion that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta was right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

I am satisfied with the statement of the facts and of the law as applicable to them made by the learned judges who formed the majority in the court below.

All the judges in that court held that as the city had not any actual notice of the break in the sidewalk which led to plaintiff's injuries sufficient time had not elapsed between such breakage and the accident to impute notice to them.

The evidence shews beyond doubt that the city had kept the sidewalk, which was for pedestrians only, in suitable repair for the purposes intended.

I do not think there was any obligation upon the city to make the sidewalk stronger in order to accommodate trespassers who desired to cross it with loaded trucks or drays. Nor can I find any obligation existing on the part of the city to make a crossing at the place in question.

The liability of the city must therefore depend on their alleged negligence in enforcing the by-law, and it seems to me that the limit of the city's obligation [448] in that regard was to prevent trespasses by prosecuting offenders.

Before liability can attach to the city for nonenforcement of a by-law an existing nuisance must be shewn to exist of which it had notice or be held to have had notice in law. Nothing of the kind existed here.

Mr. Justice Beck sets out in his judgment the provisions of the by-law relied on as casting a duty upon the city and shews that they do not support the statement of the trial judge that the city could require an owner to put and keep a sidewalk abutting on his property in repair but merely prohibits him or any one else from crossing the sidewalk without taking steps to avoid injuring it. The learned judge adds that the most that might be expected of the city in the present case was that they should have prosecuted under the provisions of the by-law and he concludes (citing as authorities 14 Cyc. title "Municipal Corporations," p. 1356, under the sub-title "Failure to prevent improper use of streets" and Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 4, p. 1627) that no action can lie against the city for failure to enforce such by-law except in cases amounting to a public nuisance.

In this opinion I agree and would dismiss the appeal.

DINERON, J.—The appellant recovered judgment against the respondent, a municipal corporation, for damages suffered by reason of his leg getting broken in consequence of the negligence of the respondent in failing to keep in a reasonable state of repair its sidewalk whereon he was walking.

The court of appeal for Alberta reversed that judgment and hence this appeal.

The duty of the respondent in the premises is defined [449] by section 507 of its charter, which is as follows:—

"507. The city shall keep every highway, including all crossings, sewers, culverts and approaches, grades, sidewalks and other works made or done therein or thereon by the city or by any person with the permission of the city, in a reasonable state of repair, having regard to the character of the highway and the locality in which the same is situated or through which it passes."

The respondent had constructed the sidewalk, some six or seven years before the accident in question, of spruce planks, laid, I infer from the evidence, transversely to the line of the street, and supported by light scantling fit only to support pedestrian travel.

At the place in question there was a lane running at right angles to the sidewalk to serve the houses abutting thereon.

It turned out that teamsters who might have entered at the other end of this lane, with loads of any kind, got into the habit of using for their entrance or exit the end of the lane fronting on the sidewalk in question.

If the respondent had either protected the end of the lane next the sidewalk from any entrance, or built or caused to be built a proper crossing, by usual structure for such use, the sidewalk would have been in no danger of being broken as it was, and thus producing such accidents as this.

Instead of doing so the respondent tolerated the use that was made continuously, for at least a year or more, next preceding the accident, of that means of entrance into the lane in question and thereby endangered the maintenance of the sidewalk, and consequently the safety of pedestrians.

Indeed earth excavation, resulting from the execution of other work on the street at that point, was left lying as thrown there, while doing the work, long [450] after such work was completed, and till some neighbour levelled it off and piled some of it up against the sidewalk so as to give it the appearance of a proper entrance to the lane and thereby invite just such traffic across the sidewalk as was sure to destroy it, and did destroy it twenty-eight hours before the accident in question.

Planks of the sidewalk had been worn out or destroyed by such use and the want of repair thus created was attended to more than once by the respondent's servants.

Even when repaired there remained a breaking or chipping off of the ends of the planks in the sidewalk, so apparent to everyone, that no man, qualified for his job, when looking after the sidewalks could fail to recognize the notorious fact that this crossing use was being made of it, and was liable any day to break planks never intended to bear such traffic, and hence unfitted to meet the needs of pedestrian travel which demands safety.

That open and notorious use of the sidewalk and condition of things resultant therefrom, having existed by the negligence of the respondent for a year or more, it has the temerity to suggest that this case falls within that class of cases where courts have had to consider whether or not when an unavoidable, unexpected and improbable accident has put the highway out of repair, or wrong done by others had obstructed its use in a way of which the municipal authorities had no knowledge or notice, should be held to constitute negligence.

No court could properly find on the facts in question, in most of these cases, where the municipality was excused that there was negligence. Some of them may be very questionable.

[451] The usual statute in question in each of such cases made no provision for actual notice, indeed notice of any kind, but has been so interpreted as to render the question merely one of negligence in the discharge of a statutory duty, and in short the application of common sense.

In defining the law in such cases the term "want of notice" has been used sometimes when it was only intended to signify that the defendant might or might not, or should or should not have known, if all reasonable means had been taken to observe and discharge the duty which the statute had imposed.

The short method of expressing the duty has led some people to imagine and loosely to assert that notice is actually necessary.

It has been time and again explained that the same degree of vigilance and the same condition of repair or maintenance could not be reasonably insisted upon in every case.

The highway that only serves a remote and sparsely settled district would not be tolerated in the centre of a large city, or serve its needs. The inspection demanded in the latter could not reasonably be required in the former. It comes to this that the section of respondent's charter quoted above expressly provides by the word "reasonably" what the law had already been determined by the courts to mean in cases where the statute merely imposed the duty of keeping in repair.

If a municipality persists in using a mode of construction and material fit only for pedestrian traffic, when its officers know that it is used also for loaded teams to cross, it has not discharged its obligations but laid a trap for its citizens getting their legs broken.

[452] All that has been urged about liability for nonobservance of its own by-laws is quite beside the question involved.

It matters not whether there was a by-law enacted or not, or enacted only to be broken. No man could seriously consider the sidewalk as constructed at the point in question as fit for the use that it was being put to or a safe place over which to induce daily travel by pedestrians in a thickly inhabited part of the city. As well invite men to rely for crossing, by night and by day, a brook, upon a bridge which everyone concerned to know should, if thinking for an instant, realize will be swept away by the first storm that comes that way.

It is idle to point to the by-law forbidding such use when the breach thereof from week to week is tolerated. As well pass a by-law against storms in the illustration I put.

It is the maintenance of an insufficient sidewalk in a place notoriously needing something more substantial, or more rigorous means of warding off its destruction, than merely passing a by-law which nobody but its authors ever reads.

The powers the respondent had for enforcing the construction of a proper crossing at the point in question at the expense of those concerned in its use render the negligence of the respondent the less excusable.

The appeal should be allowed with costs here and in the court below and the judgment of the learned trial judge be restored.

DUFF, J.—The appellant one evening in November, 1914, after dark, stepped into a hole in a wooden sidewalk on Fifth Avenue, a street in Edmonton, with the result that his leg was broken. He sued the municipality for damages, basing his claim upon section [453] 507 of the Edmonton City Charter, which is in the following words:—

"The city shall keep every highway, including all crossings, sewers, culverts and approaches, grades, sidewalks and other works made or done therein or thereon by the city or by any person with the permission of the city, in a reasonable state of repair, having regard to the character of the highway and the locality in which the same is situate or through which it passes."

At the trial before Mr. Justice McCarthy he succeeded; but the judgment given in his favour at the trial was reversed on appeal with the dissent of Mr. Justice Stuart.

In the immediate neighbourhood of the place where the accident happened there were some residences which had a lane or back area in the rear and for many months before the accident—at least a year—it was the practice for delivery vehicles entering this lane to pass over the place where the plaintiff met his injury; and the day before the date of the accident the sidewalk had collapsed under the weight of one of these vehicles.

Some facts are admitted or so clear as not to be open to dispute. The sidewalk was not of sufficient strength to support traffic of the kind to which it was thus subjected. For the convenience of vehicles passing over this sidewalk an approach had been made by banking with earth the street side of the sidewalk opposite the lane and the sidewalk itself there shewed unmistakable evidence of the passage of wheels—unmistakable, that is to say, to competent persons performing the duty of observing the condition of the sidewalk.

It was not disputed, I think, that in the condition in which the sidewalk was when the accident occurred the street was not in a "reasonable state of repair" having regard to "the character of the streets and the locality in which it was situated" within the meaning of section [454] 507; and I have no difficulty in holding that if due diligence had been used by the municipality and those entrusted by the municipality with the care of the streets, that is to say, if diligence had been exercised of such a degree as to bring it into conformity with the standard supplied by the ordinary notions of sensible people, the sidewalk would not have been allowed to fall into that condition. Proper diligence would have led to the knowledge, by the persons responsible, of the fact that this sidewalk was being subjected to the burden of an extraordinary traffic—a usage under which it was certain eventually to collapse; actuated by a reasonable respect for their duty, such persons on discovering the state of affairs, would have addressed themselves to finding means for the prevention of that which might be expected to happen in the absence of precautions, and which did in fact happen. They could have attained this object by stopping the traffic; or they could have attained it by strengthening the sidewalk.

The question to be decided on this appeal is whether in the circumstances the municipality is responsible in damages for the consequences of the neglect to take proper measures to prevent this sidewalk, under the effects of this traffic, falling into such condition as to amount to a nuisance. Section 507 is capable of being read as creating an absolute duty to prevent the highways of the city falling into a state of disrepair. There is, however, much to be said and there is a long line of authorities beginning with Hammond v. Vestry of St. Pancras, L. R. 9 C. P. (Kng.) 316, in support of the view that where duties of maintenance are, by enactments similar to section 507, cast upon a municipal body, the responsibility is not an absolute responsibility making the municipality in [455] all circumstances answerable in damages for the existence of a state of things which the statute aims to prevent, e. g., a nuisance arising from the disrepair of a sewer; but that the public authority charged with such responsibility is not answerable if the state of things out of which the complaint arises is one which could not have been prevented or made innocuous by the observance on its part, and on the part of such agencies as it employed, or ought to have employed, of proper care and diligence. A highway may become a dangerous nuisance through a sudden operation of nature not reasonably foreseeable, or from the mischievous act of some person for whom the authority charged with the care of the highway is not responsible and which it could not reasonably be held to be negligent or incompetent in not anticipating. In such cases and generally speaking in cases in which the state of things complained of can be shewn to have been something which the public authority could not reasonably have been expected to know or to provide against, it has been held that there is a good answer to any claim for reparation: Bateman v. Poplar Dist. Board of Works, 37 Ch. D. (Eng.) 272; Brown v. Sargent, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 112; Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 781; Whitehouse v. Birmingham Canal Co. 27 L. J. Exch. (Eng.) 25. Under an enactment in the "Ontario Municipal Act," to much the same effect as section 507, municipalities have uniformly been held to be exonerated in the absence of negligence. It may properly be assumed that section 507 was not enacted without reference to this course of decision and therefore, in construing that section, one is not without weighty sanction when giving effect to the considerations upon which these decisions rest.

[456] Strictly no question of burden of proof is here material. By the pleadings the onus of establishing an actionable breach of duty, is of course, on the plaintiff in the first instance. I express no opinion upon the question whether the effect of the statute itself is that where a nuisance is shewn to have existed in fact the onus is thereby cast upon the municipality to establish that the nuisance was not due to any cause for which it is responsible; in other words, whether or not there is a presumption of law arising from the existence of a nuisance—in the condition of a highway—that the municipality is responsible for it; a presumption that the municipality can only meet by establishing the negative of the issue. It is also strictly unnecessary to pass upon the question whether or not the plaintiff by proving the existence of the nuisance thereby establishes a prima facie case; although, as it is quite evident that the legislature in passing the enactment has assumed that in the ordinary course highways can be kept in a reasonable state of repair by the exercise of such diligence as may properly be expected from the municipality, there seems to be sufficient ground for holding that proof of the existence of a nuisance does in itself constitute a prima facie case throwing upon the municipality the burden at least of going forward with evidence. (See Blamires v. Lancashire, etc. R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. (Eng.) 283.)

The evidence before us in this case is quite sufficient, as I have already indicated, to shew failure to discharge the duty arising under section 507 for which the municipality is responsible.

It is argued that the municipality cannot be held responsible for the nonenforcement of its by-laws. [457] In truth the municipality in the view expressed above is held responsible for allowing a nuisance to come into existence which could and ought to have been prevented. It was incumbent upon the municipality to use its powers of control on the highway to that end; and if the enforcement of the by-law had been its only means of effectively executing its duty, the municipality was bound to resort to that means. There is a passage in Lord Blackburn's judgment in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir, 3 App. Cas. (Eng.) 430, at page 456, that may be usefully quoted. It gives the principle which affords another answer to this argument:—

"And I think that if by a reasonable exercise of the powers, either given by statute to the promoters, or which they have at common law, the damage could be prevented it is, within this rule, 'negligence' not to make such reasonable exercise of their powers."

ANGLIN, J.—The plaintiff was injured through stepping into a hole in a sidewalk constructed by the defendant corporation on a city street where the traffic was considerable. The accident occurred at half-past seven o'clock on a November evening. The sidewalk had been broken down by a heavy load of coal driven over it on the afternoon of the previous day about four o'clock. The evidence shewed that the sidewalk had been constructed as an ordinary plank walk intended for use by pedestrians only, and that no provision had been made for the crossing of it by vehicular traffic at the point in question. A by-law of the city prohibited the crossing of sidewalks by horses and vehicles where protective timbering had not been provided for that purpose. Notwithstanding this by-law the place in question had been used throughout the whole of the year preceding the accident without [458] any such protection as a crossing to a yard or private lane.

The user had been of such a character and to such an extent that the learned judge found, properly in my opinion, that the city had notice of it. No charge of contributory negligence is pressed against the plaintiff. At the trial before McCarthy, J. the city was held liable on the ground that there had been a breach on its part of a duty "to have put and kept the crossing in a state of repair or to have required that the private owners of the property adjoining who used the crossing should put the same in a proper state of repair."

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court reversed this judgment, holding that there was no obligation on the part of the city to provide a crossing, that its only duty in respect of the sidewalk was to repair it within a reasonable time after notice that it was out of repair and that notice actual or imputed of the existence of disrepair was not established. Mr. Justice Stuart, dissenting, held that because the municipal corporation knew that the sidewalk was being crossed continually by vehicles the place in question had the combined character of a sidewalk and crossing of a highway and should have been kept in a state of repair suitable to that character. He found that such a state of repair was not maintained. He also held that, having regard to such user and the character of the construction of the sidewalk, the city was called upon, if it did not desire to reconstruct so as to make the place suitable for a crossing for vehicles, to exercise greater vigilance in discovering breakages.

By its charter (sec. 507) the City of Edmonton is required to keep sidewalks constructed by it in a reasonable state of repair having regard to the character of the highway and the locality. This duty is imposed to ensure the safety of persons lawfully using the sidewalk [459] and a breach of it entails liability in damages to such persons when injured in consequence: Vancouver v. McPhalen, 45 Can. Sup. Ct. 194. It must have been obvious to anybody giving the matter a moment's consideration that the user of a crossing over a sidewalk constructed as was that in question might result in its breaking down at any time. The user was certain sooner or later to put the sidewalk into a state of disrepair. I think it is not imposing upon the municipality an obligation greater than the legislature intended to hold that the duty to keep in a reasonable state of repair involves the duty to prevent, as far as reasonably possible, the continuance of known conditions which will bring about a state of disrepair, and, if the continued existence of such conditions is not prevented, to take precautions in the nature of extra inspection commensurate with the likelihood of a dangerous state of disrepair arising. Probably the safest and least expensive method of discharging its duty to keep in repair would have been to construct a proper crossing at the place in question. But, without holding that the municipality was under an obligation to construct such a crossing, or that failure to institute prosecutions for breaches of its by-law forbidding the crossing of unprotected sidewalks rendered it liable for damages, having knowingly permitted the continuance of forbidden and dangerous vehicular traffic involving risk of a break in the sidewalk at any moment, I think it cannot escape liability for injury sustained in consequence of a break occasioned by such traffic, after it had been allowed to remain unrepaired for more than a day. Whether such liability would arise in the case of an accident happening immediately, or very shortly, after the occurrence of a [460] break it is necessary now to determine. It may be said that this implies an obligation of at least daily inspection of a place such as that in question which would be too onerous to impose upon the municipality. But the necessity for such an inspection could have been so easily avoided, either by putting in a comparatively cheap crossing, which the city might have done on its own initiative, or by taking steps to prevent vehicular traffic crossing the sidewalk, which need have entailed no great trouble or expense, that the municipality can scarcely be heard to complain of the burden so imposed. Because, in my opinion, under the special circumstances in evidence it failed to take adequate measures for the fulfilment of its statutory duty to keep the sidewalk in a reasonable state of repair as a sidewalk, I would hold the defendant corporation liable.

The appeal should be allowed with costs in this court and in the court appealed from and the judgment of the learned trial judge should be restored.

Appeal allowed with costs.

NOTE.

It appeared in the reported case that teamsters were in the habit of driving across a wooden sidewalk at a certain place, and that this practice had continued for over a year. As a result thereof the sidewalk became broken and was in a dangerous condition, whereby a pedestrian was injured. The dangerous condition existed but a few hours prior to the injury and the municipality had no actual notice thereof. It is held that since the municipality was expressly charged by its charter with the duty of keeping the sidewalk in repair it was liable for the injury. The liability of a municipality for a defect in a street or highway as dependent on notice or knowledge, where a statute makes the muni-city liable for a failure to repair, is discussed in the note to Vancouver v. Cummings, Ann. Cas. 1913A 685, that case being cited and followed in the reported case. See also the following more recent cases reported in this series: Louisville v. Lenehan, Ann. Cas. 1914B 164; Ashland v. Boggs, Ann. Cas. 1916B 1005.

PEOPLE

v.

DIXON.

Michigan Supreme Court—September 29, 1915.

188 Mich. 307; 154 N. W. 1.

Unlawful Assembly — What Constitutes — Audience at Sunday Moving Picture Show.

Defendant, who ran a moving picture show on Sunday, in assumed violation of Comp. Laws 1897, § 5912, forbidding the opening of shops or any business or work or presence at any public show or entertainment on Sunday under a fine of not more than $10, can only be prosecuted under such provision, and, in the absence of any overt act or violence or disorder, cannot be summarily arrested under section 11334 et seq., authorizing the arrest of persons unlawfully assembled who refuse to disperse on command of the mayor, etc.

Exceptions from Circuit Court, Ionia county: DAVIS, Judge.

Criminal action. Charles Dixon convicted of running moving picture show on Sunday and alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Herbert C. Hall and Alfred R. Locke for People.

John Nichol and R. A. Colwell for respondent.

[308] BROOKE, J.—Respondent stands convicted under the following information:

"Alfred R. Locke, prosecuting attorney in and for the county of Ionia aforesaid, for and in behalf of the people of the State of Michigan, comes into said court, in the November term thereof, in the year one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, and gives the court here to understand and be informed that one Charles Dixon and Guy Alexander together, with thirty and more persons whose names are to this complainant unknown, late of the Ann. Cas. 1916B.—25.

city of Belding, in the county of Ionia, and State of Michigan, heretofore, to wit, on the 11th day of October, A. D. 1914, the same being the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, at a certain theater and show building in the city of Belding at the city of Belding, in the county of Ionia aforesaid, unlawfully did assemble and meet together to disturb the peace and to listen to, to see, and to conduct a certain show and entertainment and public exhibition in said theater and show building, and while so unlawfully assembled and meeting together in violation of law, one Lucius Stoddard, then and there a deputy sheriff of the county of Ionia, did go among them, the said Charles Dixon and Guy Alexander, and [309] the said thirty and more persons, and did then and there command the said Charles Dixon and Guy Alexander and all the said persons therein in said theater and show building assembled, immediately and peaceably to disperse, and that he, the said Charles Dixon, and Guy Alexander, being so commanded, and being then and there unlawfully assembled as aforesaid with the said thirty or more other persons, did wilfully, maliciously, and unlawfully refuse and neglect immediately and peaceably to disperse and leave the said theater and show building and unlawful assembly, and did then and there, contrary to the order and command of the said officer, wilfully, wickedly, and unlawfully refuse to obey the said order, and in defiance of said order and command did remain at said unlawful assembly, and did continue to conduct said show and theater and place of amusement and cause said unlawful assembly to continue, and, being so assembled and gathered together, the said Charles Dixon and said Guy Alexander and the said other persons did then and there unlawfully remain and continue in operating said show and theater, and did continue said unlawful assembly, thereby committing great grievances and a breach of the peace, and thereby disturbing and annoying the good and peaceable people in said city and for a great distance in said city and about the vicinity of said theater and show building, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the State of Michigan."

The facts are not in dispute and are sufficiently disclosed by the information. It was the theory of the people that respondent should be held guilty not only under section 5912, 2 Comp. Laws (2 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 5261), which provides:

"No person shall keep open his shop, warehouse, or workhouse, or shall do any manner of labor, business, or work, or be present at any dancing, or at any public diversion, show, or entertainment, or take part in any sport, game, or play on the first day of the week. The foregoing provisions shall not apply to works of necessity and charity, nor to the making of mutual promises [310] of marriage, nor to the solemnization of marriages. And every person so offending shall be punished by fine not exceeding ten dollars for each offense"—but likewise under section 11334, 3 Comp. Laws (5 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 14750), which reads as follows:

"If any persons, to the number of twelve or more, being armed with clubs, or other dangerous weapons, or if any persons, to the number of thirty or more, whether armed or not, shall be unlawfully, riotously, or tumultuously assembled in any city, township, or village, it shall be the duty of the mayor and each of the aldermen of such city, the supervisor of such township, the president and each of the trustees or members of the common council of such village, and of every justice of the peace, living in such city, township or village, and also of the sheriff of the county and his deputies, to go among the persons so assembled, or as near to them as may be with safety, and in the name of the people of this State, to command all the persons so assembled immediately and peaceably to disperse."

Assuming that the running of a moving picture show on Sunday is unlawful under section 5912, supra, which we do not determine (People v. Finn, 57 Misc. 659, 110 N. Y. S. 22; People v. Hemleb, 127 App. Div. 356, 111 N. Y. S. 690; William Fox Amusement Co. v. McClellan, 62 Misc. 100, 114 N. Y. S. 594; Edwards v. McClellan, 118 N. Y. S. 181; State v. Chamberlain, 112 Minn. 52, 127 N. W. 444, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 335, 21 Ann. Cas. 679; State v. Penny, 42 Mont. 118, 111 Pac. 727, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1155; and Rex v. Charron, 15 Can. Crim. Cas. 241), we are of opinion that the judgment in the case at bar must be reversed, in harmony with the reasoning of Justice Hooker in Yerkes v. Smith, 157 Mich. 557, 122 N. W. 223. We there said:

"The playing of baseball on Sunday is an act prohibited and punishable by law; the penalty being a fine of $10. It does not amount to a misdemeanor and cannot be prosecuted by indictment; the only remedy being [311] a civil action. See 3 Comp. Laws, § 9797 et seq.; Pettinger v. People, 20 Mich. 336. The action sought to be enforced by this proceeding is primarily the prevention of a game of baseball, advertised for August 30th last, and of games that are said to have been contemplated on Sundays of later dates. We suppose that relator expects such games to be prevented by arrest of those engaged in them. The law has prescribed another method for preventing infractions of this law, viz., a penalty to be collected through judicial proceedings; and a summary arrest, even after a violation of the law, is not contemplated, and is not authorized by law, as a means of preventing the violation of this statute. 2-Comp. Laws, § 5912. See authorities above cited.

"We understand that counsel does not contend otherwise, and that he rests his right to a writ upon the claim that under 3 Comp. Laws, § 11334, and succeeding sections, a game of baseball played in the presence of 30 or more persons is per se, and necessarily, a breach of the peace, and an assemblage of persons to the number of 30 or more, for the purpose of playing and witnessing such a game in Detroit on Sunday, is such an 'unlawful tumultuous, or riotous assemblage' as to make it the duty of this respondent to be present in person, or by policemen under his control, and prevent the game and the alleged consequent breach of the peace, by commanding said assemblage to immediately and peaceably disperse, enforcing such command by the arrest of all such persons as may fail to obey. Before the respondent could be required to arrest any one there must have been either a breach of the peace already committed or a failure to comply with a lawful order to disperse. Taking the answer as true, we must assume a willingness on the part of this respondent to cause warrants to issue for the arrest of all persons violating section 5912, and, acting through his subordinates, summarily to arrest all persons who should be guilty of a breach of the peace, but that he refused to assume that all baseball games played on Sunday required his personal attendance or would justify a command by him to disperse and subsequent arrest under the statute cited, if such command should not be obeyed.

[312] "We have said that the mere playing of a game of baseball upon Sunday is not of itself and necessarily a breach of the peace, justifying arrest and indictment. In a sense, a game of baseball on Sunday may often be a breach of the peace, perhaps usually is, but it cannot be said that it is necessarily so, and before a summary arrest can be made for a breach of the peace, not only must overt acts be committed in the presence of the officer, but they must be violent and dangerous acts of some sort. . . .

"It is clear that a mere assembling of persons to play and witness any Sunday game is not sufficient, without overt acts of violence or disorder, to authorize an officer to make a summary arrest. This being so, relator's claims must be left to rest upon the statute (section 11334) which has been held to be applicable, where a game of baseball on Sunday in a public place was attended by several hundred assembled, unlawfully and tumultuously, to witness it. Scougale v. Sweet, 124 Mich. 315, 82 N. W. 1061. Before an arrest can be required under this statute, there must be:

"(1) A condition of things justifying a command to disperse by the proper officer designated by law.

"(2) Disobedience of the command.

"This statute is apparently based upon the common-law duty of sheriffs and others to read the riot act and command a dispersal of persons at a time of riot. This statute may perhaps be said to have enlarged the common-law rule. It has certainly made it an offense to disobey a lawful command. But before one can be convicted of such an offense, there must have been:

"(1) An occasion for such a command;

"(2) the command must have been made by one of the statutory officers;

"(3) the command must have been disobeyed."

While the foregoing statement was not necessary to the decision in the case there considered, we are of opinion that it correctly states the law applicable to the instant case, and that the remedy against the respondent, in the absence of any overt acts of violence or disorder, must be confined to that provided under section 5912, 2 Comp. Laws.

[313] The judgment is reversed, and the respondents are discharged.

Kuhn, Stone, Ostrander, Bird, and Steere, JJ., concurred. Moore, J., did not sit.

The late Justice McAlvay took no part in this decision.

NOTE.

Engaging in Labor or Amusement on Sunday as Offense at Common Law or under Statute Other than Sunday Law.

Whether the act of one engaging in labor or amusement on Sunday is an offense at common law is a question which the courts seem rarely to have been called on to decide. The reason for this scarcity of decided cases on the subject probably is that from time immemorial comprehensive legislation, commonly referred to as "Sunday laws," has been in force in England (4 Blackstone Com. 63) and in this country since the organization of the colonies.

However, the rule apparently is well settled at common law that, with possibly the exception of judicial acts, anything may be done on Sunday which may be performed on any other day of the week. For a discussion of the legality under the common law of judicial and official acts performed on Sunday, see the note to Moss v. State, Ann. Cas. 1916B 1.

In the absence of statute, therefore, any innocent amusement participated in or enjoyed, or any act of labor performed, on Sunday is not prohibited and consequently does not constitute an offense. Rex v. Brotherton, 2 Stra. (Eng.) 702; Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 296, 43 N. E. 1108, 52 Am. St. Rep. 365, 32 L.R.A. 659; State v. Williams, 26 N. C. 400; State v. Brooksbank, 28 N. C. 73. See also Reid v. State, 53 Ala. 402, 25 Am. Rep. 627.

Thus, in Rex v. Brotherton, 2 Stra. (Eng.) 702, the court sustained a demurrer to an indictment for exercising the trade of a butcher on Sunday, the grounds of the demurrer being that the indictment was not laid as being against the form of the statute and the act complained of was no offense at common law.

In Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 296, 43 N. E. 1108, 52 Am. St. Rep. 365, 32 L.R.A. 659, it was said: "The common law of England, as adopted in this state as a part of our jurisprudence, does not prohibit the citizen from pursuing his ordinary labor on Sunday.

Under the law of this state as it existed prior to the passage of the act [Sunday law], in question, each and every citizen of the state was left perfectly free to labor and transact business on Sunday or refrain from labor and business, as he might choose, so long as he did not disturb the peace and good order of society."

In State v. Williams, 26 N. C. 400, the court said: "The indictment is for compelling certain slaves, belonging to the defendant, to work on several Sundays in the ordinary calling of the defendant on his farm. It lays those acts to be to the common nuisance and concludes at common law. We do not find it anywhere stated, that doing secular work on Sunday is per se an offense at common law. There is, indeed, in the Crown Circuit Companion a precedent (which is also adopted in 2 Chitty Cr. L. 20) of an indictment against a butcher as a common Sabbath breaker and profaner of Sunday, for having, within certain times, kept a common public and open shop in a town on Sunday and sold therein meat to divers persons. Mr. East also, speaking of offenses against God and religion, remarks, that the profanation of Sunday is by a variety of statutes punishable in particular instances by summary process before magistrates; and then adds, that 'it is also said to be indictable at the common law.' And he cites the precedent just mentioned. In the precedent the act is laid as a nuisance; as it is in the indictment before us."

In Reid v. State, 53 Ala. 402, 25 Am. Rep. 627, the court said obiter: "But it seems that the Sunday prohibitions of the common law reached only the courts. Its injunctions were all embraced in the maxim: Dies Dominicus non est juridicus. The Lord's day is not a court day. Judicial acts were held void, but not ministerial acts."

The reported case appears to be the only case in which a prosecution for the commission or omission of an act on Sunday has been attempted under a statute other than a "Sunday law," such act or omission being alleged to be an offense only because of its occurrence on a Sunday. In that case, the Sunday law prescribed a penalty in the nature of a fine for its violation. It was contended that the act of the defendant of keeping open a moving picture theater on Sunday was a violation not only of the Sunday law, but also of another statute under which the prosecution was also brought, and which provided, as follows: "If any persons, to the number of twelve or more . . . whether armed or not, shall be unlawfully . . . assembled . . .," etc. The court refuses to determine whether the keeping open for business on Sunday of the moving picture theater was a violation of the Sunday law but assuming its illegality holds that the audience so assembled did not constitute an unlawful assembly within the enactment quoted.

In such case, the depositor is entitled to a preference against the receiver of the bank for the special deposit.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Adams county: CUTLER, Chancellor.

Action by Mary Sawyer, plaintiff, against L. P. Conner, receiver, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[364] Appellant, Mrs. Sawyer, a resident of Natchez, Miss., was the owner of a house covered by a policy of fire insurance in the Caledonia Insurance Company. There was damage by fire, the loss was adjusted, and appellant received a check from the insurance company for the sum of five hundred and fifty dollars in settlement of the loss. She awarded a contract to one McClutchie for the said sum of five hundred and fifty dollars to repair the house. The check from the insurance company was received before the contractor had completed his contract to restore the building. Mrs. Sawyer has an adult daughter, Miss Margaret H. Sawyer, who carried the check of the insurance company to the First Natchez Bank and explained to the assistant cashier that her mother desired the check to be collected and the proceeds placed in the bank for the special purpose of paying Mr. McClutchie, the contractor. At that time, Mrs. Sawyer had an account in the savings department of the First Natchez Bank and a credit to her savings account of about one hundred and thirty-five dollars. Miss Margaret Sawyer also had two accounts at the bank, one a checking account and the other a savings account. When she presented the check to the officer of the institution, something was said about whether the proceeds of the check should be credited on her mother's passbook or upon either of Miss Sawyer's accounts, and, in response to this inquiry from the bank officer, Miss Sawyer declined to permit any entry of the check to be made either upon her mother's savings account or upon Miss Sawyer's account. Thereupon the officer of the bank executed upon a blank form the following receipt:

"First Natchez Bank, Natchez, Miss., Oct. 11, 1913. Mr. E. Sawyer: Yours ——— received. We credit your account: Sp. Dept. $550.00. All items credited subject to payment. Respectfully, G. S. Pintard, Cashier. (For the collection of all items payable outside of [365] this city, the First Natchez Bank will observe due diligence in its endeavor to select responsible agents, but will not be liable in case of their failure or negligence, or for loss of items in the mail.)"

The greater portion of the language of this receipt appears in printed form, but the words "Sp. Dept." were written, and the undisputed testimony shows that this was written for "special deposit." The deposit as shown by the receipt was made October 11th, and the bank failed October 29th thereafter. On the day the bank failed, Miss Margaret Sawyer went to the bank and made a deposit of fifteen dollars on her mother's savings account and had the same entered upon the passbook. The testimony shows that at that time she again called the bank's attention to the fact that Mr. McClutchie, the contractor, would complete his job in a few days, when she would come around and withdraw the deposit for the purpose of paying him. Her testimony is to the effect that the assistant cashier again assented to this special arrangement, and that neither she nor her mother knew that the bank was insolvent. It is shown that, at the time the deposit was made, the bank was hopelessly insolvent and that the officers of the bank had knowledge of this fact. The check from the insurance company was forwarded to the Seaboard National Bank of New York for collection, it being then one of the correspondents of the First Natchez Bank, and the proceeds of the check were credited to the account of the First Natchez Bank on the books of the Seaboard National Bank. When the First Natchez Bank closed its doors, there was a balance to its credit in the Seaboard National Bank of four thousand five hundred and twenty-one dollars and thirty-nine cents, which amount was collected by the receiver. After the receiver was appointed, notice was given to all creditors to appear and probate their accounts, and Mrs. Sawyer probated her account, not only for the $550 special deposit, but for the balance due her in the savings department, [366] and at the time this controversy was tried to the chancellor she had received a ten per cent dividend, paid to all depositors whose accounts had been duly probated. She presented an ancillary petition to the court seeking a preference for the said sum of five hundred and fifty dollars upon the ground that it was a special deposit and also upon the further ground that it was fraudulently obtained from her by the officer of the bank with full knowledge of the bank's insolvency. The petition was answered, evidence both for petitioner and the receiver introduced, and a decree was entered by the chancellor dismissing the petition and declining to award appellant a preference. From this decree she prosecutes this appeal.

Truly & Truly for appellant.
L. T. Kennedy for appellee.

[370] STEVENS, J. (after stating the facts).—While the deposit made by Mrs. Sawyer may not come within the literal meaning of the term "special deposit," it does, in our judgment, constitute a deposit for a special purpose and is frequently referred to or known as a "special [371] deposit." This particular class of deposits is referred to by the author on Banks and Banking in Corpus Juris. "as a distinct class." It is stated on page 632, vol. 6, C. J., that:

"In using deposits made for the purpose of having them apply to a particular purpose, the bank acts as an agent of the depositor, and if it should fail to apply it at all, or should misapply it, it can be recovered as a trust deposit."

In the case at bar, the evidence shows that the depositor absolutely refused to permit the proceeds of the check in question to be deposited either to her checking account or her savings account. It was explained to the official of the bank receiving the check that the proceeds were intended to pay and must pay the contractor who was repairing the damage to the house which this very check was designed to cover and satisfy. Miss Sawyer testifies that, if she had known the bank was insolvent, she would not have placed the money in the bank at all. The fair inference from all her testimony is that she would not have deposited the funds at all, if she had known that they would not safely reach the contractor. She regarded the funds as equitably the money of the contractor, and the sole purpose of depositing the check was to have the same forwarded for collection and the proceeds safely remitted and safely kept for Mr. McClutchie. The bank had notice that Mr. McClutchie had an interest in the funds and, with full knowledge of the facts, accepted the money as a deposit for a special purpose. Under such circumstances, good faith on the part of the bank required it safely to keep the funds to be applied as directed. Under such circumstances, the bank, we think, did not take title to the proceeds of the draft, and it was never intended by the parties that the fund should be commingled with the general assets of the bank. It is contended by counsel for appellee that the proof does not show the bank was to deliver the proceeds to the contractor, but, on the contrary, [372] that Miss Sawyer was to return and execute a check to the contractor after his contract was completed. This, we think, is not a controlling factor in the case. The contractor could not be paid, of course, until his work had been done according to the contract, and it was a mere detail as to whether the bank would directly turn the funds over to McClutchie or whether Miss Sawyer would return and herself draw a check in his favor. The essential feature of this agreement was that the money belonged to the contractor the moment his contract was completed. The draft from the insurance company was upon a foreign bank and would in any event have to be forwarded for collection. This was not a deposit for collection in the usual sense of that term. There would have been no deposit for collection without the special agreement mentioned. The money at all times was charged with the trust in favor of the contractor, and at no time could the bank have charged the proceeds against any indebtedness due by Mrs. Sawyer to the bank. The principle here announced was one of the principles contended for and fully recognized by our court in Armour-Cudahy Packing Co. v. Greenville First Nat. Bank, 69 Miss. 700, 11 So. 28. It is said by Mr. Michie, in his work on Banks & Banking (volume 2, p. 1291):

"A special deposit exists when money or property is given to a bank for some specific and particular purpose, as a note for collection, money to pay a particular note, or property for some specific purpose. . . . A deposit of the purchase price of property to be paid to the vendor upon the compliance with certain conditions is special"—citing in the footnotes cases in point, among which we regard Kimmel v. Dickson, 5 S. D. 221, 58 N. W. 561, 25 L.R.A. 309, 49 Am. St. Rep. 869, and Shopt v. Indiana Nat. Bank, 41 Ind. App. 474, 83 N. E. 515, as embodying the same principle here contended for.

A case very similar to the instant case is that of Carlson v. Kies, 75 Wash. 171, 134 Pac. 808, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) [373] 317. In that case money was directed to a bank by an administrator and attorney in fact for certain heirs, the funds to be held until receipts could be secured from the heirs, when it was to be forwarded to the holder by bank draft. The court held this to be a special deposit and entitled to a preference, although the bank commingled the money with its general funds. The court, by Gose, J., among other things, says:

"When a bank accepts a special deposit, it becomes a trustee of the depositor, and holds the money subject to the trust. The receipt itself affords strong, if not conclusive evidence of a special deposit. It shows that the money was placed in the bank for a special purpose. Fortified by the evidence of the depositor and the admitted circumstances here present, it is obvious that both parties to the transaction intended to make a special, and not a general deposit. It follows therefore that the bank holds the money, not as a general debtor, but in a fiduciary capacity"—citing many authorities.

The court also responded to the suggestion that the identical money was not traced into the hands of the receiver:

"That is true, but the old rule requiring an identification of the specific fund or its avails in the hands of a receiver has been relaxed in the later cases. The doctrine of the modern authorities, and what we consider the sounder view, is that the trust fund is recoverable where an equal amount in cash remained continuously in the bank until its suspension, and passed to the receiver"—citing also on this point several cases, including the very strong case of Fogg v. Tyler, 109 Me 109, 82 Atl. 1008, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 847, Ann. Cas. 1913E 41.

In Peak v. Ellicott, 30 Kan. 156, 1 Pac. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 90, the bank received money from the maker of a note with instructions to pay the sum to the holder of the note and return the canceled note, but the bank appropriated the money and failed to execute the directions of the depositor. The court expressly held that:

[374] The money "was not deposited to be checked out or to be loaned, or otherwise used by the bank; in law the bank held it as a trust fund, and not as the assets of the bank."

And again:

"Wherever a fiduciary relationship exists, and money coming from the trust lies in the hands of the person standing in that relationship, it can be followed by the principal and separated from any money of the wrongdoer."

A strong case and one squarely in point is that of Smith v. Sanborn State Bank, 147 Ia. 640, 126 N. W. 779, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 517, 140 Am. St. Rep. 336. It expressly answers the contention here made that the bank was not authorized to deliver the funds to the contractor, but that Mrs. Sawyer was to draw a check and herself attend to the payment. In the Smith Case, the bank accepted a deposit of money which the depositor needed for a special purpose, and that purpose was to pay certain debts specifically named, and then the remainder to be repaid to the plaintiff for the specific purpose of enabling him to take his sick wife to a hospital for treatment. The bank attempted to appropriate a portion of the funds to satisfy an indebtedness claimed by the bank against the depositor. The court says:

"The evidence shows without dispute that the check for $200 was placed with the defendant upon the express agreement and understanding that, after paying certain specifically named debts, the remainder would be repaid to the plaintiff on the following day, or whenever called for to enable him to take his wife to the hospital for needed treatment. Upon money so received, no lien attached in favor of the bank, and its attempt to appropriate the same was wholly without right or authority. Upon such a record plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover."

[375] In the case of Dolph v. Cross, 153 Ia. 289, 133 N. W. 669, a depositor made a deposit for the special purpose of meeting checks which he had already issued.

The special conditions were explained to the bank at the time the deposit was made. The court held that this special arrangement did not create the relation of debtor and creditor, but "that the right of the check holders, for whose benefit it was deposited, was superior to that of the garnishing creditor." See also Hutchinson v. National Bank of Commerce, 145 Ala. 196, 41 So. 143; Montagu v. Pacific Bank, 81 Fed. 602; Covey v. Cannon, Citizens' Bank, etc. Co. 122 Tenn. 164, 122 S. W. 245, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 484, 135 Am. St. Rep. 869, 19 Ann. Cas. 483; McBride v. American R. etc. Co. 60 Tex. Civ. App. 226, 127 S. W. 229.

We are of the opinion that appellant's claim should be treated as a trust fund, and that she should have been awarded a preference. The question here presented will not be so important to depositors secured under the new bank guaranty act.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE.

In the reported case it appeared that the depositor of a check informed an officer of the bank that the deposit was for the specific purpose of paying a certain claim, and refused to allow it to be credited on either of her two regular deposit accounts. A receipt was given for the deposit, designating it as "Sp. Dept." It is held that the deposit was a special one, so that title thereto did not pass to the bank. The distinction between a general and a special deposit is discussed in the note to Fogg v. Tyler, Ann. Cas. 1913E 41.

PEOPLE

v.

ELLIOTT ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—April 20, 1916.

272 Ill. 592; 112 N. E. 300.

Trial — Objection to Evidence — General Objection — Sufficiency.

A general objection to an offer of the record of the election in the town on the proposition of it becoming anti-saloon territory is insufficient.

Intoxicating Liquors — Local Option Election — Proof of Result — Record Book.

Under Anti-Saloon Territory Act (Laws 1907, p. 297), § 7, providing that the clerk shall record in a well-bound book, to be kept in his office by himself and his successor, the result of the vote on the proposition of the political subdivision becoming anti-saloon territory, and such result may be proved by such record or by the official certificate of the clerk, and, where it shows that a majority of the votes were "yes," it shall be prima facie evidence that the political subdivision has become anti-saloon territory, it is not necessary to make such record proof that it be shown that it was in the exclusive possession of the clerk.

Criminal Law — Proof of Venue — Sufficiency.

The venue is proved on a prosecution for selling liquor in the town of D., anti-saloon territory, by testimony that witness knew defendant E. and his place of business, a certain number on a certain street, and that it is in said town; all the testimony relating to sales by defendants and their bartenders in that place of business.

Witnesses — Examination — Stopping Irrelevant Cross-examination.

Further cross-examination about the height of the fence is properly stopped; witness having testified that he saw the deliveries of beer at defendants' place of business through a gap in the fence.

Same.

Cross-examination, which has gone beyond reasonable limits, of a witness, who has testified to seeing cases of beer delivered at defendants' place of business, and the name "Leisy Beer" on the cases, is properly curtailed when an effort is made to ascertain the extent of his education, by asking him to spell "Leisy."

Appeal and Error — Matters Not Shown by Record.

Alleged errors in rulings on evidence may be disregarded; the rulings and objections not being shown by the abstract.

Evidence — Identification of Person — Pointing Out Person Referred to.

Witnesses testifying to sales of liquor, but not knowing the name of the person selling, may be allowed to point to the one or the other of defendants as the person.

Witnesses — Examination — Leading Questions.

Questions asking witnesses on prosecution for illegal sales of liquor, whether they ever had occasion to visit defendants' place of business, and if they saw defendants there, merely directing their attention to the matter being tried, are not suggestive or leading in any proper sense.

Intoxicating Liquors — Prosecution — Evidence — Sales by Bartender.

Testimony of sales at the bar by persons other than defendants, who had charge of the premises and managed the business, such other persons acting as bartenders, is competent; all being guilty as principals.

Trial — Reception of Evidence — Refusal to Allow Offer of Proof.

For the court, when defendants' counsel made an offer of proof, to suggest to him that the proper way was to ask questions and let the court rule on them is right and proper, and not an act of partiality or unfairness.

Intoxicating Liquors — Instructions — Held Applicable.

Instructions as to giving away liquor, or other shift or devise to evade the liquor law, and sales by servant, are held under the evidence applicable to the case.

Evidence of Illegal Sale — Sufficiency.

Evidence, on a prosecution for sale of liquor in anti-saloon territory, is held to be sufficient to support the conviction.

Sentence and Punishment — Cruel and Unusual Punishment.

The provision of Const. U. S. Amend. 8, against imposition of excessive fines, and infliction of cruel and unusual punishment, does not apply to state legislation, but is restricted exclusively to the federal government, its courts and officers.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The provision of the state's Bill of Rights, § 11, that "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense"—that is, that the penalty prescribed for an offense shall be in proportion to the nature of the offense—is directed to the lawmaking power.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

There must be a clear violation of the provision of the state's Bill of Rights, § 11, that "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense," to warrant holding a statute invalid as contravening it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That sentences are for both fine and imprisonment, as authorized by statute, is a matter in the court's discretion.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

It is the penalty prescribed by a statute for a single offense, and not the aggregate of punishments inflicted for several offenses of the same character joined in one indictment, on all of which there was a conviction, which bears on the question of the penalty being proportioned to the nature of the offense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A punishment authorized by statute is never held cruel or unusual or not proportioned to the nature of the offense unless it is a barbarous one unknown to the law, or so wholly disproportionate to the nature of the offense as to shock the moral sense of the community.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

If the penalty prescribed by statute is not proportionate to the offense, the law is void; and the evil cannot be cured by a mere modification on appeal of the sentence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The penalty prescribed by Anti-Saloon Territory Act (Laws 1907, p. 297) for sale of liquors in anti-saloon territory, a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $100, or imprisonment for not less than ten days nor more than thirty days, or both, is clearly not disproportioned to the nature of the offense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The statute prescribing as a penalty for sale in anti-saloon territory a fine of from $20 to $100, or imprisonment from ten to thirty days, or both, being valid, sentences for the minimum fine and imprisonment on each of seventy-one counts are not invalid as imposing cruel and unusual punishment because of the aggregate.

Review of Sentence.

Sentences on a number of counts being within the terms of a valid statute, the judgment cannot be reversed because the appellate court would have imposed less severe sentences, and considers them unnecessarily severe for the accomplishment of the purposes of the statute.

Form of Sentence — Conviction on Several Counts.

The correct method for sentencing one on several counts is not for a total time of imprisonment in gross, but for a specified time under each, the time under the second to commence when the first ends, and so on to the last; and it is not enough to state that the sentences shall run consecutively or successively.

Criminal Law — Review — Error in Sentence — Remand for Sentence.

There being no error, except in the imposition of the sentences, the case will be remanded for proper sentences.

Error to Appellate Court, Third District.

Criminal action. Michael Elliott et al., indicted for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor. Defendants convicted in Circuit Court, Macon county: WHITFIELD, Judge. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Court. Defendants bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

J. C. Lee and Fred Hamilton for plaintiffs in error.

P. J. Lucey, Jesse L. Deck, George P. Ramsey and Charles F. Evans for defendant in error.

[594] CARTWRIGHT, J.—Michael Elliott and Otho Jennings, plaintiffs in error, and James Howe and Richard Smith, were indicted in the circuit court of Macon county for selling intoxicating liquor in the town of Decatur, alleged to be anti-saloon territory. There were seventy-one counts in the indictment, the first seventy being for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor and the seventy-first for keeping a place where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully sold. James Howe and Richard Smith were not apprehended, but Michael Elliott and Otho Jennings, the plaintiffs in error, were tried and found guilty on each of the seventy-one counts. Judgment was entered by the court on the verdict, sentencing each of the plaintiffs in error to pay a fine and to imprisonment in the county jail under each count. The record was removed to the Appellate Court for the Third District by a writ of error, and the judgment having been affirmed, the record has been brought to this court by writ of error.

Taking up the questions raised by counsel for plaintiffs in error, not in the order of their argument but in the order of the events occurring on the trial, the first alleged error to be noticed is that there was no proper proof that the town of Decatur was anti-saloon territory. A witness testified that he was town clerk of the town of Decatur; that [595] he had in his office the record of the election in the town upon the proposition "shall this town become anti-saloon territory;" that the result of the election was found on certain pages of said record, which was then produced; that the record was a well-bound book and the entry the original record, and the signature at the bottom of the page where the result was recorded was the genuine signature of the town clerk. The record showed a majority of 1745 for the proposition, and being offered in evidence it was objected to and the objection overruled. The abstract shows merely a general objection, without specifying its nature, but counsel say in argument that the objection was a lack of proof that the record was in the exclusive possession of the town clerk. The general objection was without force, and if the objection had been as now stated in the argument there was no error in overruling it, since the proof was full and sufficient under the requirements of section 7 of the act in reference to anti-saloon territory. (Laws of 1903, p. 164.) The town of Decatur became anti-saloon territory on May 7, 1914, and the indictment was returned on October 12, 1914.

The next alleged error is that the venue was not proved. On that question the abstract shows the testimony of a witness who said that he knew the defendant Michael Elliott and his place of business at No. 245 East Main street, and as to its location he testified as follows: "It is in the town of Decatur, county of Macon, State of Illinois." All the testimony related to sales by defendants and their bartenders in that place of business. The venue was proved.

It is alleged that the court made several erroneous rulings in the introduction of evidence. A witness whose place of business was near the premises of the defendants testified that, with the exception of two or three weeks when Elliott was away, there was hardly a day when there were not twenty or thirty cases of beer hauled to the back door of the defendants' place of business and taken inside. [596] During a prolonged cross-examination, covering twenty-five pages of the record, it appeared that there was a division fence about six feet high between the place of business of the witness and the defendants' premises, in which there was an opening about eight feet wide. The court stopped further cross-examination about the height of the fence because the witness had said that he saw through the gap in the fence. The same witness said that he saw the name "Leisy Beer" on the cases, and the court sustained an objection when the witness was asked to spell the name Leisy. The cross-examination went beyond all reasonable limits, and the court did not err in curtailing it when an effort was made to ascertain the extent of the witness' education. These objections and rulings are not shown by the abstract and the alleged errors might have been disregarded for that reason, but we have taken the statement of counsel as to what occurred. Some witnesses testified to sales but did not know the name of the person selling the liquor. The court allowed such witnesses to point out the person making the sale, and they pointed to one or the other of the defendants, which counsel say was an error of the court. They give no reason for their claim and we do not think of any. It is further contended that error was committed in allowing leading questions to be put to the witnesses. The questions were of this nature: Witnesses were asked whether they ever had occasion to visit the place of business of the defendants and if they saw the defendants in that place. The questions merely directed the attention of the witnesses to the matter being tried and they were not suggestive or leading in any proper sense. It is contended that the court erred in admitting testimony of sales made at the bar by persons other than the two defendants on trial. The defendants had charge of the premises and managed the business and the other persons were acting as bartenders. All were guilty as principals. (Stevens v. People, 67 Ill. 587; Johnson v. People, 83 Ill. 431.) The proof [597] that the defendants were assisted by others in selling the liquor was competent. There was no error in any ruling on the evidence.

In the argument counsel denounce the trial as a farce and criticise the trial judge as partial and unfair. Counsel have a right to make any fair criticism of a judge concerning matters shown by the record but they have no right to make unjust accusations not borne out by the record and when made they do not tend to advance the cause which they are intended to serve. The rulings on the trial were fair and impartial. A fair sample of matter complained of is, that when the counsel for the defendants made an offer of proof the judge suggested to him that the proper way was to ask questions and let the court rule on them. The court was right.

It is urged that the court erred in giving instructions to the jury, and the material objection is that the instructions stated the statutes relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, including the giving away or delivering liquor or other shift or devise for the purpose of evading the law, sales by a clerk or servant, and the provision of the criminal code as to accessories. The objection is that many of these provisions were not applicable to any evidence. The defendants had bartenders who made sales as clerks or servants of the defendants. One witness called for ginger ale and was served with whisky, (which is a favorite shift or device,) and one witness who did not buy liquor but helped to unload liquor was given a glass of whisky in exchange for his labor. The instructions were applicable to the case and stated the law in the language of the statutes. There was no error in ruling on the instructions.

It is contended that the evidence did not support the verdict, but that is not so. The evidence introduced by the People was uncontradicted. The defendants occupied premises at No. 245 East Main street, in the city of Decatur. Near the front of the room there was a cigar case, back [598] of which the bar extended. The back part was partitioned off, and there was a door to the saloon which was kept locked. The defendant Elliott was usually at the cigar case and when customers came they would knock on the door. Elliott looked them over, and if he thought it safe to admit them he pulled a string, which unlocked the door and admitted them to the bar, where both defendants and the bar-tenders served them with beer or whisky. If some person came to the door who was not regarded as a safe customer Elliott would tell him to get out,—that there was "nothing doing;" and if an undesirable person got into the bar-room and was detected or one was doubted he was not permitted to have any liquor. Whenever one came to the door, either Elliott at the cigar case or some person who came from behind the bar would inspect him and admit him or not, as it was considered safe or unsafe. More than one hundred sales of intoxicating liquors were directly proved, and witnesses who bought liquor testified that there were large numbers of persons lined up at the bar, drinking or standing there and talking, and one witness said he had seen fifty or sixty people drinking there at different times. Elliott would not sell to one witness, saying he would not take any more chances on him, and there is neither any question about the guilt of the defendants nor that they were convicted on only a portion of the offenses committed against the law.

It is argued that the punishment inflicted upon the defendants was cruel, unusual and excessive, in violation of the constitution of the State of Illinois and the constitution of the United States. The constitution of the United States provides that excessive bail shall not be required nor excessive fines imposed nor cruel nor unusual punishments inflicted. But that provision does not apply to legislation by the States. It is restricted exclusively to the Federal government, its courts and officers. (Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 U. S. (L. ed.) 672; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 166, 8 S. Ct. 21, 22, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 80; In re Kemmler, [599] 136 U. S. 436, 10 S. Ct. 930, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 519; McDonald v. Com. 173 Mass. 322, 53 N. E. 874, 73 Am. St. Rep. 293; 12 Cyc. 963; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 961.) Our constitution does not contain that provision, but the provision of our bill of rights is, "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense." The provision is directed to the law-making power, which alone can determine what act shall be regarded as criminal and how they shall be punished. The provision requires that the penalty prescribed for a criminal offense shall be in proportion to the nature of the offense, and while it is incumbent upon the courts to maintain and give effect to the constitutional requirement, there must be a clear violation of the provision to justify holding an act invalid. An act was held in violation of the constitutional provision which provided for forfeiture of franchises of a railroad company on account of discrimination on its part. (Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. People, 67 Ill. 11, 16 Am. Rep. 599.) On the other hand, laws and ordinances imposing penalties quite severe in their nature have been held not to violate the constitutional requirement. (Chicago, Pac. R. Co. v. People, 217 Ill. 164, 76 N. E. 368; People v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 246 Ill. 474, 92 N. E. 934.) In the case of Arcola v. Wilkinson, 233 Ill. 250, 84 N. E. 264, the city of Arcola by ordinance imposed a penalty of $200 for each offense of selling intoxicating liquor, and it was held the penalty was not disproportionate to the nature of the offense. The Criminal Code prescribes imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than five years nor more than twenty years for the crime of burglary. The legislature enacted a statute providing for an indeterminate sentence, which should be a sentence for the maximum term in every instance, and this court held that such a sentence was not disproportionate to the offense. (People v. Illinois State Reformatory, 148 Ill. 413, 36 N. E. 76, 23 L.R.A. 139.) The penalty prescribed by the legislature for the sale of liquor in anti-saloon territory is a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $100, or imprisonment in the [600] county jail for not less than ten days nor more than thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the court. The sentences against the defendants were for both fines and imprisonment on each count, which was a matter resting within the discretion of the court and authorized by the law. If the statute was valid the punishment was not disproportionate to the nature of the offense. There was no reason whatever for any leniency toward the defendants, who were knowing and willful violators of the law. The only reason that the fines aggregate a large sum and the imprisonment is for a long period is because there were so many violations of the law prosecuted under one indictment, but the punishment under each count must be considered by itself. The State may join misdemeanors of the same character in the same indictment and the court may fix separate punishment upon each count on which there is a conviction. (Borschenious v. People, 41 Ill. 236; Kroer v. People, 78 Ill. 294.) This practice has been approved by this court rather than to require separate indictments for each offense. The constitutional provision does not apply in any manner to the aggregate of the punishments inflicted for different offenses. In the case of State v. O'Neil, 58 Vt. 140, 2 Atl. 586, 56 Am. Rep. 557, the defendant was found guilty of 307 offenses of selling liquor. The punishment was $6140, made of $20 for each offense, and one month's imprisonment. It was contended that the sentence violated a constitutional inhibition of cruel and unusual punishment and excessive fines. The court said that if the defendant had subjected himself to severe punishment it was because he had committed a great many offenses; that it would scarcely be competent for a person to assail the constitutionality of a statute prescribing a punishment for burglary on the ground that he had committed so many burglaries that if punishment were inflicted for each he might be kept in prison for life, and that the mere fact that cumulative punishments may be imposed for different offenses in the same prosecution was not material.

[601] If section 11 of the bill of rights, requiring that penalties shall be proportionate to the offense, is equivalent to a prohibition against cruel or unusual punishments, courts have never held a punishment authorized by the legislature to be either cruel or unusual or not proportioned to the nature of the offense unless it was a barbarous punishment not known to the law or so wholly disproportionate to the nature of the offense as to shock the moral sense of the community. It was held in People v. Whitney, 105 Mich. 622, 63 N. W. 765, that the statute providing a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $200, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than twenty days nor more than six months, for the first offense of an illegal sale of liquor, and for every subsequent offense a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and imprisonment in the State's prison for not less than six months nor more than two years, did not impose excessive fines nor cruel and unusual punishments. Punishment for violation of the Local Option law of Missouri by a fine of $300 and imprisonment for 365 days is not cruel and unusual. (Ex p. Swann, 96 Mo. 44, 9 S. W. 10.) A fine and costs amounting to $4000, which would cause imprisonment for twelve years for non-payment, is not a cruel and unusual punishment. (Ex p. Brady, 70 Ark. 376, 68 S. W. 34.) Also in the following cases the punishment was held not cruel and unusual: Two years in the county jail. (State v. Dowdy, 145 N. C. 432, 58 S. E. 1002.) A fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than ninety days nor more than one year, or both, for an illegal sale by a druggist. (Luton v. Palmer, 69 Mich. 610, 37 N. W. 701.) A fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, and imprisonment in the county jail not less than sixty days nor more than six months, for an illegal sale. (State v. Becker, 3 S. D. 29, 51 N. W. 1018.) A maximum term of imprisonment for one year and a fine of $300, and on failure to pay the fine, imprisonment not to exceed three years. (State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt. 134, 28 Atl. 1089.) A fine of $300 and ninety days [602] in the county jail for an illegal sale. (State v. Barnes, 3 N. D. 319, 55 N. W. 883.) A fine of not less than $50 nor more than $250, and imprisonment in the county jail for not less than six nor more than twelve months, for entering a place where liquor is sold, except a drug store. (State v. Woodard, 68 W. Va. 63, 69 S. E. 385, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1004.) A fine of $500 and a sentence to work on the streets for thirty days. Loeb v. Jennings, 133 Ga. 796, 18 Ann. Cas. 376, 67 S. E. 101.

If the punishment prescribed by the legislature for the illegal sale of liquor is not proportionate to the offense the law itself is void because prohibited by the bill of rights and no punishment at all can be inflicted for the offense. In such a case the vice is in the law itself, and the law being void, the sentence cannot be modified on appeal so as to remove the objection or make the law valid. (Weems v. U. S. 217 U. S. 349, 19 Ann. Cas. 705, 30 S. Ct. 544, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 793.) In view of the decisions of other courts, and especially of the decisions of this court in Arcole v. Wilkinson, supra, that a penalty of $200 for each unlawful sale is not disproportionate to the nature of that offense, and in People v. Illinois State Reformatory, supra, that a sentence for the maximum term of imprisonment for any offense is not disproportionate to the nature of the offense, it is clear that the statute under which the defendants were sentenced does not infringe the constitutional provision. The statute prescribing a penalty for unlawful sales of liquor is valid, and the validity of the sentences is not affected by the fact that there were numerous violations and cumulative penalties. The statute being valid and the sentences within its terms, the judgment cannot be reversed on the ground that this court would have imposed less severe sentences, but we regard the sentences as unnecessarily severe for the accomplishment of the purposes of the law.

So far as the fines are concerned, the sentences were correct under the rule of Borschenious v. People, supra, where it was held that such a judgment is a several judgment upon [603] each count of the indictment. Objection is made to the sentences on the ground that the term of imprisonment on each count should have been so fixed that the imprisonment on the several counts should commence at the expiration of each succeeding term. The sentence as to imprisonment of each defendant was, that he should be confined in the county jail of Macon county for a period of ten days on each of the first seventy counts and a period of twenty days on the last or seventy-first count and that the jail sentences should run consecutively, making a total of 720 days in jail. The rule established by this court is, that where a defendant is sentenced upon different indictments or different counts of the same indictment, the correct method of entering judgment is not for the total time in gross but for a specified time under each count, the time under the second to commence when the first ends, and so on to the last. (Mullinix v. People, 76 Ill. 211; Stack v. People, 80 Ill. 32; Fletcher v. People, 81 Ill. 116.) No particular form is required to constitute a judgment. (Wells v. Hogan, Breeze, Ill. 337; Foster v. Jared, 12 Ill. 451; Minkhart v. Hankler, 19 Ill. 47.) The provision that the sentences shall run consecutively is equivalent to providing that they shall run successively, but the rule heretofore stated is, that it shall be expressly stated in the sentence that one shall begin at the expiration of the previous one. There was no error in the record up to the imposition of the sentence, and it is beyond question that the court intended to sentence each of the defendants to imprisonment in the county jail for separate terms of ten days on each of the first seventy counts and twenty days on the seventy-first count. As there was no error except in the imposition of the sentence, the cause should be remanded for a proper sentence, as was done in Johnson v. People, supra. In that case there was an indictment containing twenty-four counts for selling liquor to minors and there was a verdict of guilty on twenty-two counts. The court, in sentencing the defendant, fixed the day and hour when [604] the imprisonment should commence upon each count upon which the defendant was found guilty. The court said that contingencies might arise which would render it impracticable to carry such a judgment into effect, and one had actually arisen in that case by granting a supersedeas. The court stated the correct method of entering the judgment, and having found no error up to the time the sentence was pronounced, reversed the judgment and remanded the cause, with a direction that the court enter a proper judgment on the verdict.

The judgments of the Appellate Court and circuit court are reversed and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with leave to the State's attorney to move for, and direction to the court to enter, a judgment in accordance with the rule established by this court as above stated.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

What Is Cruel and Unusual Punishment.

Introductory.

The earlier cases dealing with the question what is cruel and unusual punishment are collected in the notes to Weems v. U. S. 19 Ann. Cas. 705, 725, and In re Miller, 64 Am. St. Rep. 376. It is the purpose of this note to review the recent decisions passing on the question.

General Rules.

The reported case is in accord with the earlier authorities in holding that the term cruel or unusual punishment as used in a constitution means only a mode of punishment which is not known at law, or is of such a cruel or barbarous character as to shock the moral sense of the community. Thus, in Davis v. Berry, 216 Fed. 413, it was held that to subject a prisoner to an operation of vasectomy was cruel and unusual punishment. The court said: "The sole purpose of the operation is to destroy the power of procreation. The operation as originally performed was that of castration. In the twelfth century Henry II declared it treason for any person to bring over any mandate from the Pope or anyone in authority in church affairs. This he made punishable as to secular clergymen by the loss of their eyes and by castration. . . . There is a difference between the operation of castration and vasectomy: castration being physically more severe than the other. But vasectomy in its results is much the coarser and more vulgar. But the purpose and result of the two operations are one and the same. When Blackstone wrote his Commentaries he did not mention castration as one of the cruel punishments, quite likely for the reason that with the advance of civilization the operation was looked upon as too cruel, and was no longer performed. But each operation is to destroy the power of procreation. It is, of course, to follow the man during the balance of his life. The physical suffering may not be so great, but that is not the only test of cruel punishment; the humiliation, the degradation, the mental suffering are always present and known by all the public, and will follow him wheresoever he may go. This belongs to the Dark Ages. . . . It is somewhat difficult to define with precision what is cruel and unusual punishment in the constitutional sense. . . . No doubt delegates to the conventions, in providing against cruel punishment, had largely in mind what Blackstone had then recently written, in volume 4, page 376, such as being drawn or dragged to the place of execution, embowelling alive, cutting off the hands or ears, branding on the face or hand, slitting the nostrils, placing the prisoner in the pillory, the ducking, the rack, and the torture, and, as in Spanish countries, crucifying. In a very few states of the Union the whipping post has been retained as a constitutional mode of punishment. But it will be found that the courts in those states have construed the statute thus imposing such punishment in the light of their history, and what has been done and was being done at the time of the adoption of their constitution. No one can doubt but that under our present civilization if castration were to be adopted as a mode of punishment for any crime, all minds would so revolt that all courts without hesitation would declare it to be a cruel and unusual punishment. As we understand it, castration was never inflicted after the revolution of 1688. So that if, as some now contend, it is now competent for a legislature to impose such punishment as existed by the common law, the validity of the statute providing for castration could not be upheld because that punishment was one imposed back of the time of the common law as, generally speaking, it comes down to us. . . . While it is true that there are differences between the two operations of castration and vasectomy, and while it is true that the effect upon the man would be different in several respects, yet the fact remains that the purpose and the same shame and humiliation and degradation and mental torture are the same in one case as in the other. And our conclusion is that the infliction of this penalty is in violation of the constitution which provides that cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted." Compare State v. Feilen, 70 Wash. 65, Ann. Cas. 1914B 512, 126 Pac. 75, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 418.

In State v. Longino, 109 Miss. 125, 67 So. 902, it was held that to subject a person to imprisonment for receiving money on deposit while in an insolvent condition, when such act had been declared not in violation of the code in a previous case, was cruel and unusual punishment within the constitutional sense even though the decision in the original case had been subsequently reversed. The court said: "It occurs to us that the punishment of an act declared by the highest court of the state to be innocent, because the same court had seen fit to reverse its interpretation of a statute, would be the very refinement of cruelty; it is certainly unusual because no precedent can be found for its infliction; that it is unjust is perfectly obvious."

A statute which fixes a minimum but no maximum punishment is not invalid as imposing cruel or unusual punishment, because no maximum punishment is prescribed State v. Blake, 157 N. C. 608, 72 S. E. 1080; Franklin v. Brown, 73 W. Va. 727, 81 S. E. 405, L.R.A.1915C 558. So in Hamilton v. State, 68 Tex. Crim. 363, 153 S. W. 134, it was held that a provision in the penal code that "any person who shall wilfully injure any railroad, locomotive engine, or tender, or baggage, passenger or freight car of any railroad in this state, so as to prevent the use of same, shall be punished by fine in any sum not less than one hundred dollars, and imprisoned in the county jail not less than three nor more than twelve months," was not unconstitutional because it provided no maximum punishment, the court saying: "The said article is not unconstitutional on either ground of appellant's contention. When we contemplate the great destruction of property and of human life that may be caused by such acts as are denounced by said article of our code, we can well understand why the legislature made no limit of the maximum of the fine that may be imposed in such a case."

Where the trial judge imposes a sentence within the limits fixed by law it is not properly subject to review on the ground that it is extreme or oppressive. Rogers v. State, 11 Ga. App. 814, 76 S. E. 366; Harper v. State, 14 Ga. App. 603, 81 S. E. 817. See also State v. Schaft, 166 N. C. 407, Ann. Cas. 1916C 627, 81 S. E. 932; Thacker v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. 294, 136 S. W. 1095.

Application of Rules.

MODE OF PUNISHMENT.

The death penalty is not per se a cruel and unusual punishment. Dutton v. State, 123 Md. 373, Ann. Cas. 1916C 89, 91 Atl. 417 (for rape). Nor does the imposition of a fine in addition to the death penalty constitute crime and unusual punishment. Jenkins v. State, 22 Wyo. 34, 134 Pac. 260, 135 Pac. 749.

Vasectomy has been held to be a cruel and unusual punishment. Davis v. Berry, 216 Fed. 413, quoted in the preceding subdivision of this note. See the note to State v. Feilen, Ann. Cas. 1914B 512.

Transferring an inmate of a reformatory to a state prison to serve the remainder of his term therein is not cruel or unusual punishment where an act relating to the management of a reformatory permits such transfers to be made for disciplinary purposes. Stagway v. Riker, 84 N. J. L. 201, 86 Atl. 440, wherein the court said: "Whether under such circumstances continuance of the comparatively mild restraint of the reformatory, or a ticket of leave upon parole, or confinement in a hospital for the sick, or in an asylum for the insane, or in the state prison, as in the case at bar, shall be the disciplinary means to be adopted in aid of the discipline which is intended to reform the criminal tendency, are questions, the consideration of which the legislature has reposed in a duly organized commission, intrusted with this beneficent public work. We cannot say, therefore, from an inspection of the mere record here, that what these commissions have ordered done was of such an unusual character in its application to this prosecutor, as to be subject to the charge of cruel and unusual punishment."

AMOUNT OF PUNISHMENT.

Assault.—In Robinson v. State, 66 Tex. Crim. 138, 145 S. W. 345, it was held that a jail sentence of ninety days and a fine of $50 for an assault on a woman was not cruel or unusual punishment where the facts disclosed that appellant, with others, had taken the woman from her bed at night, stripped her, and administered a whipping. In Jobe v. State, 76 Tex. Crim. 216, 173 S. W. 1025, a penalty of two years imprisonment and a fine of $500 for wife beating was sustained. In Kinkaid v. Jackson, 66 Fla. 378, 63 So. 706, it was held that an act of the legislature imposing imprisonment not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding $500, on one who commits an assault and battery, is not such cruel or unusual punishment as to violate the constitutional provision.

Burglary.—A sentence of not less than fifteen years or more than thirty years upon one found guilty of burglary is not cruel or unusual punishment. People v. Mire, 173 Mich. 357, 138 N. W. 1066, wherein the court said: "The punishment prescribed in the act in question is imprisonment, a most common or usual method of punishment the world over. The claim that it is cruel and unusual must of necessity be directed, not to its nature, but to its limits of time, 'not less than fifteen years nor more than thirty.' That class of cruel and now unusual punishments at one time sanctioned and prevalent under the common law of England, such as burning at the stake, drawing and quartering, mutilation, starvation, and lesser forms of physical torture, to which the constitutional prohibitions were primarily directed, is not involved here. Approaching the dividing line, the inquiry as to what does in any particular case constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the constitutional provisions turns, not only upon the facts, circumstances, and kind of punishment itself, but upon the nature of the act which is to be punished."

Contempt of Court.—A fine of $500 for contempt of court and an order remanding the prisoner to the custody of a United States marshal until paid is not so excessive as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. In re Maury, 205 Fed. 626, 123 C. C. A. 642. But in Ex p. Karlson, 160 Cal. 378, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1334, 117 Pac. 447, and in Brannon v. Com. 162 Ky. 350, 172 S. W. 703, L.R.A.1915D 569, it was apparently considered that an unlimited imprisonment for failure to pay a fine imposed for contempt would violate the constitutional provision in question. In People v. Seymour, 272 Ill. 295, 111 N. E. 1008, affirming judgment 191 Ill. App. 381, it was held that a fine of $50 against an attorney for contempt of court was not cruel and unusual punishment.

Homicide.—To impose a fine in addition to a sentence of death for murder in the first degree is not cruel or unusual punishment. Jenkins v. State, 22 Wyo. 34, 134 Pac. 260, 135 Pac. 749, wherein the court said: "It was suggested in the brief that the judgment provided cruel and unusual punishment. The statute applies uniformly throughout the state to all in like condition as the defendant, and the punishment provided does not fall within any class forbidden by the constitution as cruel or unusual but as commensurate with the crime of which defendant was found guilty. The legal punishment consists of two separate and distinct things, and the imposition of the fine in addition to the death penalty was not cruel nor unusual."

Imprisonment for Debt.—Imprisonment in the county jail for nonpayment of a debt, until the debt is paid, is not cruel or unusual punishment, where the statute provides that, imprisonment for such an offense is not to exceed two years, the convict being able to secure his release at the expiration of the term whether the debt is paid or not. Ex p. McInnis, 98 Miss. 773, 54 So. 260. See also Tatlow v. Bacon, 101 Kan. 26, 165 Pac. 835.

Keeping Disorderly House.—A provision in the Crimes Act of New Jersey that the penalty for keeping a disorderly house shall be a fine of not less than $1000 or more than $5000 and imprisonment for not less than one year or more than five years has been held not to be unconstitutional as imposing cruel and unusual punishment. State v. Griffin, 84 N. J. L. 429, 87 Atl. 138, affirmed 85 N. J. L. 613, 90 Atl. 259, wherein the court said: "Counsel further contends that the sixty-fifth section of the Crimes Act is unconstitutional because it provides a cruel and unusual punishment. He contents himself merely with the assertion, making no attempt to show us that it rests on any solid foundation. He can hardly mean that punishment by fine and imprisonment for the commission of a crime is either cruel or unusual within the meaning of the constitution, for almost every violation of the criminal law may be so punished under our criminal code except treason and murder in the first degree, and in fact is a kind of punishment common in all civilized countries. If he means that the amount of the fine or the length of the term of imprisonment makes the punishment cruel and unusual, the answer is that the power to declare what shall and what shall not be deemed to be a crime, to determine the maximum and minimum of the fine or of the term of imprisonment to be imposed as a punishment for a crime so declared, is one which is committed by the people of the state to the legislative, and not the judicial, branch of the government. The fact that the legislature provides a punishment for a given crime more severe than the courts approve affords no ground for judicial interference; for such interference would be nothing more nor less than an attempted usurpation of legislative power by the judiciary. It is the character and not the extent of the punishment inflicted as a penalty for the commission of crime which is struck at by the constitutional provision appealed to." See also Palmer v. Lenovitz, 35 App. Cas. (D. C.) 303 (fine not exceeding $1000 or imprisonment not exceeding five years or both); State v. Gilbert, 126 Minn. 85, 147 N. W. 953 (abatement law providing for closing of building).

Larceny.—A provision that a person shall be sentenced from one to five years for the theft of poultry of the value of two dollars or upwards does not impose cruel and unusual punishment. Fry v. Com. 166 Ky. 670, 179 S. W. 604, wherein the court said: "Appellants devote a considerable portion of their brief to a comparison of the punishments prescribed by statute for other offenses, with that prescribed for the offense of stealing fowls of the value of two dollars or more; but, as we view it, but little profit is derived from a consideration of the matter of punishments upon that basis. Penal statutes are enacted in an effort to discourage the perpetration of the offenses denounced therein. The punishment that will tend to deter, in respect of one crime, must necessarily differ from that which will deter in respect of another. The offenses of perjury, false swearing, subornation of perjury, grand larceny, and feloniously breaking into a warehouse and others denounced by statute may be considered of higher grade than that of the stealing of fowls of the value of two dollars or more, but that does not constitute good reason why the penalty for the latter should not be equal to the penalty for the other offenses mentioned, if such a penalty is found to be necessary to deter persons from the commission of the offense of stealing fowls. The punishment may have the appearance of being severe, but we are not inclined to say that it is clearly or manifestly cruel or in contravention of the constitutional guaranty relied upon and asserted by appellants." In Daugherty v. State (Ark.) 197 S. W. 576, a punishment of ten years in the state penitentiary for the larceny of a buggy, harness and horse was held not to be cruel or unusual punishment under a statute providing a maximum penalty of fifteen years imprisonment for the larceny of a horse, though the penalty for grand larceny under the general statutes was not less than one year or more than five years. See also People v. Clancy, 163 App. Div. 614, 148 N. Y. S. 977.

Nonsupport of Wife.—A sentence to hard labor in a penitentiary or reformatory not exceeding two years together with a provision for the appropriation of the wages of the convict to the support of his wife is not such excessive punishment for nonsupport as to be termed cruel or unusual. State v. Gillmore, 88 Kan. 835, 129 Pac. 1123, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 217.

Rape.—The penalty of death for the crime of rape is not cruel or unusual punishment. Dutton v. State, 123 Md. 373, Ann. Cas. 1916C 89, 91 Atl. 417, wherein the court said: "It is also alleged that the judgment and sentence in this case impose a cruel and unusual punishment, and also that the sentence imposed is out of proportion to the crime charged in the indictment, and too severe a penalty for said crime. The facts proven in the case are not presented by the record, but we cannot hold that the penalty authorized by the statute to be imposed for such a crime is in violation of the constitutional provisions. Article 16 of the Declaration of Rights of our present constitution declares that 'No law to inflict cruel and unusual pains and penalties ought to be made in any case or at any time hereafter,' and Article 25 is, 'That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unusual punishment inflicted by the courts of law.' It would hardly be contended that the punishment provided by our statute for the crime of rape—death or confinement in the penitentiary for not less than eighteen months, or more than twenty-one years—is in conflict with those provisions, and when the legislature changed the penalty, for an attempt to commit the crime, to death or confinement in the penitentiary, in the discretion of the court, it is probable that it took into consideration the fact that it is often difficult to prove whether the crime of rape was actually consummated. Under some circumstances the outrage upon the particular woman and upon society can scarcely be said to be less because the prisoner did not succeed in accomplishing his purpose than if he had. If a revolting crime of this nature is so frequently repeated as in the judgment of the legislature to call for such punishment, we cannot declare it to be contrary to such provisions of the constitution." See State v. Feilen, 70 Wash. 65, 126 Pac. 75, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 418, and note to case as reported in Ann. Cas. 1914B 512 as to asexualization for rape.

Robbery.—Imprisonment in the state penitentiary for life, for the crime of robbery, where the minimum punishment is fixed at five years and there is no maximum punishment prescribed, is not cruel or unusual. Franklin v. Brown, 73 W. Va. 727, 81 S. E. 405, L.R.A.1915C 558, wherein the court said: "The main ground, indeed the only ground, on which petitioners rely to obtain their discharge, is that our statute, which prescribes only minimum penalties, and leaves it within the power of the court to pronounce judgment of imprisonment for life, a 'cruel and unusual punishment,' is void, contravening section 5, of article 3, of our Constitution, providing among other things against 'cruel and unusual punishment,' and that 'penalties shall be proportioned to the character and degree of the offense.' We deem it quite unnecessary to enter upon any extended discussion as to what is meant by 'cruel and unusual punishment,' interdicted by the Constitution; and by that other clause thereof respecting what penalties may be imposed. These questions were elaborately and ably gone into by Judge Brannon in State v. Woodward, 68 W. Va. 66. As said in that case, the clause, cruel and unusual punishment, originally occurring in the Bill of Rights of 1688, was there inserted as a provision against cruel judgments like those inflicted in the days of the tyrant Stuarts, and which found its way naturally into our Constitution, and into the constitutions of most of the states. But Judge Brannon says it refers only to punishments of such cruel character as he there describes, and was not intended as a limitation on the general powers of the legislature to say what are offenses and to prescribe punishments therefor. Robbery, from the earliest times, has always been regarded a crime of the gravest character. At common law the punishment for robbery was death, with or without benefit of clergy, according to varying statutes. 4 Sharswood's Blackstone, 243. Now by statute the punishment for robbery in England is penal servitude for life. 9 Laws of England (Earl of Halsbury) 664, section 1333. While the punishment inflicted on petitioners in this case is the same as prescribed in the English statute, the extreme limit under our statute, our law allows a lesser punishment and down to the minimum punishment prescribed. The statutes of the different states vary greatly in regard to the punishment prescribed for robbery. In Virginia the statute prescribes death if accomplished with violence in certain ways, or, in the discretion of the jury, not less than eight nor more than eighteen years; if committed in any other mode, a maximum and minimum imprisonment is prescribed, not less than five nor more than ten years. The indictment does not charge petitioners with having committed the offense 'being armed with a dangerous weapon;' but we do not know what aggravating circumstances, if any, may have been shown on the trial, justifying imprisonment for life. . . . As said, however, the evidence is not before us, and we have no means of knowing the aggravating facts and circumstances, if any, justifying the punishment. However, as the statute prescribes only minimum penalties for both forms, leaving it to the court to say what the punishment shall be, we cannot say, in view of the law and facts presented, that the judgment is violative of the constitution and void." See also State v. Lee, 166 N. C. 250, 80 S. E. 977 (nine years and six months labor on the county roads).

Sale of Lottery Tickets.—A statute fixing the punishment for selling lottery tickets at imprisonment for not less than two years and a fine of not less than $500 or more than $1000 is not in violation of either the state or federal constitutions. Schroufe v. Com. 141 Ky. 554, 133 S. W. 206.

Taking Usury.—A statutory provision that any person who shall loan money at a greater rate of interest than fifteen per cent per annum shall be imprisoned for not more than six months or fined not more than $1000 or both is not unconstitutional. State v. Griffith, 83 Conn. 1, 74 Atl. 1068.

Use of Mails for Fraudulent Purpose.—Imposing a fine of $1000 for each letter sent through the mail for fraudulent purposes in addition to a five years' sentence of imprisonment is not cruel or unusual punishment. Badders v. U. S. 240 U. S. 391, 36 S. Ct. 367, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 706. See also Mounday v. U. S. 225 Fed. 965, 140 C. C. A. 93.

Violation of Fish or Game Law.—In State v. Blake, 157 N. C. 608, 72 S. E. 1080, it was held that a provision in the Public Laws prescribing a minimum but no maximum punishment for permitting pointer dogs to run at large during the closed season for quail, was not in violation of the provision in the North Carolina constitution forbidding cruel and unusual punishments. And in People v. Anderson, 30 Cal. App. 542, 159 Pac. 211, it was held that a fine of $500 for illegal fishing was not cruel or unusual punishment.

Violation of Liquor Law.—A statute imposing a fine of not less than $150 or more than $400 for soliciting orders for intoxicants in dry territory is not in violation of the constitutional provision forbidding excessive fines or cruel and unusual punishments. Hayner v. State, 83 Ohio St. 178, 93 N. E. 900. An act of the legislature imposing a tax on operators of a cold storage plant, where intoxicating liquors are stored, in prohibition territory, does not violate the constitutional provision against cruel and unusual punishment when the tax so imposed is double the amount required of operators in license territory. Ex p. Flake, 67 Tex. Crim. 216, 149 S. W. 146. A fine of $200 imposed on the holder of a wholesale liquor license for failure to submit samples of certain liquors to the secretary of state for inspection is not cruel or unusual punishment. State v. Burlington Drug Co. 84 Vt. 243, 78 Atl. 882. A provision that any person who drinks intoxicating liquors on a train shall be fined not less than twenty-five or more than one hundred dollars or imprisoned in the county jail for not less than thirty or more than one hundred days, or both, is not such a fine or imprisonment as to amount to cruel and unusual punishment within the constitutional provision. Tarantine v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 254 Ill. 624, Ann. Cas. 1913B 1058, 98 N. E. 999. A fine of $150 for each offense of selling without a license is not unusual or excessive. Russell v. State, 19 Wyo. 272, 116 Pac. 451. And see the reported case. In Bracy v. Com. 119 Va. 867, 89 S. E. 144, it was held that a jail sentence of thirty days for selling intoxicating liquors without a license was not cruel or unusual punishment.

In Brinkley v. State, 125 Tenn. 371, 143 S. W. 1120, a statute providing that the holder of a federal license in prohibition territory should be punished for each day that he was unlawfully in possession of it was held not to be valid, the court saying: "Plaintiff in error, in taking out the federal license authorizing him to retail malt liquor, was not seeking to redress any wrong done him in his person or property, nor was it in furtherance of his right to pursue an occupation guaranteed him under the law. The license was taken with full knowledge upon his part that the act of paying the fees, or being in possession of the stamp, would raise a presumption sufficient to support a conviction of crime under the laws of this state. While the license would protect him against the federal government in the pursuit of the occupation authorized by it under the laws of that government, it at the same time brought him into direct conflict with the laws of this state, and created a presumption that he was violating the law against the sale of intoxicants. The mere fact that he might be indicted, fined, and punished for each day that he was in possession of the license does not make the fines excessive, or the punishment cruel and unusual. The conditions which produce the fines and punishments are created by his act alone. A fine and imprisonment for a single offense under this statute is not claimed to be excessive, or cruel and unusual. Whether there should be other fines and imprisonments is wholly within the power of plaintiff in error. Therefore, if the continued violation of this law should result in excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishments, it is not the act of the government, but is the voluntary act of plaintiff in error."

Miscellaneous.—A provision imposing a fine of not less than $100 or more than $5000 on a corporation for violation of the banking act of Alabama is not so cruel or unusual as to violate the provisions of the constitutions of the United States or the state of Alabama. Standard Home Co. v. Davis, 217 Fed. 904. Imprisonment for failure to give a bond for good behavior is not an infliction of cruel or unusual punishment within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Ex p. Glass (W. Va.) 93 S. E. 1036. A statute providing that those operating motor vehicles not their own in a reckless and negligent manner shall be subject to a penalty of from two to five years imprisonment does not authorize cruel or unusual punishment. Singleton v. Com. 164 Ky. 243, 175 S. W. 372. In Ontai v. U. S. 188 Fed. 310, 110 C. C. A. 288, it was held that a maximum punishment of imprisonment for two years and a fine of $500, for one who knowingly purchased property from a soldier is not a cruel or unusual punishment. In State v. Shaft, 166

N. C. 407, Ann. Cas. 1916C 627, 81 S. E. 932, it was held that a fine of one thousand dollars and imprisonment for three years for inducing a woman to take a drug to procure a miscarriage was not in violation of the constitutional inhibition, the court saying: "The defendant excepts to the judgment of the court on the ground that it imposed a cruel and an unusual punishment, and relies upon the case of State v. Lee, 166 N. C. 250, 80 S. E. 977. That case is no authority in support of the defendant's contention. The statute in this case prescribes the punishment to not less than one year nor more than ten years, and a fine in the discretion of the court. The sentence in this case is much below the limitation prescribed by law."

The infliction of a severer punishment on one twice convicted of crime than for a first offense, is not cruel or unusual punishment or in violation of the constitutional provision. Graham v. West Virginia, 224 U. S. 616, 32 S. Ct. 583, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 917.

TIMBERLAKE.

Ohio Supreme Court—November 21, 1916.

95 Ohio St. 21; 116 N. E. 43.

Loan Brokers — Chattel Loans — Validity of Regulation.

Chattel loans on mortgage security or otherwise, the rate of interest on such loans, and the ways and means of assigning wages, are proper subjects for the exercise of the police power by the general assembly of the state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Section 6346—1 et seq., General Code (106 Ohio Laws, p. 281), is a constitutional exercise of police power by the general assembly of Ohio. The provision in section 6346—2 of said act, in so far as it relates to the revocation of a license issued pursuant to the act, is reserved for future consideration in cases in which such question may properly be raised.

[See note at end of this case.]

Constitutional Law — Nature and Scope of Police Power.

The "police power" in effect sums up the whole power of government, and all other powers are only incidental and ancillary to the execution of the police power; it is that full, final power involved in the administration of law as the means to the administration of practical justice.

Error to Court of Appeals, Hamilton county.

Habeas corpus proceeding. Herman Wessell, relator, and Charles L. Timberlake, defendant Judgment for defendant in Common Pleas Court. Judgment affirmed by Court of Appeals. Plaintiff brings error. AFFIRMED.

[21] On September 17, 1915, plaintiff in error, Herman Wessell, was arrested by a constable. Charles L. Timberlake, charged with violation of Section 6346-1, General Code (106 O. L., 281) in that said Wessell "did on or about the 17th day of September, 1915, in the county of Hamilton and state of Ohio, unlawfully" etc., engage and continue in the business of making loans on plain notes [22] at a charge or rate of interest in excess of eight per cent per annum, without a license.

On the same date Wessell was brought before the common pleas court of Hamilton county on a writ of habeas corpus, and the sole ground upon which it was sought to have him released was the alleged unconstitutionality of the law under which he was arrested.

On April 28, 1916, the common pleas court, by its judgment entry, declared this law valid, and on May 3, 1916, the judgment of the common pleas court was duly affirmed by the court of appeals. Proper exceptions were taken by plaintiff in error to the judgments rendered.

The only questions to be discussed are those which pertain to the validity of the provisions of the act known as the "Loan Law," which act is as follows:

"Sec. 6346-1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, partnership, association or corporation, to engage, or continue, in the business of making loans, on plain, endorsed, or guaranteed notes, or due bills, or otherwise, or upon the mortgage or pledge of chattels or personal property of any kind, or of purchasing or making loans on salaries or wage earnings, or of furnishing guarantee or security in connection with any loan or purchase, as aforesaid, at a charge or rate of interest in excess of eight per centum per annum, including all charges, without first having obtained a license so to do from the superintendent of banks and otherwise complying with the provisions of this act.

[23] "Sec. 6346-2. Any person, firm, partnership, corporation or association desiring to obtain a license, shall apply therefor, under oath, on forms prescribed by the superintendent of banks; and by paying annually to the superintendent of banks, a license fee in the sum of one hundred dollars, shall be entitled to obtain a license, which license fee shall include the entire cost of inspections, for a period of one year. The said license shall be issued by the superintendent of banks, and shall expire the first day of March, next following the date of its issuance, except that the fee of one hundred dollars herein provided shall be apportioned for that part of the year 1915 remaining after the date when this act shall become law, but thereafter no abatement of said charge shall be made if licensees are issued for less than one year, and no other or further license fee shall be required from any such licensee, by the state or any municipality nor shall any fees or charges be collected under section 736 of the General Code. Every such license and bond hereinafter provided for shall be renewed annually on the first day of March in each year. No license shall be granted to any person, firm, partnership, corporation or association unless, and until, such applicant shall, in writing, and in due form, to be first approved by and filed with the superintendent of banks, appoint an agent, a resident of the state of Ohio, and county where his office is to be located, upon whom all judicial and other process, or legal notice, directed to such applicant may be served; and in case of the death, removal from the state, or any legal disability or disqualification of any such [24] agent, service of such process or notice may be made upon the superintendent of banks. The said superintendent of banks may revoke any license, if the licensee, his officers, agents, or employees shall violate any of the provisions of this act. Whenever, for any cause, such license is revoked, said superintendent of banks shall not issue another to said licensee until the expiration of at least one year from the date of revocation of such license. Every such applicant shall execute and file a bond to the state of Ohio in the penal sum of two thousand dollars with the superintendent of banks, to be approved by him, for the faithful observance of all provisions of this act. Any person claiming to be injured by a violation of this act by a licensee may maintain an action on said bond.

"Sec. 6346-3. Application for a license shall state fully the name or names, and address, of the person or corporation, and of every member of the firm, partnership, or association authorized to do business thereunder, and the location of the office or place of business in which the business is conducted; and in the case of a corporation, shall also state the date and place of its incorporation, the name and address of its manager for the period for which the license is issued, and the names and addresses of its directors for the period for which the license is issued, and the name and address of the agent as provided in section 6346-2 of this act. Such license shall be kept posted in a conspicuous place in the office where the business is transacted. No person, firm, partnership, corporation or association so licensed, shall transact or solicit business under any [25] other name. Not more than one office or place of business shall be maintained under the same license. But in case of removal, the superintendent of banks, may, on application, endorse thereon a transfer to the new place of business, with the date of transfer, and from the time of such endorsement, the new place so designated shall be deemed the place designated in the license.

"Sec. 6346-4. The superintendent of banks shall, either personally, or by such person or persons as he may appoint for the purpose, at least once a year, and oftener, if he deems it advisable, investigate the business and affairs of every such licensee, and for that purpose shall have free access to the vaults, books and papers thereof, and other sources of information with regard to the business of such licensee and whether it has been transacted in accordance with this act. Said superintendent of banks, and every examiner appointed by him, shall have authority to examine, under oath or affirmation, any person whose testimony may relate to the business of any such licensee or alleged violation herein.

"Sec. 6346-5. No such licensee or licensees shall make a loan or purchase or furnish guaranty, or security, as hereinbefore provided at a greater total charge, including interest, than three per cent per month; except that on loans that do not exceed fifty dollars in amount, in whatever manner made payable, an inspection fee of not to exceed one dollar may be collected at the time the loan is made, when such loan is made for a period of not less than four months; and such inspection fee shall not [26] be imposed upon the same borrower for any new or additional loan made within four months after such charge has been imposed. Said three per cent per month shall not be paid in advance and shall be computed on unpaid monthly balances, without compounding interest or charges. No bonus, fees, expenses, or demands of any nature whatsoever, other than said inspection fee and said total charge of three per cent per month (which shall include interest) as hereinbefore provided, shall be made, paid, or received, directly or indirectly, for such loans, purchases or furnishing guaranty or security, wage assignments or advancements except court costs upon the actual foreclosure of the security or upon the entry of judgment. Nothing in this act shall apply to pawn brokers who obtain a municipal license as provided in sections 6337 to 6346, inclusive, of the General Code or to national banks or to state banks or any person, partnership, association or corporation whose business now comes under the supervision of the superintendent of banks. No charge or fee shall be made unless the loan is actually made. A copy of this section shall be furnished each borrower at the time the loan is made.

"Sec. 6346-6. Every person, firm, partnership, corporation or association licensed as herein provided, shall give to the assignor, borrower, or pledger, a statement upon which shall be written in ink, typewritten or printed, the name of the licensee making such loan or purchase, name of the assignor, borrower or pledger, the amount of the loan, the rate or amount of interest charged, the [27] date when the loan is made, and the date when payable; and shall also give the assignor, borrower, or pledger, a receipt for each payment of principal or interest.

"Sec. 6346-7. No assignment of any salary, wages or earnings, or any part thereof given to secure a loan shall be valid unless the same shall be in writing, signed in person by the person making the same; and if such person is married and living with husband or wife, signed also by the husband or wife of such person, as the case may be. Nor shall any such assignment be valid unless the same shall be in writing and made to secure a debt contracted simultaneously with the execution of such assignment, with all blank spaces therein filled in with ink or typewriting, together with the date, names of the assignor and assignee, the amount for which such assignment is made, together with the rate of interest charged.

"The term assignment as used in this section shall include every instrument purporting to transfer an interest in or any authority to collect the wages, salary or earnings of such person. Any assignment of wages, salary or earnings, made in accordance with the provisions of this section shall bind the wages, salary or earnings earned or to be earned by the assignor until the loan secured by such assignment and interest thereon is fully paid, but no assignment or conveyance of wages, salary or earnings to be earned in the future given to secure a loan shall be binding for a sum in excess of fifty per cent of the amount due or to become due the person making such assignment.

[28] "In order to obtain a priority of any such assignment over any other assignment, the holder thereof, shall deposit a true copy with the recorder of the county where the person making such assignment, if a resident of the state, resides, or if not a resident of the state, then with the recorder of the county where such assignment is made, together with a sworn statement by the holder, his agent, or attorney, of the amount due, and the rate of interest charged. All such assignments shall be filed and preserved by the recorder as provided in section 8562 of the General Code. When so deposited, any such assignment shall have priority over any other assignment subsequently deposited as herein provided.

"Every such assignment so filed shall be void as against other assignments to creditors of the person making it after the expiration of one year from the filing thereof, unless within thirty days next preceding the expiration of said period of one year a true copy thereof, together with a sworn statement by the holder thereof, his agent or attorney, of the amount then due and rate of interest charged is refiled with the county recorder as herein provided.

"A sworn copy of such assignment so filed together with a statement of the amount due filed with any employer of the assignor shall bind not exceeding fifty per cent of any salary, wages or earnings due or to become due such assignor from the time the same is filed with such employer until any such loan and interest is fully paid and discharged.

[29] "Sec. 6346-8. Any person, firm, partnership, corporation or association, and any agent, officer or employee thereof, violating any provision of this act, shall for the first offense be fined not less than fifty dollars nor more than two hundred dollars and for a second offense not less than two hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, and imprisoned for not more than six months. The superintendent of banks upon such second conviction shall revoke any license theretofore issued to such person, firm, partnership, corporation or association. Any instruments taken in connection with the transaction upon which the conviction is made, shall be illegal, void and of no effect, and it shall then be the duty of the superintendent of banks to so notify the borrower in writing. Any charge of interest paid in excess of that provided herein may be recovered by the payor in an action at law.

"Sec. 6349-9. The superintendent of banks shall enforce the provisions of this act, make all reasonable effort to discover alleged violators, notify the proper prosecuting officer whenever he has reasonable grounds to believe that a violation has occurred, act as complainant in the prosecution thereof, aid such officers to the best of his ability in such prosecution, and make a separate report to the governor at the end of each fiscal year. The superintendent of banks shall employ the assistant or assistants necessary, in his judgment, to make the investigation and inspection provided for in this act.

[30] "Sec. 6346-10. Any licensee, or licensees, who holds a license under the provisions of sections 6346-1, 6346-2, 6346-3, 6346-4, 6346-5, 6346-6 and 6346-7, of the General Code, inclusive, which has not yet expired, and who shall present his license for cancellation to the superintendent of banks herein, shall receive therefor a credit in the amount of ten dollars, and the superintendent of banks shall credit the same upon the license herein.

"Section 2. Should any section or provision of this act be decided by the courts to be unconstitutional or invalid, the same shall not affect the validity of the act as a whole or any part thereof, other than the part so decided to be unconstitutional.

"Section 3. That original sections 6346-1, 6346-2, 6346-3, 6346-4, 6346-5, 6346-6 and 6346-7 of the General Code, inclusive, and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby repealed."

Miller & Foster for plaintiff in error.

Edward C. Turner, Hanby R. Jones, George B. Okey, Hugh Huntington, E. G. Lloyd, John J. Chester and Albert M. Calland for defendant in error.

WANAMAKER, J.—It is claimed that the foregoing statute, known as the "Loan Law," violates the following provisions of the Constitution of Ohio:

Section 1, Article I. "All men . . . have certain inalienable rights, among which are those [31] of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property."

Section 16, Article I. "All courts shall be open and every person, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law."

It is further claimed that this act violates the provisions of Section 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which reads in part:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Plaintiff in error in his brief gives the following bill of particulars as a basis for the claim of unconstitutionality:

(a) "It gives authority to the superintendent of banks to revoke a license if the licensee violates any of the provisions of this act."

(b) "The superintendent of banks is made the sole and final judge as to whether or not any violation has taken place. There is no provision for an appeal to the courts or otherwise."

(c) "There is nothing to prevent the bank superintendent from holding an unfair and ex parte hearing, and in fact, he would not have to hold any hearing at all, but could arbitrarily revoke the license."

(d) That the exemptions and classifications provided for in such statute are arbitrary and unreasonable, [32] and therefore deny due process of law and the equal protection of the laws.

The chief case relied upon by plaintiff in error to sustain his contentions is Geiger-Jones Co. v. Turner, as found in a lengthy opinion of the United States district court, reported in the Ohio Law Reporter under date of April 17, 1916, 14 Ohio L. Rep. 135, 230 Fed. 233.

It must be conceded that if that judgment and opinion correctly interpreted the various constitutional provisions involved, and correctly applied them to the statute in question that judgment and the reason therefor would apply in the case at bar and demand a reversal of the judgments below; for, in the main, the alleged grievances in the so-called "Blue Sky Law" are substantially the same as the alleged grievances in the "Loan Law."

Since the submission of this case to this court, and prior to the preparation of this opinion, the United States supreme court has reviewed the decision in the Geiger-Jones case and, with but one judge dissenting, has reversed said judgment. Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co. 242 U. S. 539, Ann. Cas. 1917C 643, 37 S. Ct. 217. The reversal is clear and comprehensive on practically all the various grounds set forth in the opinion of the United States district court.

The opinion of the supreme court of the United States is very illuminating upon many of the questions involved in this case.

If the loan-act statute be a constitutional exercise of governmental power, it is conceded that it is so [33] by virtue of what is known as the police power of the state.

Definitions of police power, giving with precision its latitude and longitude with exactness, have not been attempted by any courts. It is wise that it is so, because this, like many of the subject-matters of the law, is constantly in the process of evolution and development, and must be adapted to the social, industrial and commercial conditions of the times.

The police power in effect sums up the whole power of government. All other powers are only incidental and ancillary to the execution of the police power. It is that full, final power that is involved in the administration of law as a means to the administration of practical justice.

Mr. Justice Day in a well-considered opinion has discussed the police power at some length. His views are helpful in this case.

In Sligh v. Kirkwood, 237 U. S. 52, 35 S. Ct. 501, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 835, at page 58, he discusses the nature and scope of this power in the following language:

"The limitations upon the police power are hard to define, and its far-reaching scope has been recognized in many decisions of this court. At an early day it was held to embrace every law or statute which concerns the whole or any part of the people, whether it related to their rights or duties, whether it respected them as men or citizens of the state, whether in their public or private relations, whether it related to the rights of persons or property of the public or any individual within [34] the state. New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 139 [9 U. S. (L. ed.) 648]. The police power, in its broadest sense, includes all legislation and almost every function of civil government. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 [5 S. Ct. 357, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 923]. It is not subject to definite limitations, but is coextensive with the necessities of the case and the safeguards of public interest. Camfield v. U. S. 167 U. S. 518, 524 [17 S. Ct. 864, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 260]. It embraces regulations designed to promote public convenience or the general prosperity or welfare, as well as those specifically intended to promote the public safety or the public health. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 592 [4 Ann. Cas. 1175, 26 S. Ct. 341, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 596]. In one of the latest utterances of this court upon the subject, it was said: 'Whether it is a valid exercise of the police power is a question in the case, and that power we have defined, as far as it is capable of being defined by general words, a number of times. It is not susceptible of circumstantial precision. It extends, we have said, not only to regulations which promote the public health, morals, and safety, but to those which promote the public convenience or the general prosperity. . . . And further, "It is the most essential of powers, at times the most insistent, and always one of the least limitable of the powers of government."' Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U. S. 137, 142 [Ann. Cas. 1914B 192, 33 S. Ct. 76, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 156, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1123]."

The title of the original loan act is as follows:

"To regulate and license the loaning of money upon chattels or personal property of any kind and of purchasing or making loans upon salaries or wage earnings." (102 O. L., 469.)

[35] In the main, so far as it applies to the case before us, it is an act to prevent usury.

The right to regulate the rate of interest by law is as old as government itself.

"The taking of interest for the loan of money, or at least taking excessive interest, has been regarded with abhorrence from the earliest times. We are told that such usury was prohibited by the early laws of the Chinese and Hindus, and by the Koran." 39 Cyc. 889.

Moses announces it as follows:

"If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury." Exodus XXII, 25.

Originally the word "usury" applied to all rates of interest. Later it was applied only to illegal or excessive rates of interest.

It is significant that Abraham Lincoln in 1832, when he was but twenty-three years of age, in a campaign for the general assembly of Illinois, declared in an open circular to the people of his county that usury was then an obnoxious practice in the state of Illinois and that he stood for a law against it.

Legislation against usury has been recognized by all the leading nations of the world from time almost immemorial. Excessive or usurious rates of interest assessed or charged against the poor and needy, against those whose small incomes are too often wiped away by illness, enforced idleness or financial reverses, have been vigilantly denounced by the laws of all lands.

[36] It would seem now too late to challenge the constitutionality of such legislation upon the ground that it is a denial of the right of property or liberty of contract.

The right of property, or liberty of contract with reference to property, is by our own constitution made "subservient to the public welfare." Where, therefore, a statute seeks to accomplish such purpose as prevention of usury, such statute is clearly within the police power of the state of Ohio under the provisions of both the state and federal constitutions, unless some part of the machinery for its administration may violate some provision of state or federal constitution.

It is, however, suggested, from the title of the act, that the statute and the various sections thereof do not constitute a regulation of interest rates, but really undertake to regulate business, indeed to prohibit the same, and as such are a denial of the right of property—the taking of property without due process of law.

While the right of a state to regulate business, trade or occupation is of much later recognition and development than the right to regulate the rate of interest, it nevertheless is equally well settled to-day, that, in the interest of the public welfare, business, trades and occupations may be so regulated as to prevent extortion, fraud, restraint, monopolistic control of products or prices, and so on.

Whether or not the business of chattel loans is fairly within the police power of the state is no longer an open question in Ohio. This court in [37] Sanning v. Cincinnati, 81

Ohio St. 142, 90 N. E. 125, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 686, in the first paragraph of the syllabus in that case, has stated the generally accepted doctrine:

"The state may, in the exercise of the police power, license and regulate chattel mortgage and salary loan brokers; and it may delegate authority to do so to municipal corporations."

So it matters not whether the purpose of the statute be the regulation of a business or the denouncement of usury; in either event the paramount purpose of the statute is within the legal exercise of the police power of the state.

We come now to consider the second question as to whether or not the plans and provisions of the statute for the promotion of such purposes are a legal exercise of such police power.

The legal machinery provided by the statute for the enforcement of its provisions obviously must be operated by some officer or board. The statute designates the superintendent of banks as such officer. He grants the license provided for by the act, and agreeable to the act may revoke a license. He is merely the executive of the state for the enforcement of the statute, and the presumption surely is that he would exercise his discretion fairly and justly in accordance with the purpose, terms and spirit of the act.

No serious claim is made that the provisions of the statute relating to the granting of licenses are in any wise unconstitutional, particularly because of any broad discretion or arbitrary power lodged in such superintendent of banks touching the issuing of licenses. The statute in this respect practically [38] deprives him of the exercise of any discretion and recognizes him only as a ministerial officer.

Section 6346-2 provides for the application for such license, the payment of the fee of $100 therefor, and the term of such license. No complaint is made that the license fee is unreasonable, or that any of the provisions expressed in the statute for the issuing of the license are arbitrary or unreasonable.

But it is claimed that the classifications and exemptions made by the statute, as to those required and not required to obtain licenses, render the statute null and void; because, it is claimed, such do not give the petitioner the "equal protection of the laws."

Naturally questions of this character are more frequently before the United States supreme court, under the due-process and equal-protection-of-the-laws clauses of the 14th Amendment, than in any other court of last resort. That court has passed upon these questions very frequently and very recently in a number of celebrated and well-considered cases. One of the most recent cases is that of Rast v. Van Deman, etc. Co. 240 U. S. 342, Ann. Cas. 1917A 421, 36 S. Ct. 370, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 679, L.R.A.1917A 421, known as the Trading Stamp case.

Mr. Justice McKenna in his opinion in that case lays down the correct doctrine that has been generally followed by the United States supreme court, and most of the state courts. The lower courts in the trading stamp cases had held that the use of coupons, or trading stamps, was only a mode of legitimate advertising, and that no distinction [39] could be made as between business men who used such trading stamps and the business men who did not use such trading stamps.

Mr. Justice McKenna upon that point, at page 357, uses this language:

"The difference between a business where coupons are used, even regarding their use as a means of advertising, and a business where they are not used, is pronounced. Complainants are at pains to display it. The legislation which regards the difference is not arbitrary within the rulings of the cases. It is established that a distinction in legislation is not arbitrary, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, and the existence of that state of facts at the time the law was enacted must be assumed. Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 220 U. S. 61, 78, Ann. Cas. 1912C 160, 31 S. Ct. 337, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 369. It makes no difference that the facts may be disputed or their effect opposed by argument and opinion of serious strength. It is not within the competency of the courts to arbitrate in such contrariety. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549 [31 S. Ct. 259, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 328]; German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S. 380, 413, 414, 34 S. Ct. 612, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1011, L.R.A.1915C 1189; Price v. Illinois, 238 U. S. 446, 452, 35 S. Ct. 892, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1400.

"It is the duty and function of the legislature to discern and correct evils, and by evils we do not mean some definite injury but obstacles to a greater public welfare. Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U. S. 137, 142 [Ann. Cas. 1914B 192, 33 S. Ct. 76, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 156, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123]; Sligh v. Kirkwood, 237 U. S. 52, 59, 35 S. Ct 501, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 835. And, we repeat, 'it may make discriminations if founded on distinctions that we cannot pronounce unreasonable and purely arbitrary.' Quong Wing [40] v. Kirkendall, 223 U. S. 59, 62 [32 S. Ct. 192, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 350], and the cases cited above."

This same doctrine as to classifications and exemptions is reviewed and reaffirmed by Justice McKenna in the Geiger-Jones case, supra, where he quotes from the briefs of counsel for the Geiger-Jones Company, specifying a large number of discriminations urged against the statute wherein the statute undertakes to classify those who are within the statute and those who are exempt from the statute. Upon this question Justice McKenna says in 242 U. S. 556:

"We cannot give separate attention to the asserted discriminations. It is enough to say that they are within the power of classification which a State has. A State 'may direct its law against what it deems an evil as it actually exists without covering the whole field of possible abuses, and it may do so none the less that the forbidden act does not differ in kind from those that are allowed. . . . If a class is deemed to present a conspicuous example of what the legislature seeks to prevent, the Fourteenth Amendment allows it to be dealt with although otherwise and merely logically not distinguishable from others not embraced in the law.' Central Lumber Co. v. South Dakota, 226 U. S. 157, 160 [33 S. Ct. 66, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 164]. The cases were cited from which those propositions were deduced. To the same effect is Armour v. North Dakota, 240 U. S. 510, 517 [Ann. Cas. 1916D 548, 36 S. Ct. 440, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 771]."

This same doctrine is decisive of the case at bar [41] upon the matter of classifications and exemptions in the Loan Law act.

The chief objection to the act, and the most serious one, is that touching the revocation of the license. Section 6346-2 provides:

"The said superintendent of banks may revoke any license, if the licensee, his officers, agents, or employees shall violate any of the provisions of this act."

No provision is expressly made for any hearing before the superintendent of banks, or for any notice to the licensee as to such hearing, nor is any provision made for attendance of witnesses. Neither is there any provision made for any appeal or review of the action of the superintendent of banks touching any revocation of a license. Manifestly, if any licensee were found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act in a proper proceeding before a court of competent jurisdiction, such adjudicated violation would doubtless warrant the revocation of a license. But whether or not, independent of any such adjudication, the superintendent of banks is constitutionally authorized to revoke such license upon his own discretion, it is unnecessary here to determine. That question cannot be raised in this case.

Plaintiff in error has refused to apply for a license. He has ignored the act as a whole and refuses to recognize its force and effect as a whole. The question of the constitutional revocation of a license cannot be raised until a license has been first granted under the provisions of this act. Upon presentation of such case it will then be [42] proper for this court to consider and determine that question.

In so far as the act in question is involved in this case the same is held to be a valid act within the police power of the state and not prohibited by any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

A statute licensing and regulating persons engaged in making loans on chattel security is sustained in the reported case, the business being held to be one subject to the exercise of the police power. The earlier cases passing on state or municipal regulation of personal property loan brokers are reviewed in the note to Matter of Stephan, Ann. Cas. 1916E 617.

FROEMING ET AL.

STOCKTON ELECTRIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

California Supreme Court—December 7, 1915.

171 Cal. 401; 153 Pac. 712.

Negligence — Pleading — Several Inconsistent Charges of Negligence.

In an action for wrongful death of a street car passenger, it is proper to plead the negligence of the company as occurring in several inconsistent ways, in separate counts, and, if any are sustained by evidence, plaintiff can recover.

Carriers of Passengers — Action for Injury — Construction of Pleading.

In an action for wrongful death of a street car passenger, where the petition alleges that the decedent was injured "by starting the car while she was attempting to alight therefrom," the allegation is not an admission that decedent negligently alighted from a moving car, but only that she was ready to alight.

Contributory Negligence — Preparation for Alighting — Moving Car.

That a passenger on a street car went upon the platform or steps of the moving car preparatory to alighting does not alone show contributory negligence.

Guardians ad Litem — Allegation of Appointment.

In an action for wrongful death of a street car passenger by the guardian ad litem of minors, an allegation that the guardian was appointed guardian ad litem and was authorized to commence and prosecute the action, and that he accepted the appointment, though inartistic, was not bad as pleading a conclusion.

Same.

Where the petition in an action for the death of a street car passenger in setting forth the appointment of a guardian ad litem was defective, but the facts as to the appointment were fully shown, the error in overruling a demurrer to the petition is harmless.

Witnesses — Cross-examination Outside Scope of Direct Examination — Effect.

In an action for death of a street car passenger, where the plaintiff called defendant's conductor only to show that decedent was on the car at the time of the injury, and defendant in cross-examining him attempted to show contributory negligence, the plaintiff is not bound by such evidence, nor can his other evidence then be discarded, since by cross-examining the witness outside his direct testimony defendant made him his own witness and not plaintiff's.

Same.

On conflicting evidence, in an action for the death of a street car passenger, the question of recovery is for the jury, and must be submitted, although one of plaintiff's witnesses on cross-examination testified adversely to him on matters outside the direct examination.

Carriers of Passengers — Personal Injury — Evidence Sufficient.

Evidence in an action for the death of a street car passenger is held to be sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff.

Evidence — Res Gestae — Declaration of Street Railway Employee.

The self-serving explanation of a street car conductor as to how an accident happened, made after it occurred, is not res gestae and is inadmissible in an action for the death of a passenger.

[See 3 Ann. Cas. 624; 13 Ann. Cas. 859; Ann. Cas. 1915A 1040; 131 Am. St. Rep. 302.]

Trial — Remark by Judge.

In an action for the death of a street car passenger, it is not error for the court to advise defendant's attorney, in repeating a witness's statement, to give the witness an opportunity to say whether he so testified.

Guardians ad Litem — Order of Appointment — Admission in Evidence.

In an action for the death of a street car passenger, it is not error for the court to admit the order appointing a guardian ad litem on the fact of appointment but not on the truth of the matter alleged in the petition.

Judicial Notice — Mortality Tables.

It is not error to admit, without foundation, a standard table of life expectancy, in an action for the wrongful death of a street car passenger, since courts will take judicial notice of such a table.

[See note at end of this case.]

Witnesses — Impeachment — Prior Conflicting Statement — Necessity of Foundation.

Where, on cross-examining witnesses, their signed statements were produced and read to them with the design of impeachment, but with no preliminary foundation and without introducing the statements in evidence, the testimony so elicited is inadmissible, as is that of another witness who took the statements, since impeachment by prior conflicting statements of witnesses requires that a foundation be laid before admitting them.

Same.

Where, on proper foundation, testimony of a witness given at a coroner's inquest is read to him, and he denies its correctness, but no further effort is made to impeach him, the admission of the testimony read is not error.

Carriers of Passengers — Action for Injury — Instruction — Right of Passenger on Car Step.

In an action for death of a street car passenger, an instruction that, if a passenger is injured without fault on his part while on the steps of a moving car, the burden is on the company to show absence of negligence, is not erroneous for declaring that a passenger has a right to be on the steps of a moving car, since that is his right in entering and preparatory to leaving the car.

Presumption of Negligence from Injury.

An instruction that injury from the operation of a car raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the company, and that the burden is on the company to prove itself free from negligence and to show contributory negligence of the passenger, is correct.

Instructions — Negligence in Alighting from Moving Car.

An instruction that it is not, as a matter of law, contributory negligence for a passenger to start to leave a car before it stops, but that that is a question for the jury, is not misleading when the instructions read as a whole are correct.

Negligence — Instructions — Burden of Proof.

Under the rule that, where plaintiff's evidence establishes his contributory negligence, the burden of proving it is removed from defendant, an instruction merely that if the jury found "from the evidence" that plaintiff was contributorily negligent sufficiently indicates that all evidence, plaintiff's as well as defendant's, should be examined on that question.

Death by Wrongful Act — Damages — Excessiveness.

A verdict for $18,000 for the wrongful death of a street car passenger, who was married and left three girls of tender age, and a husband, and who was an accountant and aided her husband in figuring on contracts in his business, and was working to help maintain the home, is not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin county: PLUMMER, Judge.

Action by August Froeming et al., plaintiffs, against Stockton Electric Railroad Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Arthur L. Levinsky for appellant.
D. M. Young for respondents.

[403] HENSHAW, J.—Eva Froeming, traveling at night upon an electric street railway car of the defendant corporation in the city of Stockton, stepped, fell, or was thrown from the car, sustaining injuries which caused her death. Her husband and her minor children, through their father as guardian ad litem, brought their action to recover damages for that death. The verdict of the jury was in plaintiffs' favor. The judgment followed the verdict, and from that judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

Saving the conductor of the car, whose testimony is disputed, there was no eye-witness to the manner in which the deceased sustained her injuries. There was no doubt but that the deceased had signaled to the conductor to stop the car for the purpose of allowing her to alight. The place of stoppage would be at or upon the next street which the car was approaching—Eighth Street. There is no doubt either but that the motor-man of the car, under the conductor's signal, slowed his car for the purpose of making this stop. There is also no doubt but that the deceased arose from her seat, which was upon the open rear end of the car, and stood either upon the platform or upon one of the steps, in readiness to alight. But whether the car actually came to a stop and then suddenly, and without giving the deceased time to alight, lunged forward with a jerk, or whether after slowing down and coming almost to a stop it did this same thing, without actually stopping, plaintiffs' witnesses were in doubt. Wherefore plaintiffs charged in separate counts, one count alleging that the [404] car after stopping, suddenly started, the other count averring that after the car had slowed down and arrived near or at the place where it usually stopped to allow passengers to debark, and while the deceased was attempting to alight therefrom, the defendant's agents and servants negligently caused the car to be suddenly and violently jerked and started forward.

Appellant's attorney complains bitterly of the fact that the court overruled his demurrer to this complaint, but no more bitterly than he complains of every ruling, act, and happening at the trial. He complains that the counts are inconsistent, meaning by this that it could not be true that the deceased could both have been thrown from the car by a sudden jerk before it stopped and thrown from the car by a sudden jerk after it stopped. This is quite true. He supports his argument that the demurrer should have been sustained by showing that after the evidence of plaintiff had been taken at the trial the court granted his motion for a nonsuit as to the count charging upon the stoppage of the car. Therefore, he argues, if his demurrer had been sustained and plaintiffs had been put to their election, and had elected to stand upon the count charging that the car had been stopped, defendant would have prevailed in the action. But underlying this most specious argument is found the very reason why inconsistent counts are permitted. (Stockton Combined Harvester, etc. Works v. Glen Falls Ins. Co. 121 Cal. 167, 53 Pac. 565.) The result of appellant's success in having the demurrer sustained and the plaintiffs' unfortunate choice of counts in the election thus forced on them would have meant that it prevail in the action, but it would also have meant that the plaintiffs would have lost a meritorious cause of action and right of recovery through some over-refined principle of pleading. However, suffices it to say, that the principle which appellant invokes as existing does not exist. This was a single action for a recovery growing out of injuries negligently inflicted by defendant upon deceased. It was open to plaintiffs to charge this negligence in separate counts, as occurring in as many ways as they believed their evidence would show, and plaintiffs are entitled to recover if any one well-pleaded count was supported by sufficient evidence. (Jenson v. Dorr, 169 Cal. 742, 116 Pac. 553.) Again, appellant would have this court construe the language of one of the counts which is as follows, [405] "while the said Eva Froeming was attempting to alight therefrom," as containing an admission that Eva Froeming was actually and negligently in the act of alighting from a moving car. Such, however, is not the just import of the allegation, which means, fairly construed, that the car had slowed down and was approaching the place where it usually stopped, and that Eva Froeming had made her preparations to alight, and was in readiness to alight, when and if it stopped. The fact that she had gone upon the platform for this purpose, or even upon the steps, was not in and of itself negligence in law. (Boone v. Oakland Transit Co. 139 Cal. 490, 73 Pac. 243; Renfro v. Fresno City R. Co. 2 Cal. App. 317, 84 Pac. 357.) The complaint, after setting forth the names and ages of the minor children and establishing that they were under the age of fourteen, averred "that by an order of the court made on the 28th day of October, 1912, August Froeming was appointed their guardian ad litem and was by said order authorized to commence and prosecute this action in their behalf, and that he accepted said appointment." It is argued that the demurrer should have been sustained because this was not a due pleading of the appointing of a guardian ad litem, but that it was a pleading of the conclusion of the pleader. But even if these averments could have been drawn with more legal skill, suffice it to say that the overruling of the demurrer did not injure, and could not have injured, appellant, and the facts of the due appointment and acceptance by the appointee were shown without contradiction upon the trial. Certain ambiguities and uncertainties in the counts were also urged in the demurrer. Some of these it may be conceded exist. They were, however, of trivial character, and the overruling of the demurrer upon this account in no way confused or misled the defendant in its defense. The error was, therefore, immaterial. (Stein v. San Francisco United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663.)

The court granted appellant's motion for a nonsuit as to the count charging that the car had stopped. Appellant insists that it should have granted the nonsuit upon the whole action. The evidence of plaintiffs disclosed that Mrs. Froeming lived at or near Seventh Street; that she asked the conductor to stop the car when it was at or near Seventh Street; that she asked the conductor twice; that when the conductor signaled for the car to stop it had passed Seventh Street, and [406] its next usual stopping place was at or near Eighth Street; that Mrs. Froeming had been sitting in a rear seat in the back open end of the car. Immediately in front of her were two witnesses—Shoaf and his wife—and immediately in front of them a third witness, Anderson. They testified to the slowing down of the car—whether it actually stopped or not they were uncertain—to its sudden lunge and jerk forward, and to hearing the fall of a body, which they knew must be that of the woman they had heard ask the conductor to stop the car. The men testified that they immediately swung off the car while it was in motion and went to the rescue of the woman, finding her lying in the street unconscious. They testified further that after the conductor had signaled for the car to stop (the car was approaching the end of its run) the conductor went forward to read and record his register of fares, and was doing this, or was talking to the motorman, when the accident occurred. Walter Sanborn was called on behalf of plaintiffs and testified that he was the conductor of the car, and that Mrs. Eva Froeming was a passenger on his car about 10 o'clock in the evening when the accident occurred. On cross-examination he gave his version of the accident, which is as follows: After the car had passed Seventh Street Mrs. Froeming told him she desired to get off at Eighth Street. He signaled to the motorman to stop at Eighth Street. His car did not slow down for the purpose of letting Mrs. Froeming off and then start up suddenly with a jerk; nor yet did it stop for the purpose of letting her off. Mrs. Froeming deliberately alighted from the car when it was going about six or seven miles an hour. He saw her getting off the car and warned her to wait until it stopped, saying to her, "Lady, wait for the car to stop." She made no reply and stepped to the bottom step and then stepped off. He saw her fall and immediately swung off after her. Appellant's argument upon its motion for a nonsuit and the argument which it here addresses to this court is that plaintiffs were bound by this testimony, since they had called the conductor as a witness, and that if it be thought there is a conflict between this testimony and that of the other witnesses who did not actually see the occurrence, then the testimony of the other witnesses must be utterly discarded as incredible and unworthy of belief. The statement of appellant's position in this regard demonstrates its unsoundness. There was substantial [407] testimony before the trial court and before this court supporting plaintiffs' charge. It was not for the trial court upon the hearing of the motion for a nonsuit, nor yet for this court upon appeal, to cast out of consideration all of that evidence. It was the duty of the trial court to submit it, as it did, to the consideration of the jury, and the verdict of the jury establishes that they regarded it as trustworthy and true. What has been said touching the motion for a nonsuit sufficiently answers appellant's next contention, elaborately argued, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The argument here is based upon the same grounds as those above noted—the incredibility of plaintiffs' witnesses other than the conductor, who was not called by them to testify upon any of these matters, and the assertion that the plaintiffs must be bound by the testimony of the conductor, which testimony appellant itself brought out on so-called cross-examination. But as it was cross-examination on matters not touched upon in the testimony in chief, under familiar principles the appellant made the conductor its own witness upon these matters. For, as has been said, all that plaintiffs sought to elicit by their examination in chief of the conductor was the fact, not even in controversy, that Eva Froeming had been a passenger upon his car at the time of the accident.

We are asked to consider some sixty-three asserted errors in the reception and rejection of evidence. It would be profitless to review them all. Thus, exception is taken to the court's refusal to allow a witness to testify to what the conductor did and said after the accident, the purpose of the inquiry being to show that the conductor voiced some explanation as to how the accident occurred. The ruling was proper. Such ex post facto evidence forming no part of the res gestae and being usually self-serving is not admissible. Again, the court suggested: "Mr. Levinsky, allow me to suggest, when you repeat the witness' testimony, you give the witness a chance to state whether that was his testimony or not. I did not so understand his testimony." This remark, to which an exception was taken, is urged as error. The order appointing August Froeming guardian ad litem, offered in evidence, is objected to, amongst many others, upon the ground that the defendant cannot be bound by the allegation set forth in the petition for the appointment of guardian. The court properly admitted the order, limiting the admission with care [408] for the purpose of only showing the fact of appointment and not the truth of any of the matters contained in the petition. Exception to this is taken. These may serve as exemplars showing the inutility of a detailed consideration of all, for most of them are of the same general character. Of the few that merit consideration, one is the exception to the introduction of McCarty's Tables of Life Expectancy without a foundation being laid therefor. But courts take judicial notice of the standard tables of life expectancy, and so of course take judicial notice of the tables that are standard tables, and any such table satisfactory to the court may be introduced without foundation proof. (Valente v. Sierra R. Co. 151 Cal. 539, 91 Pac. 481.)

The three principal witnesses for the plaintiffs had each been interviewed by an emissary of the defendant, a notary public, who took down their statements in writing. These statements, after having been so taken down, were read to these witnesses. The witnesses were uncertain whether it could be said that they had sworn to these statements. They said they were asked whether they would swear to them, and replied that with certain corrections they would. They did not seem to understand that they had in fact sworn to them. Upon cross-examination of these witnesses these statements were produced and extracts from them read to the witnesses. Objections were from time to time interposed to the method of cross-examination, upon the ground that if it was sought to impeach the witness by showing contradictory statements, the proper foundation for the questions had not been laid. Complaint is made of the court's rulings upon this matter and of its further rulings against admitting the testimony of the witness for the defense who had taken down these statements. The court's rulings were to the effect that if it was designed to impeach the witness by showing that he had made contradictory statements embodied in the writing, the proper foundation therefor had not been laid. The attorney for the defendant is no novice at the bar, and needed no enlightenment as to the proper course to pursue in the matter. That he failed to pursue it, as unquestionably he did, forces the inference that the statements contained in the writing were not contradictory to the statements given by the witnesses upon the stand, and that the efforts of the attorney were directed to establishing the imputation and implication that [409] they were so contradictory rather than the fact that they were. Thus, to illustrate, witness Shoaf for plaintiff having testified upon direct examination that, while he could give no definite distance in feet, the car proceeded about three hundred feet after the accident before it came to a stop, he is asked upon cross-examination whether he did not make a statement to Mr. Breitenbucher and replied that he did, when the following took place:

"Q. Did you not in that statement say, the car went about one-half a block after the accident?

"A. (Witness.) I don't think you will find that in that statement.

"Q. Sir?

"A. I don't think you will find that in that statement.

"Q. You please read this language and see if I find it there or not. Read it, please. (Hands paper to witness.)

"A. Yes; that says 'half a block.'

"Q. Read what it says there 'the car,' start with that; what does it say?

"Mr. Young: Well, I submit that is not the way to testify, if your Honor please; if the counsel wants to introduce anything that contradicts him let him introduce it. We submit it is incompetent for him to read from the statement.

"The Court: The objection may be sustained.

"To which ruling counsel for defendant then and there duly excepted. Exception No. 6.

"Q. And you didn't say the car went about one-half a block after the accident, did you?

"A. That is what I said.

"Q. What is that?

"A. About half a block.

"Q. That is what you said in that statement on June 26th—the 26th of August, 1912, wasn't it?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, is your memory any better to-day than it was on August 26, 1912?

"A. Not that I know of.

"Q. How do you testify to-day that car went two or three hundred feet?

"A. Well, that is in the neighborhood of my judgment a half a block would be two or three hundred feet, one or the [410] other wouldn't make no difference to me; I didn't measure the ground; just simply offered it as—"

It is apparent that there could be no impeachment of the witness in this condition of the record. He admits that he used the language contained in his written statement and quite clearly explains it when he says that he regarded half a block as the equivalent of two or three hundred feet.

The same is true of a similar effort to impeach Mrs. Shoaf. She had testified concerning the accident that the car had not actually stopped, but "it did come to nearly a stop, so near—it was not stopped; but it came very near to it. It was not quite a stop, no, sir." Then upon cross-examination she was asked concerning the statement which she admitted that she made to Mr. Breitenbucher. The record discloses the following:

"Q. Did he not in that conversation ask you: 'How fast was the car going when Mrs. Froeming got off of the car;' and did you not answer him; 'I cannot state how fast the car was going at the time, but will state that I would not want to jump off while it was going at the rate it was?'

"A. (Witness.) No, sir. If I answered I misunderstood; he asked me if I understood him right, how far, or how fast was the car going after it started, after the lady fell off, and I said I would hate to get off at the rate it was traveling. If I remember right, that is it. If he asked me the other question, I didn't understand it that way.

"Q. Did you not tell him in that same conversation that the car was in motion when this lady fell off?

"A. I did say that the car had not come to a complete stop.

"Q. What is that?

"A. I did say that the car did not come to a complete standstill.

"Q. Did you tell him anything about a 'standstill'—it came to a standstill, in that conversation?

"Mr. Young: Now, one moment. We object to that, not the proper foundation for contradiction. We can't go into everything she told.

"The Court: That is true. Objection sustained.

"Q. Now, after having read that paper, did you not state to Mr. Breitenbucher on the twenty-sixth day of August, 1912, you, he, and Mr. Tretheway being present, and also the driver of the automobile, whether he was in the house or not I don't [411] know, that the car was in motion when she stepped off which was about twenty feet north of the street crossing; after the lady fell the car went about one-half a block after the accident? Did you tell that to him at that time?

"A. I say the car came very near to a standstill.

"Q. I haven't asked you that.

"A. I beg your pardon, I didn't understand the question.

"Q. Asking if you made this statement just read to you to Mr. Breitenbucher at that time?

"A. Well, I don't know that I worded it just that way. If I did I didn't understand it in that way, because I have always said that the car didn't come quite to a standstill. But the car started up—my idea of it, my understanding of what he said was when the car started to go on over across the street.

"Q. Did you tell him anything in that conversation about the car having—in the conversation that you had with Mr. Breitenbucher on the twenty-sixth day of August, 1912, did you tell him anything about the car having come to almost a stop?

"Mr. Young: We object to it as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, more particularly incompetent, to get out testimony in that way."

Here the witness affirmed and explained the matters contained in her written statement. She did not deny having said those things, but declared what she meant by them. When Mr. Breitenbucher was placed upon the witness-stand appellant's efforts were directed not to legitimate impeachment, but to an effort to show a valueless negative, that the witness did not make these explanations at the time he took down her statement. The court's rulings that this evidence was not legitimate evidence in impeachment were correct.

Witness McCann, motorman of the defendant's car, had testified to his having received the signal bell to stop his car at Eighth Street and that he proceeded so to stop it, slowing it down, and that he made no stop until the car had partially crossed Eighth Street, when he brought it to a standstill at its usual place of rest. Upon cross-examination the foundation of time, place, circumstances, and persons present being laid, he was asked if he did not testify at the coroner's inquest in certain language, and what purported to be his testimony was then read to him. He declared that such was his testimony save in one or two minor particulars, as that there [412] were four passengers upon the front of the car with him instead of three, and that the rear end of his car was not at the Eighth Street crosswalk, but farther into Eighth Street. Under these explanations no effort was made to impeach the witness by proving what in fact his testimony was at the coroner's inquest. We are unable to perceive and we have not been shown the error which appellant asserts was embodied in the ruling permitting plaintiff's attorney to ask the question concerning the testimony which the witness had given at the coroner's inquest.

The jury was ably and painstakingly instructed by the court. Instruction 2 is in the following language:

"It is the duty of a street railway company to afford a reasonable time for its passengers to alight from its cars at the place where the car stops for that purpose, and if a passenger is injured without fault on his part, while on the steps of a car slowing down for the purpose of enabling passengers to alight, preparatory to alighting when the car has stopped, by reason of a sudden starting of the car, the burden is thrown upon the company to show that the injury was not the result of its own act of negligence."

Appellant complains of this instruction as declaring to the jury "that a passenger has a right to be on the steps of a moving car." Unquestionably a passenger has the right to be on the steps of a moving car at times. He has that right when he has embarked on the car and the car starts forward before he can enter it. He has the right (in the sense that he is not guilty of negligence per se in so doing) to be upon the steps of the car preparatory to debarking therefrom. Were this not so, then his mere presence upon the step would in every case be negligence per se which would bar a recovery. Such, however, is not the law, as the court further instructed the jury in instructions 8 and 9, of which complaint is also made, and which are to the following effect:

"When it is shown that the injury to the passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in its business, there is a presumption of negligence which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on its part. It is for you to determine whether or not a passenger is guilty of contributory negligence in going upon [413] the platform of a car or the steps thereof preparatory to alighting therefrom when the car stops.

"Contributory negligence on the part of a passenger cannot be presumed from the mere fact of injury, but must be proved, and the burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the injured person is cast upon the defendant."

That these instructions fairly embrace the law is fully established by Boone v. Oakland

Transit Co. 139 Cal. 490, 73 Pac. 243; Renfro v. Fresno City R. Co. 2 Cal. App. 317, 84 Pac. 357; Valente v. Sierra R. Co. 151 Cal. 539, 91 Pac. 481; Kline v. Santa Barbara Consol. R. Co. 150 Cal. 741, 90 Pac. 125; Dougherty v. Union Traction Co. 23 Cal. App. 17, 136 Pac. 722; Scott v. Bergen Traction Co. 63 N. J. L. 407, 43 Atl. 1060. And, finally, to show the completeness with which the trial judge covered this phase of the law, the court further, at the request of appellant, gave the following instructions upon this matter:

"If you believe, from the evidence in this case, that Eva Froeming stepped off of the car, or attempted to alight from the car of the defendant, while said car was in motion, and before the said car had stopped, then she was guilty of contributory negligence in this case, and the plaintiffs herein are bound by such contributory negligence, and they cannot recover in this case, and your verdict must be for the defendant.

"If you believe, from the evidence in this case, that Eva Froeming attempted to alight from the car of Stockton Electric Railroad Company while said car was in motion, and by reason of such attempt she received injuries which resulted in her death, then I instruct you that she, in such an attempt to alight from said car (if you so believe that she did attempt to alight from said car while the said car was in motion), was guilty of negligence, and the plaintiffs herein cannot recover any damages by reason of her death, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

Instruction 3, which the court gave, is in the following language:

"It is not contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for a passenger to start to leave a street-car before it comes to a full stop, but it is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the act of the passenger in so doing constituted negligence on his or her part."

[414] Of this complaint is made that it is misleading. Whatever uncertainty appellant may think exists in this one sentence, detached from the other instructions, is certainly removed when the instructions are read as a whole. Appellant further objects to an instruction which the court gave, and which declares a familiar rule of law, that the burden of proving contributory negligence is cast upon defendant. He argues that the rule of law is that the defendant is relieved from this burden if the evidence of the plaintiff establishes this contributory negligence. This is quite true. But the jury could not have been misled, for it was repeatedly instructed that if "from the evidence," meaning thereby necessarily and of course all of the evidence, it believed Eva Froeming to have been guilty of contributory negligence, the plaintiffs could not recover. Moreover, if appellant desired an instruction embodying this particular modification of the general principle, it should have proposed it. None of the other asserted errors, either in giving or refusing to give instructions, requires further detailed consideration. The proposed instructions, the giving of which was refused, either were erroneous in point of law or were adequately covered by instructions which the court actually gave.

We are asked to declare that the verdict—a judgment in the sum of eighteen thousand dollars—is excessive. The deceased was devoted to her husband and children. Of the latter, three were girls of tender years, and all were minors under the age of fourteen years. The deceased had a knowledge of accounts and computation and had been a bookkeeper in a bank. She aided her husband, who was a contractor, in the computations necessary for his bids in the matter of his contracts. At the time of her death she was working to help maintain her home. It cannot be said that the award of the jury was excessive. (Valente v. Sierra R. Co. 158 Cal. 412, 111 Pac. 95.)

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

General Rule.

It is well settled that the courts take judicial notice of standard mortality tables in estimating the probable duration of human life. Southern Pac. Co. v. De Valle Da Costa, 190 Fed. 689, 111 C. In McHenry v. Yokum, 27 Ill. 160, the court said: "But the plaintiff thinks it impossible to compute the exact value of this dower interest, so as to determine the extent to which the consideration has failed. The proof clearly shows what was the annual value of the dower and the age of the doweress. From this it is as easy to compute the cash value of the dower, as it is the interest on a note of hand, from tables which have been formed with great care, from well established facts, and these tables are recognized and acted upon by all courts, at least in this country and in England, whenever occasion requires."

In Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Telephone Co. 23 N. D. 6, Ann. Cas. 1914C 680, 135 N. W. 793, it was said that "the overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that the court will take judicial notice of the standard tables, and if called upon, or even if not called upon, may instruct the jury in relation thereto."

Judicial notice has been taken of the fact that life tables are based on the expectancy of life of persons in good health and in employments not extrahazardous. Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232; Chicago Veneer Co. v. Jones, 143 Ky. 21, 135 S. W. 430.

See also Shover v. Myrick, 4 Ind. App. 7, 30 N. E. 207.

In Shover v. Myrick, 4 Ind. App. 7, 30 N. E. 207, the court apparently took judicial cognizance of the fact that the mortality tables enumerated in its opinion were standard. In that case it was said: "The use of life and annuity tables has long been resorted to by the courts of this country and England in making estimates of present values. The business of life insurance and the sale of annuities by societies and corporations proved to be so successful among our British ancestors that the government itself, by the statute of 5 W. & M. ch. 5 and 20, assumed the undertaking for the purpose of raising some of its revenues. Statistics concerning the longevity of human lives were necessary, therefore, to estimate the required charges for such protection, and these statistics were gradually arranged by mathematicians into 'tables,' from which the average duration of life at certain ages and conditions could be ascertained with reasonable certainty. Between the years 1735 and 1780 Dr. Richard Price, of England, prepared his celebrated 'Northampton Tables' from bills of mortality kept in the parish of All Saints, a town in the North of England, and during the years 1779 and 1780 the 'Carlisle Tables' were framed for the town of Carlisle, also in the north of England, from observations made upon a population of 8,000 persons. In addition to these there are the 'Equitable Tables,' prepared by the Equitable Insurance Company, of London; the 'Sweden Tables,' based upon estimates of mortality among the populations of Sweden and Finland; 'Finlaison's Tables,' made by John Finlaison, under the direction of the British government; 'McKean's Tables,' by Alexander McKean, actuary, of London, and others. 'Wigglesworth's Tables,' prepared by Dr. Wigglesworth, were prepared from observations made in New England, and 'Bland's Tables' were arranged by Chancellor Bland, of Maryland, from other tables. See Williams' Case, 3 Bland (Md.) 186 (227); 2 Edinburgh Ency. tit. 'Annuities,' p. 150 et seq.; 2 Ency. Brit. tit. 'Annuities,' p. 72 et seq.; Estabrook v. Hapgood 10 Mass. 313 (315). These tables are regarded as standard and authoritative data for making estimates of the character of those under consideration and have long been used in different ways by the courts of Great Britain and America as among the most available means for the equitable adjustment of such controversies. In the statistical reports of the United States census office, upon the taking of every census, there are published by the government certain tabulated statements of mortality among different groups of the population of the United States, including tables showing the expectation of lives at all ages and among various classes of population. These statements are based upon the experience and observation of scientific men, and form a portion of the vital statistics as well as of the current history of the country. They are known as the 'Mortality Tables of the United States,' or as 'American Mortality Tables.' It seems to be well established that of the contents of these tables the courts will take judicial knowledge."

In Abell v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 W. Va. 400, the Actuary's and American Experience tables of life expectancy were judicially recognized as standard. The court said: "There was no table of mortality offered in evidence in this case, but the court may take judicial notice of such tables. The table, which has been generally used in Virginia, was one made by Professor Wigglesworth of Cambridge University, and is published in Robinson's Practice (old) vol. 2, p. 381. It was adopted by the supreme court of Massachusetts soon after its publication some seventy years ago (Estabrook v. Hapgood, 10 Mass. 322) as the rule in estimating the value of a dower or other life interest, and it has been extensively used in Virginia and formerly in this state for that purpose. But there have been more recently published two tables of mortality, which can be more relied on than Professor Wigglesworth's table, where the lives of assured persons are concerned, as they were constructed from accurate observations made by insurance companies in their business. The first of these tables is known as the combined experience or actuary's table. It was prepared by a committee of eminent actuaries on data afforded by the combined experience of seventeen of the principal life insurance offices in England and was deduced from sixty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-seven assurances. It was first published in 1843. The other table of mortality was constructed from the experience of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York by Mr. Shepard Homans, who availed himself of other statistics to ascertain the laws of mortality as applicable to healthy insured lives in this country; and all the standard European tables were used in adjusting it. This table is known as the American Experience Table and was adopted by New York in 1868. . . . Of these two tables, it seems to me, the combined experience table should be preferred, because on account of the material, out of which it was constructed, it is more likely to be accurate and better adjusted than the American Experience Table."

In Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232, in order to ascertain the present value of an inchoate right of dower, the American Tables of Mortality were used to determine the probable duration of the life of the dowress and her husband. The court said: "More than forty years ago, the courts were accustomed to resort to the 'Northampton' and the 'Carlisle' Tables of observation, showing the probabilities of human life by actual observation in the towns of Northampton and Carlisle, England. These deaths, however, were not taken from selected lives, but from the population generally. The field was so circumscribed, that they have never been deemed entirely reliable. We judicially know that the business of life insurance has made rapid advancement in modern times, especially within the past twenty years. New fields of observation have been explored, based upon the combined and actual experience of American life insurance companies. This has led to the tabulation of results in what is now known as the 'American Table of Mortality,' which is now regarded as the orthodox standard throughout the United States and the Canadas. This table is based on the lives of insurable or healthy persons, and is known to be now in use generally by modern life insurance companies, for the arithmetical estimate of valuations. We are of opinion that, for these reasons, our courts should resort to the 'American Table of Mortality' as a basis for the calculation of annuities dependent on the probabilities of human life in this country. We see no reason why the chancellor, or register, should be precluded from taking judicial knowledge of both the existence of this table and its contents. It is customary for courts to take judicial knowledge of what ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdictions. This cognizance may extend far beyond the actual knowledge, or even the memory of judges, who may, therefore, resort to such documents of reference, or other authoritative sources of information as may be at hand, and may be deemed worthy of confidence."

To the same effect is the decision in McDonnell v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 85 Ala. 401, 5 So. 120, wherein the court said: "There is, in this case, a manifest and total breach of contract by the company, in its failure to carry on the business of life insurance. This breach has resulted in damage to all persons holding policies, for which an immediate action will lie. These damages, moreover, are liquidated, being capable of the most accurate and certain mathematical ascertainment. The legal measure of such damages is the surrender or equitable value of the policy, calculated on the basis of the 'American Tables of Mortality,' which are now the orthodox standard throughout the United States and Canada, and of which judicial notice will be taken by the courts."

In Chambers v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. (N. D.) 163 N. W. 824, the court said: "Counsel for appellant argues that the trial judge erred in his instructions to the jury in stating the life expectancy of Chambers according to the American Mortality Table. It appears that the plaintiff requested the court to take judicial notice of the mortality tables, without specifying what tables. Section 7922 of the Compiled Laws of 1913 provides that in all cases in which probable duration of the natural life of any person is material the statistical tables known as the Carlisle Tables of Mortality are competent evidence of such probable duration or expectation of life. In the case of Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Telephone Co. 23 N. D. 6-19, 135 N. W. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914C 680, this court held that it would take judicial notice of standard tables according to which the life expectancy of an individual may be determined, and it was said that it would have been competent for the court to have instructed the jury as to the fact of the contents of such mortality tables. . . .

While the statute provides affirmatively that the Carlisle Tables shall be admissible, it does not purport to control or restrict in this particular the application of the doctrine of judicial notice. In disposing of this assignment of error, it need only be said that we adhere to the rule laid down in the case of Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Telephone Co. supra."

In Camden, etc. R. Co. v. Williams, 61 N. J. L. 646, 40 Atl. 634, it was said: "The second, sixth and tenth assignments of error were waived. . . . The first is that the 'Carlisle Table of Mortality' was admitted in evidence. It is common knowledge that approved mortuary tables are in constant use to aid in determining the probable expectancy of human life. They are derived from statistics preserved through a course of years, and have become standard by the test of subsequent experience. The courts have almost universally availed themselves of help from these sources when expectancy of life became involved in a judicial proceeding. . . . Among mortuary tables that known as the 'Carlisle Table of Mortality' stands pre-eminent. It was elaborately compiled in the latter part of the last century from the statistics of certain parishes in the city of Carlisle, in England, extending over a series of years. It was received with a high degree of favor among insurers and others concerned with forecasting the probable duration of life. It almost entirely superseded the Northampton table and others still earlier, now altogether obsolete. It is said of this Carlisle Table in 13 Encycl. Brit. (9th ed.) 169, that 'no other mortality table has been so extensively employed in the construction of auxiliary tables of all kinds for computing the values of benefits depending upon human lives.' Insurers now resort to their own experience tables, compiled from their statistics of selected lives, but there seems to be no successor to this general table of mortality. Every lawyer knows that it forms the basis of the table adopted by our own court of chancery as a guide for calculating the value of a life estate (Chancery Rule 184), and it everywhere has gained judicial recognition, as will appear upon consulting the decisions noted in the works above cited on the general subject. It is proper, therefore, to admit this standard table in evidence without proof of its repute; that may be assumed."

In Lincoln v. Power, 151 U. S. 436, 14 S. Ct. 387, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 224, which was an action to recover damages for personal injuries, the court said: "Error is assigned to the action of the court in referring to the Carlisle Tables as enabling the jury to find the plaintiff's prospect of life, and the force of the objection is in the allegation that those tables had not been introduced in evidence. There is high authority for the proposition that courts can take judicial notice of the Carlisle Tables, and can use them in estimating the probable length of life, whether they were introduced in evidence or not."

In Estabrook v. Hapgood, 10 Mass. 313, it was held that the value of a dower right in that particular court should be ascertained by reference to a particular mortuary table contained in a certain publication. The following appears in a note appended to the report of the case: "Note.—The Chief Justice, referring to the assessment of the damages in this case, observed that the value of the dowager's life estate was to be calculated from the late Dr. Wigglesworth's table, published in the Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Vol. ii, p. 131, which he said had been adopted by this court, as a rule in estimating the value of life estates, since its publication."

In Muhlke v. Tiedemann (Ill.) 117 N. E. 708, the court said: "While it is true the proof shows that there were a number of mortality tables, and that under these tables different results are obtained, it is a matter of common knowledge that the Wigglesworth table is recognized as one of the standard tables and is frequently used by the courts of this state in determining the present value of future interests."

AUTHENTICITY OF TABLE OFFERED IN EVIDENCE.

It is believed to be the better opinion that a court may take judicial notice of the authenticity of a mortality table offered in evidence, thereby eliminating the necessity for preliminary proof thereof. Southern Pac. Co. v. De Valle Da Costa, 190 Fed. 689, 111 C. C. A. 417; Keast v. Santa Ysabel Gold Min. Co. 136 Cal. 256, 68 Pac. 771; Valente v. Sierra R. Co. 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Ryan, 62 Kan. 682, 64 Pac. 603; Alexander v. Bradley, 3 Bush (Ky.) 607; Scheffler v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 32 Minn. 518, 21 N. W. 711, 19 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 173; Abell v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 W. Va. 400.

Thus, in Keast v. Santa Ysabel Gold Min. Co. supra, an action for death by wrongful act, mortality tables were admitted in evidence to aid in assessing the damages. The court said: "There was no error of the court in admitting in evidence McCarty's Statistician and Economist containing Farr's table of expectancy of life to show the probable duration of the life of the deceased. It is not questioned that proper evidence of such expectancy of life was admissible. In some courts it is said that such tables are admissible after proper preliminary proof of their authenticity and standard quality. Such proof in this case was not made, but the general weight of authority is to the contrary, and permits the introduction of such tables as are satisfactory to the court. The court may or may not require such preliminary proof, depending upon whether of its own knowledge it is satisfied, or whether it desires evidence to satisfy itself of the authenticity of the tables."

In following the decision in Keast v. Santa Ysabel Gold Min. Co. supra, the court, in Valente v. Sierra R. Co. 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481, which was also an action for death by wrongful act, said: "The question as to the admission of a table of life expectancy without preliminary proof as to its authenticity and reliability appears to be decided against defendant's contention by the case of Keast v. Santa Ysabel Gold Min. Co. 130 Cal. 256, 259, 68 Pac. 771, where it is held that the court may admit any table satisfactory to it, requiring or not requiring preliminary proof, depending upon whether of its own knowledge it is satisfied, or whether it desires evidence to satisfy itself of the authenticity of the table. This ruling is, of course, founded upon the theory that the courts take judicial notice of the standard tables. (20 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 886)."

In Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Ryan, 62 Kan. 682, 64 Pac. 603, it was said: "If the courts judicially know the standard tables of life expectancy when presented to their observation, they may assure their knowledge by reference to publications containing them. The only easily accessible authentic publication of such tables is to be found in the standard encyclopaedias like the Britannica. The courts recognize such publications as being authentic and in general use, and, therefore, may receive them in evidence as to matters contained therein of which judicial knowledge is possessed."

In Scheffer v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 32 Minn. 518, 21 N. W. 711, 19 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 173, the court said: "With reference to the admission in evidence of the Carlisle and other similar tables for the purpose of showing the 'expectation' and probable duration of life, we think that they are to be received upon judicial notice of their genuineness and authoritativeness. As in regard to many other matters of which judicial notice is taken, it is proper for a court to inform itself in the premises by reference to books and other sources of information; but legal proof of such genuineness and authoritativeness is not required. In a given case it is for the court to say, without such proof, that they are or are not genuine and authoritative, and that they are or are not admissible accordingly. Stephen, Ev. art. 59, and note; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 6. Such tables are, however, not conclusive, for there is not only a considerable variance in different tables, but they are not so compiled as to show the probable duration of life under any and all circumstances, but under particular conditions, so that their evidentiary value in a given case is largely analogical."

In Southern Pac. Co. v. De Valle Da Costa, 190 Fed. 689, 111 C. C. A. 417, which was an action for damages for death caused by alleged negligence, the court said: "It is urged also that the court erred in permitting the use of mortality tables without requiring any evidence that the tables were authentic or in general use; but this is a matter of judicial notice, and there is no error in this respect."

In Stephens v. Elliott, 36 Mont. 92, 92 Pac. 45, it was said: "Upon the trial counsel for plaintiff offered and read in evidence, over defendant's objection, certain mortality tables for the purpose of showing the probable expectancy of plaintiff's life. The particular objection urged was that the tables were not identified, but were read by an attorney who was not a witness and not under oath. While there is some conflict in the authorities, the weight of the authorities seems to be in harmony with the trial court's ruling, that the court takes judicial notice of standard mortality tables, and, if the court is satisfied that the one offered is of that character, no further identification is necessary; and it is immaterial that the portion read is read by an attorney who is not sworn as a witness in the case."

But courts have refused to take judicial notice of the authenticity of alleged standard mortality tables. Western, etc. R. Co. v. Hyer, 113 Ga. 776, 39 S. E. 447; Notto v. Atlantic City R. Co. 75 N. J. L. 826, 69 Atl. 968, 127 Am. St. Rep. 835, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1138; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Arispe, 81 Tex. 523, 17 S. W. 47. See also Western, etc. R. Co. v. Cox, 115 Ga. 715.

Thus, in Western, etc. R. Co. v. Hyer, supra, which was an action brought by a widow for damages for the death of her husband who had been killed in a railroad wreck, the court, concerning the authenticity of alleged "Northampton," "Carlisle," and "Actuary's" mortality tables, and a supposed "Carlisle" annuity table, printed in the appendix to an official report of decided cases, said:

"The mere fact that certain tables were published by the official reporter of this court in the form of an appendix to the 70th Ga. does not authorize us to take judicial notice of the contents of the tables there to be found. On the contrary, we have no authority to look outside of the record of any given case for the purpose of discovering something which that record should, but does not, itself disclose."

In Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Arispe, 81 Tex. 523, 17 S. W. 47, it was said: "The action of the court as indicated in the seventh assignment of error was erroneous, and the following is the assignment, viz.: 'The court erred in permitting plaintiffs over the objection of defendant to introduce in evidence the table of the expectation of the years of life contained in the book entitled "A Million of Facts; Conkling's Handy Manual of Useful Information and Atlas of the World; All for Twenty-five Cents," for the reason specified in defendant's bill of exception No. 1, and because the same was no authority and of no higher character than any cheap book sold on railroads, and there was no evidence offered showing the correctness of the table, and it was calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant.' Whether this ruling of the court, if it were the only ground relied on, would constitute a reversible error we need not inquire. Suffice it to say that this book, however flattering may be its title or alluring its price, is not one of those standard works of which the courts take judicial notice and recognize as authority, and consequently it should have been excluded in the absence of any proof of its correctness."

FUSSELMAN

v.

YELLOWSTONE VALLEY LAND AND IRRIGATION COMPANY.

Montana Supreme Court—February 16, 1917.

53 Mont. 254; 163 Pac. 473.

Negligence — Liability to Trespassing Infant.

The basis of the doctrine of liability to a trespassing infant, injured through the dangerous condition of the premises, is implied invitation.

What Constitutes Negligence — Breach of Duty Essential.

Actionable negligence arises only from breach of a legal duty.

Averment of Negligence — Sufficiency.

A complaint for negligence must disclose a duty, breach of it, and resulting damages. Same.

A complaint for negligence must state facts, and not legal conclusions, and so must set forth facts from which it can be said, as matter of law, that defendant owed the injured person a duty at the time of the injury; and an allegation that defendant impliedly invited deceased is insufficient.

Owners of Premises — Liability for Injury — Invitation.

An invitation not accepted or acted on creates no legal relationship so as to be the basis for a charge of negligence.

Negligence — Turntable Doctrine.

To state a cause of action under the doctrine of the turntable cases, it is not enough for the complaint for injury to a trespassing child to show that the premises were attractive to children or that children generally were attracted thereto, but it must show that the attraction lured the particular child there with the resulting injury.

Owners of Premises — Canal — Injury to Trespassing Child.

Evidence in an action for drowning of a child in the canal of an irrigation company is held to be insufficient to support a verdict on the theory that it fell in where the canal crossed a street, and should have been, but was not, covered; it being equally consistent with it having fallen in at another point.

[See note at end of this case.]

New Trial — Affidavit in Motion — Newly Discovered Evidence — Diligence.

It is not enough for the affidavit for a new trial for newly discovered evidence to allege diligent inquiry before trial; but the particular efforts made must be stated.

Appeal from District Court, Park county: Law, Judge.

Action by E. W. Fusselman, plaintiff; against Yellowstone Valley Land and Irrigation Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Walsh, Nolan & Scallon for appellant.

Fred L. Gibson and Miller & O'Connor for respondent.

[257] HOLLOWAY, J.—In 1913 the Yellowstone Valley Land & Irrigation Company maintained a canal for conveying water from the Yellowstone River for irrigation purposes. The canal passed through a portion of the city of Livingston and along and across many streets and alleys. Permission to run the canal through the city had been obtained, and Ordinance No. 99 had been adopted defining the rights and duties of the company within the city. Among other things, it was required to keep the canal covered wherever it ran in or across a street or alley, but this duty had been neglected, and there was not any covering over the canal where it crossed Yellowstone Street or Gallatin Street or in the vicinity of the intersection of those streets, except a bridge fourteen feet in length near the center of Yellowstone Street. On May 23, [258] 1913, the dead body of Birdena Fusselman was taken from the canal at a point down the canal and 1,100 feet east of the Yellowstone Street bridge. This action was brought by the father of the deceased to recover damages. Issues were framed and a trial had. At the conclusion of the evidence the district court directed a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed from the judgment entered thereon and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Appellant advances two theories, upon either of which he insists that a case was made for the jury.

1. It is first contended that even though the deceased was upon the private property of the defendant at the time she fell into the canal, liability may nevertheless attach if the canal, as located with the water flowing in it, was peculiarly attractive to children of tender years, if it was dangerous, if small children were accustomed to play about it and were likely to fall into it and be drowned, and if these facts were known to the defendant or should have been known to it and reasonable care was not taken to prevent injury. In other words, it is sought to invoke the rule announced in Sioux City, etc. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 745.

The doctrine of the turntable cases proceeds upon the assumption that the injured party, if an adult, would have been a trespasser, but because of his tender years and indiscretion is not subject to the rule of liability applicable to trespassers. Anyone who goes upon the private property of another without lawful authority or without permission or invitation, express or implied, is a trespasser to whom the land owner owes no legal duty until his presence is discovered. He is only required to refrain from wanton or willful acts which occasion injury. (Egan v. Montana Cent. R. Co. 24 Mont. 569, 63 Pac. 831.) A person upon the private property of another by invitation, express or implied, is there rightfully, and to him the land owner owes the positive duty to exercise reasonable care for his safety. (Montague v. Hanson, 38 Mont. 376, 99 Pac. 1063.) It is not contended that the defendant or any officer or agent of it knew of the presence of Birdena Fusselman upon the [259] right of way or along the canal immediately, or at any time, before her death, or that her death resulted from any wanton or willful acts of the defendant. Neither is there any contention made that the company ever expressly invited the deceased to come upon its property; so that the only possible theory upon which liability may attach under this view of the case is that the deceased was at the canal pursuant to an implied invitation extended to her by the canal company, and that the invitation was to be implied from the acts of the defendant in maintaining the canal under the circumstances disclosed.

In passing, it may be said that no other subject within the domain of the law has given rise to greater divergence of judicial opinion than the doctrine of the Stout case. In some jurisdictions it is repudiated altogether; in others applied strictly; in others adopted in a more or less modified form; while in others it has been extended to such a variety of cases that it has lost its original identity and has become a new rule of the substantive law of negligence. The courts which give recognition to the doctrine are not agreed upon the principle which underlies it and encounter difficulty in defining the doctrine itself. By some of these courts it is treated as an exception to the general rule of nonliability to trespassers—an exception born of necessity and applied out of consideration for the irresponsibility of infancy. Others invoke the doctrine only in cases where an invitation can be implied from the acts of the land owner, upon the theory that, "what an express invitation would be to an adult, the temptation of an attractive plaything is to a child of tender years." (Keffe v. Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393.) So much has been written upon the subject that we shall not attempt to add anything new to the discussion. To review the decided cases is useless, and to reconcile them is impossible. An extended reference to them will be found in Bottum v. Hawks, 84 Vt. 370, Ann. Cas. 1913A 1025, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 440, 79 Atl. 858, and in the notes to the same case in Ann. Cas. 1913A 1032.

[260] In the trial of the Stout case, Judge Dillon instructed the jury that notwithstanding the child was upon the private property of the company at the time he was injured, liability would attach if the jury found: (a) That the turntable, in its then condition, situation, and place, was a dangerous machine, which, if left unguarded and unlocked, would be likely to cause injury to children; (b) that the company knew or ought to have known that children resorted to the turntable to play, and that they would likely be injured by it; and (c) that the company employed no means to keep children away or to prevent accidents to them. (Stout v. Sioux City, etc. R. Co. 2 Dill. 294, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,504.) In the supreme court the instructions were approved as sound and judicious, and reference is made to the rule of reasonable care—the rule which measures the duty of the land owner to one rightfully upon his property. The court did not assume to state a new rule of law, but sought justification in principles announced and applied in decided cases to which reference was made, among them Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, 41 E. C. L. 422. The facts of that case were that the defendant's servant left a horse and cart unattended in the street. The plaintiff, a child of tender years, climbed upon the cart in play. Another child struck the horse, causing it to start abruptly, whereby the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured. The defendant was held liable, though no stress was laid upon the fact that the horse and cart were in a public street. Upon the question of negligence Chief Justice Denman said: "For if I am guilty of negligence in leaving anything dangerous in a place where I know it to be extremely probable that some other person will unjustifiably set it in motion to the injury of a third, and if that injury should be so brought about, I presume that the sufferer might have redress by action against both or either of the two, but unquestionably against the first." And, disposing of the contention that the negligence of the plaintiff in mounting the cart and so committing a trespass had contributed to the injury, he observed: "The answer is that, supposing that fact ascertained by the jury, but to this extent: That it merely [261] indulged the natural instinct of a child in amusing himself with the empty cart and deserted horse, then we think that the defendant cannot be permitted to avail himself of that fact. The most blamable carelessness of his servant having tempted the child, he ought not to reproach the child with yielding to that temptation. He has been the real and only cause of the mischief."

Though in the Stout case particular emphasis was not laid upon the peculiar attractiveness of the turntable, and the foundation principle upon which liability was made to depend was not sharply defined, the language employed and the references given seem to require the conclusion that the attractiveness of the machine was deemed to be an essential element, and that the theory of implied invitation must have prompted the conclusion reached. The Stout case was decided in 1873. Later a case presenting substantially the same facts came before the supreme court of Minnesota (Keffe v. Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. above), and the rule of liability was there made to rest upon the theory of implied invitation. Among other things the court said: "The defendant therefore knew that by leaving this turntable unfastened and unguarded, it was not merely inviting young children to come upon the turntable, but was holding out an allurement, which, acting upon the natural instincts by which such children are controlled, drew them by those instincts into a hidden danger; and having thus knowingly allured them into a place of danger, without their fault (for it cannot blame them for not resisting the temptation it has set before them), it was bound to use care to protect them from the danger into which they were thus led, and from which they could not be expected to protect themselves."

In his work on Torts, Judge Cooley referred approvingly to the decision in the Keffe case, and under the title "Invasion of Rights in Real Property" said: "Every retail dealer impliedly invites the public to enter his shop for the examination of his goods, that they may purchase them if they see fit. . . . So every man, by implication, invites others to come to his house [262] as they may have proper occasion, either of business, of courtesy, for information, etc. . . . In the case of young children and other persons not fully sui juris, an implied license might sometimes arise when it would not in behalf of others. Thus, leaving a tempting thing for children to play with exposed, where they would be likely to gather for that purpose, may be equivalent to an invitation to them to make use of it." (Cooley on Torts, 303.)

In the first edition of Thompson on Negligence, published in 1880, the author, referring to Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East (Eng.) 277, and Stout v. Sioux City, etc. R. Co. above, said: "It would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon, baited with stinking meat, so that his neighbor's dog, attracted by his natural instincts, might run into it and be killed; and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it and tempted to intermeddle with it by instincts equally strong, might thereby be killed or maimed for life." (1 Thompson on Negligence, 305.)

In Union Pac. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 434, 14 S. Ct. 619, the principles of the Stout case were approved and applied. Lynch v. Nurdin was again analyzed and relied upon, and the language from that case, from Keffe v. Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. and from Cooley and Thompson above was quoted to sustain the position taken. It should now be deemed to be settled, so far as the federal courts are concerned, that the doctrine of the Stout case, as amplified in the McDonald case, is the law upon the subject; that the attractive character of the dangerous instrumentality which causes the injury is an essential element of the doctrine, and that the doctrine has its foundation in the theory of implied invitation.

Lynch v. Nurdin was decided in 1841. In 1909 Cooke v. Midland Great Western R. Co. involving the question of the liability of the railway company for an injury to a child while playing upon an unlocked turntable on the defendant's premises, came before [263] the House of Lords. The defendant was held liable upon the theory of implied invitation, and Lynch v. Nurdin was relied upon as direct authority for the doctrine announced that a land owner who maintains on his premises a dangerous machine peculiarly attractive to children of immature years, and who knows that such children are accustomed to play about and upon it and are likely to be injured by it, owes to such children the duty to exercise ordinary care for their safety. ([1909] App. Cas. (Eng.) 229, 15 Ann. Cas. 557.) The doctrine was invoked in this court for the first time in Driscoll v. Clark, 32 Mont. 172, 80 Pac. 1, 373, but we held that the facts pleaded did not bring the case within the rule, though the doctrine itself received the tacit approval of a majority of the court. The same conclusion was reached in Gates v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 37 Mont. 103, 94 Pac. 751, and in Nixon v. Montana, etc. R. Co. 50 Mont. 95, Ann. Cas. 1916B 299, 145 Pac. 8. In Martin v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 51 Mont. 31, 149 Pac. 89, we reviewed an instruction of the trial court designed to announce and apply the doctrine, but held that it omitted an essential element. In every one of these cases we proceeded upon the assumption that the doctrine is grounded upon the theory of implied invitation, and though it may not appear altogether logical to imply an invitation where none was intended to be extended, still in this jurisdiction the position is fortified somewhat by the rule of law crystallized in the statute, which declares that it will be presumed "that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary act." (Rev. Codes, sec. 7962.) This rule is applied in civil cases, and though the presumption is a disputable one, it furnished sufficient foundation for a prima facie case until contradicted.

The doctrine of the turntable cases is the rule of law in England, in our federal courts, in by far the greater number of the state courts where it has been considered, and has received the tacit approval of the majority of this court. We are satisfied that justification for the doctrine can be found only in the theory of implied invitation, and upon the assumption that in a proper case the doctrine will be applied in this jurisdiction [264] upon that theory, it is insisted by counsel for respondent that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to bring the present case within the doctrine.

It is the rule, recognized generally, that actionable negligence arises only from a breach of legal duty, and to state a cause of action for damages resulting from negligence, it is necessary that the complaint disclose the duty, the breach, and the resulting damages. The facts, and not legal conclusions, must be stated, and it is therefore necessary to set forth sufficient facts from which it can be said, as a matter of law, that the defendant owed to the injured party a duty arising from some legal relation existing at the time of the injury. It is not sufficient to say that the defendant impliedly invited the deceased to come upon the property. An invitation not accepted or acted upon cannot create any legal relationship whatever. Neither is it sufficient to show that children generally were attracted to the dangerous instrumentality, in order to make out a case under the turntable doctrine as we have defined it. To impose liability upon the defendant for the death of Birdena Fusselman it must be made to appear, among other things, that a legal duty was owed to her, and this could arise only from the maintenance of a dangerous instrumentality peculiarly attractive to children of tender years and which did lure or attract her to her death. It is not sufficient to charge negligence in the abstract. The breach of duty relied upon must have been the proximate cause of the injury, and the facts pleaded must disclose the causal connection between the defendant's negligent act and the injury complained of. Though the canal may have been ever so attractive to children, unless it was that attraction which lured the deceased to her death, the doctrine would have no application.

It is a general rule of pleading in actions for damages for injuries received upon the defendant's property that the complaint must disclose by what right the injured party was upon the premises. (14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 339; 29 Cyc. 567.) In failing to allege that Birdena Fusselman was attracted to the canal [265] or that by reason of its peculiar attractiveness she went upon the canal and met her death, the complainant fails to state a cause of action under the doctrine of the turntable cases.

2. The other theory adopted by the appellant is that the child fell into the canal while she was in Yellowstone Street near the bridge and at a point where the canal was not protected by a covering or barrier; that she was drowned and her body carried by the water to the point where it was found; and upon this theory it is sought to fasten liability upon the company for its negligence in failing to comply with the city ordinance.

Since the ordinance required the canal to be covered only where it ran in or across a street or alley, the burden was cast upon the plaintiff, in the maintenance of this theory, to prove that the child was in a street or alley at the time she fell into the canal. To sustain this burden, plaintiff offered evidence of the following facts:

The Fusselman home is 700 feet south of the Yellowstone Street bridge, and 226 feet south and west of the bridge is a garage. About 5:30 o'clock in the afternoon of May 23 the deceased, three years and three months old, and her playmate, Genevieve Rowe, four years old, were taken from near the Fusselman residence to the garage, and soon afterward were seen playing in Gallatin Street, about midway between the garage and the bridge, picking small white flowers—referred to by some of the witnesses as daisies. About 6 o'clock the Rowe child returned to its home near the garage apparently much excited. The absence of the deceased was noticed about the same time, and at 6:30 the body was recovered from the canal at a flume where it had lodged against a screen. Mrs. Rowe, a witness for plaintiff, testified that, aiding in the search for the missing child, she and Mrs. Fusselman went to the canal in Yellowstone Street. Her testimony then continues: "We went just a few feet west of the bridge and found on the edge of the bank there quite a bunch of white flowers—I believe they call them lilies. Q. Do you know whether or not they were fresh looking? A. They were quite fresh. I should say it was three and one-half or four feet [266] west of the bridge we found those little lilies, and they were right on the bank. Those lilies or lilies like them were growing on Gallatin Street at that time around our barn and all over the little flat where the street is."

It is insisted that from these facts and circumstances the inference is a legitimate one that after picking flowers in Gallatin Street, the two children proceeded on to the Yellowstone Street bridge, that the deceased fell into the canal near the bridge, and that the flowers found by Mrs. Rowe were dropped by the deceased. In their brief, counsel for appellant refer to the freshly picked daisies found by Mrs. Rowe as furnishing strong circumstantial evidence that the child fell into the canal at the point where the flowers were found; but it is to be observed that Mrs. Rowe was not asked if the flowers were plucked, or growing at the place indicated, and it is only an inference from her testimony that they were picked flowers, and another inference that the lilies to which she referred were the daisies mentioned by other witnesses. The allegations of the complaint and the proof are that children of the neighborhood were accustomed to play along the canal and on the streets and unoccupied lots along or near the canal, and if we are to assume that the flowers found by Mrs. Rowe had been plucked recently, what justification can there be for saying that they were left there by the deceased rather than by someone else?

Considering that the child's body was found 1,100 feet from the place where the flowers were, that she could have approached the canal at any point within that distance, and that it was unguarded throughout, we think it could not be more nor less than a guess to say from this evidence that the accident occurred at or near the bridge rather than at some other point, not in a street or alley.

Actionable negligence may be shown by circumstantial evidence, but the circumstances must tend directly to establish the cause of action. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, and is not satisfied if the conclusion rests merely upon conjecture or speculation, or if the facts and circumstances have an [267] equal or stronger tendency to support some other theory inconsistent with the one upon which plaintiff relies. (Shaw v. New Year Gold Mines Co. 31 Mont. 138, 77 Pac. 515; Gilmore v. Ostronich, 48 Mont. 305, 137 Pac. 378.)

3. Error is predicated upon the refusal of the court to grant a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. Maude Schanelec and Gertrude Husted each made affidavit to facts discovered by them on the evening of May 23, 1913—facts which would have been material to plaintiff in the trial of this case. In his affidavit in support of the motion, plaintiff says: "I am the plaintiff in the above-entitled action. I made diligent inquiry before the trial of said cause took place to obtain evidence to show that my little girl fell into the ditch in which she was drowned, and especially as to the place where she did fall in. The only evidence that I was able to obtain as to the place where the child fell in was the evidence of Mrs. Rowe, who testified to finding a bunch of lilies on the bank of the ditch a short distance west of the bridge crossing Yellowstone Street. That since the trial of said cause I learned that Maude Schanelec and Gertrude Husted had some information as to where the child fell into the ditch, and immediately on getting that information I went to see them and learned from them as to the footprints on the bank, and also as to the markings on the edge of the ditch, as shown by their affidavits. This information came to me, as already stated, for the first time after the case was tried."

In State v. Matkins, 45 Mont. 58, 121 Pac. 881, this court reviewed at length the subject now under consideration, stated the reasons which impel courts to look with disfavor upon an application for a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence, and reiterated the rules governing such an application. One of the rules recognized and insisted upon by the authorities everywhere is that the moving party must disclose that he exercised due diligence to procure the newly discovered evidence before the trial. "The particular efforts which were made to discover the testimony before the trial must be stated, giving the [268] circumstances, and the names of persons of whom inquiry was made. It is not sufficient merely to aver that affiant used 'due diligence' or 'reasonable diligence,' or to employ equivalent expressions, as the court must determine the question of diligence from the facts related in the affidavit of the applicant." (14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 824; Nicholson v. Metcalf, 31 Mont. 276, 78 Pac. 483.)

Aside from any consideration of the counter-affidavits which were presented, the showing made falls short of the requirements of these rules. It would not be sufficient cause for reversal that the members of this court, if sitting at visi prius, might have viewed the application in a more favorable light. The motion was addressed to the sound, legal discretion of the trial court, and we cannot say from this record that the discretion was abused.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that an irrigation company maintaining a canal which ran through a city and which was not guarded except at street crossings, was not liable for the death of a child who was drowned in the canal while trespassing on the premises of the company. The doctrine of the "turn-table cases" is held not to be inapplicable to such a state of facts. The liability of a landowner for injury to a trespassing child on account of an unguarded pond, pool, well or the like is discussed in the notes to Sullivan v. Huidekoper, 7 Ann. Cas. 196; Wheeling, etc. R. Co. v. Harvey, 11 Ann. Cas. 981; Bottom v. Hawks, ALN. Cas. 1913A 1025; Riggle v. Lens, Ann. Cas. 1918C 1083; and Barnes v. Shreveport City R. Co. 48 Am. St. Rep. 400, 423. See also the recent case of Thompson v. Alexander City Cotton Mills Co. Ann. Cas. 1917A 721.

STATE

v.

TETRAULT.

New Hampshire Supreme Court—October 5, 1915.

78 N. H. 14; 95 Atl. 669.

Age — Testimony as to Age of Another.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, testimony of defendant's adoptive parents as to her age and the date of her birth, made upon information by her aunt, who was dead at the time of the trial, and her appearance when they first knew her at the age of three, is admissible.

[See Ann. Cas. 1918A 262.]

Witnesses — Competency — Mental Capacity — Question for Court.

In a prosecution for rape, the question of the mental capacity of prosecutrix is one of fact, to be decided by the court before permitting her to testify.

[See 9 Ann. Cas. 1218; Ann. Cas. 1913E 323.]

Same.

The trial court's conclusion that a witness was of sufficient capacity to testify, based upon evidence warranting the finding, is not reviewable by the supreme court.

Age — Testimony by Person as to His Own Age.

In a prosecution for rape, the testimony of prosecutrix as to her age, while founded on hearsay, is admissible.

[See note at end of this case.]

Rape — Evidence — Subsequent Familiarities.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence as to advances made to the prosecutrix by the defendant, when they met at a time subsequent to the date of the alleged offense, is admissible, as it is such as to indicate that they had probably had improper relations before, and tends to corroborate the state's theory of the defendant's guilt.

Conduct of Prosecutrix with Others.

In a prosecution for rape, where the state did not claim that the defendant had exclusive opportunity, evidence that the prosecutrix was seen away from her home with other men at about the time in question is inadmissible.

Argument of Counsel — Stating Penalty for Crime.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, the refusal to allow defendant's counsel to state to the jury the penalty prescribed for the offense, on the ground that more evidence would be required to convict of a serious crime than of a trivial one, is proper.

Criminal Law — Degree of Proof.

In a prosecution for crime, the defendant's guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

Exceptions from Superior Court, Sullivan county.

Criminal action. Louis Tetrault convicted of statutory rape and alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. EXCEPTIONS OVERRULED.

Frank O. Chellis and James A. Moynihan for State.

Hurd & Kinney for defendant.

[14] PRASLEE, J.—The crime was alleged to have been committed upon a feeble-minded girl under sixteen years of age. She was an adopted child and had been known to her adoptive parents since she was supposed to be three years old. Subject to exception, they were permitted to state her age and the date of her birthday. The sources of their information were statements to them by her aunt (who was dead at the time of the trial), her appearance when they first knew her, and the time when she arrived at puberty. The two latter circumstances are of little consequence in this case, for the offense is alleged to have been committed less than two months before the prosecutrix's sixteenth birthday.

Ordinarily, any member of a family is permitted to testify to matters of family history, including, of course, facts as to age or [15] date of birth. It is not necessary to determine whether the rule is made inapplicable by the fact that the person whose age was in question did not become a member of the family to which the witness belonged until three years after the event in her history to which their testimony related took place. The source of information was fully disclosed by the evidence. It appeared that the witnesses fixed the date of the prosecutrix's birth as August 8, 1888, because they had been told that was the fact by her aunt. The whole substance of the evidence as to the date was that the aunt said it was as stated. The aunt being dead, her statement was properly received. Emerson v. White, 29 N. H. 482; Waldron v. Tuttle, 4 N. H. 371, 378. If there was technical error in the presentation of this evidence, there was none in substance. The jury must have understood that the adoptive parents neither had nor claimed to have any personal knowledge of the fact in question, and that they based their belief upon the competent declaration of the aunt.

The theories upon which testimony as to pedigree is admitted are not wholly harmonious. By most of them the positive statement of the fact in question by these adoptive parents would be received as evidence. 2 Wig. Ev. s. 1489. Whether these precedents should be followed, or whether the stricter limitation sometimes insisted upon should be applied, the result here would be the same.

The prosecutrix was permitted to testify, subject to the defendant's exception. The question of her mental capacity was one of fact to be decided by the presiding justice. Day v. Day, 56 N. H. 316. The conclusion that she was of sufficient capacity was based upon evidence warranting the finding and therefore is not open to revision here. State v. Sawtelle, 66 N. H. 488, 502, 32 Atl. 831.

The admission of her testimony as to her age was in accordance with the best authorities. "Strictly speaking, one cannot know his exact age except upon hearsay information; for he is not capable of knowing this, or anything, until an appreciable time after birth. But practically a person's belief on this point has a satisfactory basis. Courts have commonly preferred to accept this practical certainty rather than to insist on academic nicety." 1 Wig. Ev. s. 667, and cases cited.

Several witnesses testified to advances made to the prosecutrix by the defendant when they met at a time subsequent to the date of the alleged offence. The conduct of the parties at this time was [16] such as to indicate that they had probably had improper relations before, and thus tended to corroborate the state's theory of the defendant's guilt. There was no error in the admission of this evidence.

The defendant offered to prove that the prosecutrix was seen away from her home with other men at about the time in question. The exception to the exclusion of this evidence is urged upon the ground that the state's witnesses claimed that the defendant had exclusive opportunity. The prosecutrix was pregnant at the time of the trial, and if the claim as to the state's position were true, the exception would be well grounded. But the state had taken no such position. Such evidence as there was upon the question was brought out by the defendant's counsel upon cross-examination. The question upon this exception is, therefore, whether the evidence tended to show "guilt in another inconsistent with his own participation in the crime." State v. Wren, 77 N. H. 361, 363, 92 Atl. 170. It is apparent that the evidence offered had but slight tendency in the desired direction and that its exclusion was not erroneous as matter of law. The question at issue was not the paternity of the child, nor the consent of the prosecutrix, but whether the defendant had intercourse with her.

Counsel also excepted to a refusal of permission to state to the jury the penalty prescribed for the offence and now argue that such statement should be permitted because more evidence should be required to convict of a serious crime than of a trivial one. However well founded the contention may be in morals or philosophy, it has no place in the law. The rule is, proof beyond a reasonable doubt in each case. The jury had no duty to perform in the assessment of the penalty and therefore no occasion to know what it might be. The exclusion of this matter from their consideration was in accord with the uniform practice in this state.

The exception to the charge presents only questions as to the admissibility of the evidence of the prosecutrix's age and is disposed of by the conclusion that there was no error in the admission of the evidence.

Exceptions overruled.

All concurred.

NOTE.Competency of Witness to Testify as to His Own Age.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent decisions passing on the competency of a witness to testify as to his own age. The earlier cases are collected in the notes to Koester v. Rochester Candy Works, 16 Ann. Cas. 589, and Grand Lodge, etc. v. Bartes, 111 Am. St. Rep. 577.

The recent decisions including the reported case are in accord with the earlier authorities in holding that a witness is competent to testify as to his own age. Such testimony is one of the well-defined exceptions to the rule excluding hearsay evidence. Klicke v. Allegheny Steel Co. 200 Fed. 933, 119 C. C. A. 317; Chicago v. Betti, 192 Ill. App. 87; State v. Vinn, 50 Mont. 27, 144 Pac. 773; State v. Huggins, 83 N. J. L. 43, 83 Atl. 495; Freeman v. Boynton First Nat. Bank, 44 Okla. 146, 143 Pac. 1165; Harris v. Hart (Okla.) 151 Pac. 1038-1042; Hanson v. Greenlee, 19 Pa. Dist. 885; Vaughn v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. 24, 136 S. W. 476; Rogers v. State, 65 Tex. Crim. 105, 143 S. W. 631. See also People v. Schultz, 260 Ill. 35, 102 N. E. 1045; Harvick v. Modern Woodmen of America, 158 Ill. App. 570; Stevens v. Elliott, 30 Okla. 41, 118 Pac. 407; Caples v. State, 74 Tex. Crim. 127, 167 S. W. 730; Smits v. State, 145 Wis. 601, 130 N. W. 525.

The rule is recognized in criminal as well as in civil cases. Thus in Boyd v. State, 72 Tex. Crim. 521, 163 S. W. 67, a prosecution for rape, testimony of the prosecutrix as to her age, based on information of her mother, was admitted. The court said that the weight of such evidence was for the jury to determine. So in State v. Huggins, 83 N. J. L. 43, 83 Atl. 495, the court in admitting such testimony said: "The girl herself testified to her own age, and although at one time on her cross-examination she said that all she knew about it was what Mr. Williams told her, she also said on her recross, when asked whether that was all she knew, that her mother told her. It is well settled that one may testify to his own age. Wigmore on Evidence, § 667. . . . The reasons for permitting testimony of this character have been nowhere better stated than by Mr. Justice Dixon, speaking for the court of errors and appeals, in Hancock v. Supreme Council Catholic Benev. Legion, 69 N. J. L. 308, 55 Atl. 246. Testimony as to the exact birthday must, as he says, rest on hearsay; but testimony as to the approximate age rests on one's own recollection. By counting the years of memory and adding the short period that antedates memory, a period which all normal persons can from observation and experience approximate with much accuracy, a person can form a sufficiently accurate estimate of his age." See also the reported case.

In Chicago v. Betti, 192 Ill. App. 87, an action for the violation of a city ordinance forbidding the sale of tobacco to minors, a witness was allowed to testify as to his own age.

In Hanson v. Greenlee, 19 Pa. Dist. 885, an action on a promissory note, the defense was that the note was signed when the defendant was an infant. Testimony by the defendant as to his age at the time of signing the note was admitted.

It would appear, however, from two recent decisions that the Canadian courts are inclined to take the view that a witness is not competent to testify as to his own age. In Hargreaves v. Wrigley, 7 Sask. L. Rep. 415, 30 West. L. Rep. 92, the plaintiff brought suit on a promissory note. The defense relied on was infancy, and in support of this the defendant testified as to the date of his birth on information from his mother, and from a copy of the certificate of birth. The court however excluded the testimony, saying that it was merely hearsay. In Rex v. Hauberg, 24 Can. Crim. Cas. 297, 8 Sask. L. Rep. 239, 8 West. W. Rep. 1130, 31 West. L. Rep. 779, the defendant was convicted of having seduced a woman of previously chaste character under the age of twenty-one years. At the trial the prosecutrix testified as to her age, and on appeal the supreme court in holding the evidence to be inadmissible said: "The only evidence adduced as to the age of Elen Caroline Staberg was her own statement that she was born on the 19th day of July, 1894, in Norway, and her appearance, and a statement made by accused to his sister in April, 1914, when speaking of marrying the private prosecutrix, 'Elen is young, but it will have to go on' referring to the intended marriage. Wigmore on Evidence, par. 222, says that 'the appearance of an alleged minor may be considered in judging of his age,' and at par. 667 he says, 'strictly speaking, one cannot know his exact age except upon hearsay information; for he is not capable of knowing this, or anything, until an appreciable time after birth. But practically a person's belief on this point has a satisfactory basis. Courts have commonly preferred to accept this practical certainty rather than to insist upon academic nicety.' For these propositions he cites a number of American cases. . . . As to the second proposition stated by Wigmore, that persons may give evidence of their own age, he cites no English or Canadian authorities in support of it, but does cite one Canadian case against the proposition: Doe v. Ford, 3 U. C. Q. B. 352. Robinson, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court said: 'Now, that depends upon what the fact was with regard to the age of Matthew Hender- son at the time of making his will; he died a few days afterwards. The evidence is certainly strong to show that he was only about nineteen years of age, and though there is some evidence to the contrary yet it is much less circumstantial and satisfactory. Still, we should not have disturbed the verdict if it had not seemed to us most probable that the jury were much influenced by the evidence given of the declarations of the deceased Matthew Henderson in regard to his own age, which declarations we consider were not admissible in evidence, for they regarded a fact of which he could not have any personal knowledge, namely, the exact time of his own birth.' . . . I am therefore of the opinion that there was no evidence of the age of the girl to go to the jury." On the other hand in Rex v. Spera, 34 Ont. L. Rep. 539, the American rule was recognized by the court and it was held that the mother of the witness being dead, her own statement as to her age, which was corroborated by one who had known her for a long time, was admissible.

CHAMBERS

v.

PRESTON ET AL.

Tennessee Supreme Court—March 23, 1917.

137 Tenn. 324; 193 S. W. 109.

Equitable Conversion — Testamentary Direction for Future Sale.

A will devising the use of land as a loan to the testator's wife to be sold by the executors on her death or on the son's attaining majority, and the proceeds thereof to be distributed among the children, operates to convert the realty into personalty as of the date of the testator's death.

[See note at end of this case.]

Reconversion — How Accomplished.

The beneficial owner of real estate which has been equitably converted into personalty has the power by word or act to reconvert it into realty, but his words or acts to have such effect must be unequivocal, and clearly indicate the purpose to countermand the trust.

Same.

There can be no reconversion except by unequivocal act or declaration of the owner of the entire beneficial interest, and persons under disability are incapable of making such election.

Same.

Where testator by will converted realty to personalty, and one heir mortgaged his interest, which was also levied on by certain creditors, and court proceedings were had, and his interest was sold and bid in by the other legatees, and partition was had, there is no reconversion of the personalty into realty, especially where certain remaindermen in interest were not made parties to the partition suit.

Parties — Virtual Representation.

In a partition suit, where actual appearance of minor children in interest of certain legatees could have been enforced, their interest cannot be bound by the judgment on the theory of virtual representation.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Sumner county: STOUT, Chancellor.

Action by John H. Chambers, plaintiff, against M. S. Preston et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Wm. A. Guild and Baskerville & Collier for appellant.

George W. Boddoo, B. G. Ellis and Pitts & McConnico for appellees.

[326] GREEN, J.—This bill was filed by the complainant, John H. Chambers, to recover a reversionary interest in lands in Sumner county alleged to have accrued to him under the will of his father, John Chambers. The chancellor dismissed his bill, and he has appealed to this court.

John Chambers died in Sumner county in 1863, leaving a large estate which he disposed of by will. Among other property he owned a tract of land of about 390 acres, and it is to recover an interest in this tract of land or portions thereof that the bill in this case is filed.

The first item of the will directs the payment of debts of the testator and other items of the will pertinent to this litigation are as follows:

"2nd. I loan to my wife, Mary H., the tract of land on which I now live, containing about 390 acres; also the use of my stock, household and kitchen furniture and farming utensils until my youngest child, Walter R. Chambers, arrives at the age of twenty-one years; at that time my wife, Mary H., if living, is to select of the stock, household and kitchen furniture and farming utensils as may be necessary for her comfort, which I have give to her absolutely. And the balance of said stock, etc., is to be sold on a credit of twelve months; my executor is also to sell said land at that time, or at the death of my wife, on a credit of one [327] and two years. The proceeds of said sale and other property is to be distributed and hereinafter provided, among my wife and children. I also loan to my wife, Mary H., my negroes, Ned, Dick, Ben, Lucky, Rose and infant child, Matilda, during her natural life, and at her death said slaves and increase are to be disposed of as hereinafter provided. My wife is to furnish my children, Martha, Mary, Sarah and Walter, a saddle horse each, free of charge, as they arrive at age or marry; she is also to complete the education free of charge of my children as have not finished their education at my death.

"3rd. I loan to my daughter, Ann C. Dickerson, my slaves, Lorene and child Lizzie, and a boy, William. To my daughter, Rebecca Shelby, I have given a negro girl, Mittie, four mules, one mare and seven hundred and twenty-five acres of land in Texas and some other property. I loan to my daughter, Martha A., my negroes, Marcia and child, Andrew, a boy Ned. I loan to my daughter Mary J., my slaves, George, Kitty and Alice. I loan to my daughter Sarah, my slaves, Wade, Mary Ann and Henry. I also loan to each of my said daughters an interest with my sons and wife in the proceeds of the land and other property mentioned in clause 2nd and a like interest in all other property I may die possessed of and during their natural lives, to be for the sole and separate use of each of them, free from the contracts and liabilities of their respective husbands, and at the death of my said daughters, thus loaned to them I give and bequeath [328] to their respective children and their heirs, the issue of any child to represent such child. Should any one or more of my daughters die without issue, or the children of such, then the property herein given to such daughters I give to their remaining brothers and sisters.

"4th. I give to my son, John Chambers, my slaves, Polly and Eliza, and to my son Walter R. Chambers, my slaves, Rubin, Adelina and Iona. I also give to my sons an equal interest each in land and other property mentioned in clause 2nd. And also an equal interest in all other property I may die possessed of, to them and their heirs.

"5th. Should my wife be living at the time my son Walter R. arrives at age, then I give and bequeath to her an equal interest with my sons and daughters in the proceeds of my land ordered to be sold, to be hers absolutely. Should she die before that time, then the land is to be sold and divided as herein provided."

The testator left surviving him his widow, Mrs. Mary Chambers, and seven children, as follows: John H. Chambers, Walter Chambers, Sally Chambers, who afterwards married Overton, Martha Chambers, who afterwards married Abbott, Ann. Chambers, who became Abbott's second wife on the death of her sister, Martha, Rebecca Chambers, who married Shelby, and Mary Chambers.

The complainant has outlived all of his brothers and sisters. Neither Mary nor Ann left children or the issue of children. Complainant is a very old man [329] being eighty-six years of age at the time his deposition was taken herein. Shortly after the war he left Sumner county, and has resided since in Texas, Oklahoma, and elsewhere. For many years his family heard nothing of him, and supposed he was dead. On the supposition that complainant was dead, this tract of land, after a partition hereafter referred to, has been dealt with and transferred from time to time, and those portions formerly belonging to Mary and Ann, in which complainant now seeks to establish a right, are in the hands of innocent purchasers, who have made extensive improvements thereon. In the conveyances of the land no account was taken of complainant's reversionary interest inasmuch as he was thought to have died without issue.

It is insisted for the defendants that the will of John Chambers, the father, effected a conversion of the said tract of land from realty into personalty, and that complainant's remedy, if any he has, is against the representatives of his sisters Ann and Mary. These sisters made conveyances, as before stated, in disregard of complainant's reversionary interest. It is conceded that complainant has no right to recover the land if it was indeed converted into personalty by the will of his father, and disbursed by the two sisters, unless certain acts of the parties amounted to a reconversion.

We think the will of John Chambers did not accomplish a conversion of the tract of land into personalty.

[330] By the second clause of said will heretofore quoted, the said tract, together with other property, was loaned to testator's wife "until my youngest child, Walter R. Chambers, arrives at the age of twenty-one years," and at that time the executor was directed to sell said land, or at the death of testator's wife, on a credit of one and two years. Testator then directed that the "proceeds of said sale and other property is to be distributed as hereinafter provided among my wife and children."

In the third section of the will this language appears:

"I also loan to each of my said daughters an interest with my sons and wife in the proceeds of the land and other property mentioned in clause 2nd, and a like interest in all property I may die possessed of during their natural life to be for the sole and separate use of each of them," etc.

In the fifth clause of the will it was provided that if the widow should be living at the time Walter R. Chambers arrived at age, then she was to be given an equal interest with the sons and daughters in the proceeds of the land ordered to be sold to be hers absolutely. This clause then contained the following:

"Should she die before that time the land is to be sold and divided as herein provided."

We think that the foregoing was an explicit, imperative, and an unequivocal direction to the executor of testator to sell the land and divide the proceeds as indicated by the will. The sale was to be made at all events when Walter R. Chambers arrived at the [331] age of twenty-one years, or if the widow died sooner the sale was to be made and the proceeds divided upon her death.

There seems to be no doubt of the testator's intention, and the language used by him was sufficient to accomplish an equitable conversion of the tract of land. Wayne v. Fouts, 108 Tenn. 145, 65 S. W. 471; Wheless v. Wheless, 92 Tenn. 295, 21 S. W. 595; Bedford v. Bedford, 110 Tenn. 204, 75 S. W. 1017; Bennett v. Gallaher, 115 Tenn. 568, 92 S. W. 66; Stephenson v. Yandle, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 109; McCormick v. Cantrell, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 615; Campbell v. Campbell, 3 Head (Tenn.) 325; Reynolds v. Brandon, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 593.

There was no contingency as to the sale of this land. It was directed to be sold at a definite future time, namely, when the youngest son reached the age of twenty-one years, or earlier, upon the death of the widow, if she died prior to the son's majority. The rule is established in Tennessee that where land is directed to be sold at a definite future time it is to be regarded as converted into personality as of the time of the testator's death. Green v. Davidson, 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 488; Bennett v. Gallaher, 115 Tenn. 568, 92 S. W. 66.

The great weight of authority is to this effect. Note, 17 Ann. Cas. 643, and note, Ann. Cas. 1915D 434.

It is contended, however, for the complainant that, although the will may have brought about a conversion [332] of testator's real estate, a reconversion was thereafter effected by certain proceedings we now detail.

We first observe that the beneficial owner of real estate, equitably converted into personality has the power by his words and acts to reconvert it into realty and stamp it with the character of realty at any time before an actual sale of the land. To have such an effect, however, the words and acts of the beneficial owner must be unequivocal and clearly indicate his purpose to countermand the trust. Wayne v. Fouts, 108 Tenn. 145, 65 S. W. 471.

The complainant gave a mortgage on his interest in the aforesaid real estate, and this interest likewise was levied on by certain of his creditors. Court proceedings were had, and the said interest of the complainant was sold and bid in by the other legatees of the testator. Thereafter about 1859, in a cause pending in the chancery court of Sumner county, a petition was filed by A. W. Overton and wife, Sally (Chambers) Overton, John Shelby and wife, Rebecca (Chambers) Shelby, Ann (Chambers) Abbott, Mary H. Chambers, Walter Chambers, and Mrs. Mary Chambers, against Reginald Abbott. The complainants were the widow and all of the children of the testator except John H. Chambers and Mrs. Martha Abbott. Mrs. Martha Abbott had died leaving a son, Reginald Abbott, who was made a defendant to the said petition as aforesaid.

In this petition it was recited that the petitioners had acquired the interest of John H. Chambers in the [333] tract of land left by their father; that the executor had endeavored to sell the land, but had not been able to get a suitable offer; reference was made to the will of John Chambers, and it was asked that the petitioners be permitted to partition in kind the tract of land among them. It appears to have been assumed in this petition that the parties before the court represented all the beneficial interests in the land, and a reference was asked to determine whether such partition in kind would be to the advantage of Reginald Abbott, the minor defendant son of Mrs. Martha Abbott, deceased.

A reference was ordered, and the master reported that such partition in kind would be to the advantage of the minor, and this report was confirmed, partition made, and by appropriate decree the various parties before the court were assigned portions of the tract of land in severalty.

It is urged by the complainant that these proceedings had the effect of reconverting the converted land into real estate.

It is said in the case of Wayne v. Fouts, supra, that the doctrine of reconversion is not so familiar as the doctrine of equitable conversion. Still the principles of the former doctrine are well established. In Wayne v. Fouts this court said:

"Of course, the burden of establishing a countermand of the trust, a reconversion of the estate, is upon those who assert it. They must show the election claimed, by proof of some unequivocal act or [334] declaration of the beneficiaries, evincing an intention on their part to extinguish the trust and terminate the equitable character impressed upon the property in the first instance of the instrument conferring the benefit."

In 2 Jarman on Wills, 191 (quoted in Wayne v. Fouts), it is said:

"That in order to amount to an election to take property in its actual, as contradistinguished from its eventual, or destined, state, the act must be such as to absolutely determine and extinguish the converting trust, and hence it would seem to follow that where two or more persons are interested in the property, it is not in the power of any one coproprietor to change its character, in regard even to his own share; for, as the act of the whole world be requisite to put to the trust, nothing less will suffice to impress upon the property a transmissible quality, foreign to that which it had received from the testator."

The supreme court of the United States used this language:

"Thus, where the whole beneficial interest in the money in the one case, or in the land in the other, belongs to the person for whose use it is given, a court of equity will not compel the trustee to execute the trust against the wishes of the cestui que trust, but will permit him to take the money or the land if he elect to do so before the conversion has actually been made; and this election he may make, as well by acts or declarations, clearly indicating a determination [335] to that effect, as by application to a court of equity. It is this election, and not the mere right to make it, which changes the character of the estate so as to make it real or personal, at the will of the party entitled to the beneficial interest. If this election be not made in time to stamp the property with a character different from that which the will or other instrument gives it, the latter accompanies it, with all its legal consequences, into the hands of those entitled to it in that character. So that in the case of the death of the cestui que trust, without having determined his election, the property will pass to his heirs or personal representatives, in the same manner as it would have done had the trust been executed, and the conversion actually made in his lifetime." Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 578, 579, 4 U. S. (L. ed.) 460, 464.

The following appears in Ruling Case Law:

"Moreover, if any of the beneficiaries are incapable of making an election—that is, if they are infants, or lunatics, or incompetent, or otherwise disqualified from making contracts with reference to their property—there can be no reconversion of the estate. . . . Only those who are not incapacitated sui juris, for dealing with their own property effectively, may elect to have a reconversion; and where the interest of a person properly qualified so to elect is absolute and wholly vested in himself, there is no doubt of his right so to elect, no matter whether the conversion intended was that of land into money or money into land." 6 R. C. L. 1091.

[336] To like effect see Baker v. Copenbarger, 15 Ill. 103, 58 Am. Dec. 600; Ukiah Bank v. Rise, 143 Cal. 265, 76 Pac. 1020, 101 Am. St. Rep. 118; Ebey v. Adams, 135 Ill. 80, 25 N. E. 1013, 10 L.R.A. 162; 9 Cyc. 85 et seq.

It would seem from these authorities that there can be no reconversion except by unequivocal act or declaration of the owners of the entire beneficial interest, and that persons under disability are incapable of making such an election. This indeed is conceded by counsel for complainant, but they insist that the court, in the partition suit, after hearing proof, made an election for the minor defendant to reconvert.

It is said that these proceedings so far as the adult parties were concerned, unmistakably indicated an election on their part to take the land in its original form; that the action of the court upon the reference accomplished a reconversion as to the minor's interest; that although complainant was not a party, he had theretofore by a mortgage of his interest in the tract of land elected to take it as real estate and thereby reconverted his interest, or if his interest was not in this way reconverted, such interest had passed to the parties to this suit, and was reconverted along with their original interest by the proceedings just mentioned.

There are two cases in which a reconversion was ordered by the court for an infant when it appeared to the advantage of the latter, namely, Swann v. Garrett, 71 Ga. 566, and Robinson v. Robinson, 19 Beav. (Eng.) 494.

[337] In the latter case there was no discussion of the question. In the Georgia case there was a vigorous dissent.

If it be true that a court of equity in Tennessee has the power to make an election for an infant in such cases and to decree for him a reconversion of converted realty, nevertheless we think the proceedings relied on by the complainant failed to reach the result ascribed to them for several reasons.

In the first place, as said of proceedings discussed in Wayne v. Fouts, supra, the question of reconversion was not presented in the pleadings nor adjudged in the decree. While the petition referred to the will of John Chambers, yet the matter was presented rather as if the land itself had been devised to the parties interested, and the particular attention of the court was not called to the conversion directed by the testator. The decree certainly did not directly adjudge the propriety of a countermand of the testamentary trust, nor do we think that the effect of the decree was to bring about such a result, inasmuch as the parties before the court did not represent the entire beneficial interest involved, nor did said decree, in any way, protect the contingent remaindermen.

The daughters of the testator took only a life estate in the property bequeathed to them with remainder "to their respective children and their heirs, the issue of any child to represent such child." It was further provided in the will that should any of the daughters die without issue or children of such, then [338] the property given to them was to go to their remaining brothers and sisters.

It appears almost certainly from the deposition of John H. Chambers and otherwise in the record that at the time of the partition suit Mrs. Rebecca Chambers Shelby had children, and likewise Mrs. Sally Chambers Overton had children. These two daughters were merely life tenants. Their children, who were first takers in remainder, were not made parties. The case progressed as if these daughters were absolute owners instead of life tenants. The rights of the Shelby and Overton children were not noticed.

It is contended, however, by complainant that the doctrine of virtual representation should here find application and all interests treated as having been before the court.

This doctrine may be invoked to bind the interests of parties uncertain, indeterminable, or not in being at the time of suit. Respecting the rights of the Shelby and Overton children, they should have been brought in. They were known and available. There is no room for virtual representation when actual appearance can be enforced. Likewise, under our rule, these children were necessary parties to a suit to pass the estate of the contingent remaindermen.

We had occasion to discuss virtual representation in the late case of Bransford Realty Co. v. Andrews, 128 Tenn. 725, 164 S. W. 1175, and there said:

"It is well settled that contingent limitations and executory devises to persons not in being, or uncertain [339] and indeterminable at the time of the proceedings, may be bound by a decree against the person then claiming the vested estate. In suits to enforce a trust, or with reference to trust property, so limited in remainder, if the holder of the legal title, the life tenant, and the persons in being in whom the remainder would become a vested estate if the life estate then fell in—all these are parties, a valid decree may be pronounced."

The foregoing rule was deduced from Andrews v. Andrews, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 234; Freeman v. Freeman, 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 301; Rutherford v. Rutherford, 116 Tenn. 383, 92 S. W. 1112, 115 Am. St. Rep. 799.

The partition suit relied on by complainant fell short of the requirements laid down above. There were persons in being in whom the remainder would have become a vested estate if the life estate had then fallen in, to wit, the children of Mrs. Shelby and of Mrs. Overton.

In the other particular indicated, the partition suit failed to comply with the rules as to the conversion of an estate with contingent limitations in favor of indeterminable parties. In Ridley v. Halliday, 106 Tenn. 607, 619, 61 S. W. 1025, 53 L.R.A. 477, 82 Am. St. Rep. 902, it is said to be essential in every such case, that the interest of the contingent remainderman in the proceeds of the converted property be preserved by the decree directing the conversion. A decree which fails so to preserve the interest [340] of virtually represented contingent remaindermen is not binding on them. As heretofore pointed out, the petition and the decrees relied on by complainant seemed to assume that all the parties to the suit had absolute interests in the property dealt with, and ignored the rights of the contingent remaindermen altogether. These proceedings therefore did not, and could not, have amounted to a transmutation of the contingent interest in this estate, and thereby no reconversion was accomplished.

It results that the chancellor correctly dismissed the complainant's bill, and his decree will be affirmed.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that a testamentary direction for the sale of realty when the testator's youngest son reaches his majority, or on the death of the testator's widow, whichever event first occurs, operates to convert the land into personalty as of the date of the death. The earlier cases discussing the time when conversion takes place under a will directing a sale at a future time are reviewed in the notes to Beaver v. Ross, 17 Ann. Cas. 640; Greenman v. McVey, Ann. Cas. 1915D 430; and Ford v. Ford, 5 Am. St. Rep. 117.

It is also held in the reported case that the doctrine of virtual representation does not warrant the omission as parties to a partition suit of remaindermen who are in being and in whom the remainder will become a vested estate if the life estate falls in. For a discussion of the equitable doctrine of virtual representation, see the note to Leviness v. Consolidated Gas, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1913O 649.

BARTHOLOMEW

v.

TOWN OF SPRINGDALE.

Washington Supreme Court—June 9, 1916.

91 Wash. 408; 157 Pac. 1090.

Public Officers — Right to Compensation — Failure to Approve Bond.

Under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7722, requiring the marshal in towns of the fourth class, before entering upon his official duties, to execute a bond to the town, and providing that the bond shall be approved by the council, a marshal appointed, giving bond and oath and entering upon and performing the duties of his office is entitled to salary as marshal de jure, notwithstanding failure of the council to approve his bond.

Effect of Neglect of Duty.

The right of a de jure officer to salary is not affected by the quantity of services rendered by him or even neglect to render them where such failure falls short of actual abandonment of the office.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Stevens county: JACKSON, Judge.

Action by C. E. Bartholomew, plaintiff, against Town of Springdale, defendant. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Jesseph & Bourland for appellant.

J. B. Slater and Carey & Johnson for respondent.

[408] PARKER, J.—The plaintiff, C. E. Bartholomew, seeks recovery of the sum of $720 from the defendant, Town of Springdale, which he claims as the salary attaching to the office of marshal of the town while he was the incumbent of that office for the period of one year. Trial before the superior court of Stevens county sitting with a jury resulted in verdict and judgment for the sum of $300, from which the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

Counsel for appellant contend he is entitled to have judgment rendered in his favor for the full amount of salary claimed by him, and that the trial court erred in refusing to [409] so rule, as a matter of law, upon motion made by his counsel for a directed verdict immediately following the announcement of counsel for respondent that they rested their case.

We note that, after the denial of this motion by the court, some rebuttal evidence was introduced in appellant's behalf, and also some sur-rebuttal evidence introduced in respondent's behalf; but none of this additional evidence, as we view it, had any bearing whatever upon the undisputed facts which we regard as determinative of the question of whether or not appellant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, as in effect asked for in his motion for directed verdict. Therefore, if the trial court committed error in refusing to direct a verdict in appellant's favor when requested so to do, such error was not cured by anything appearing in the rebuttal and sur-rebuttal evidence introduced thereafter.

The undisputed facts determinative of appellant's right to judgment as a matter of Ann. Cas. 1918B.—28.

law may be summarized as follows: On February 3, 1912, the mayor of the Town of Springdale appointed appellant marshal of the town. This appointment was evidenced by a communication addressed to appellant by the mayor stating "I hereby appoint you town marshal of the town of Springdale, Wash." This appointment was unqualified by other language and is silent as to the time it became effective, so far as the giving of bond and taking of the oath of office by appellant is concerned. At that time, there was in force in the town an ordinance fixing the salary of the town marshal at $60 per month, and there was also at that time in force an ordinance fixing the amount of the official bond required to be furnished by the town marshal at $300. On the same day, appellant executed and deposited with the town clerk his official bond in the sum of $300, conditioned as the ordinance and Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7722 (P. C. 77 § 371), require. The bond was executed by two sureties with appellant, who, by affidavit in due form indorsed thereon, stated they were each worth $600 over and above [410] all liabilities, in separate property situated within the state not exempt from execution. There was also indorsed upon this bond appellant's oath of office in due form, sworn to before a notary public. Some controversy arose as to whether or not this bond was formally approved by the town council as required by Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7722. The evidence upon this question was rejected, however, by the trial court, evidently because the approval claimed by appellant to have been had was at a meeting of the council where there was not a quorum of qualified members of the council present. We will therefore proceed as though the town council never formally approved the bond by proper evidencing of such approval upon their minutes or by indorsement upon the bond. From that time until February 3, 1913, no other person was appointed to the office of marshal. During all this period of one year, appellant claimed and held himself out to be marshal of the town, and at least in some substantial measure performed the duties pertaining to that office. There is some conflict in the evidence as to the extent of such performance, but that no one else was legally authorized to perform or performed such duties is certain. We may add that appellant had possession of the personal property of the town used by the incumbent of the office, such as star, handcuffs, club, etc. It also inferentially appears that he had possession of the town jail. It is undisputed in any event that he put persons in the jail, assuming in doing so to act as marshal.

Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7722, relating to the qualifications of officers of towns of the fourth class, to which class the town of Springdale belongs, so far as necessary to here notice the provisions thereof, reads:

"The clerk, treasurer, and marshal shall respectively, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, execute a bond to such town in such penal sum as the council by ordinance may determine, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties; . . . such bonds shall be approved [411] by the council. . . . Every officer of such town, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall take and file with the clerk the constitutional oath of office."

It is plain from a reading of this section that appellant in receiving his appointment, depositing with the town clerk his bond and oath of office, and the entering upon his duties as marshal, became an officer de jure with all the powers, and entitled to all the emoluments of the office, unless we are to hold otherwise because of the fact that his bond was not formally approved by the town council. That the failure on the part of the council to formally approve his bond did not prevent him from becoming an officer de jure, we think is determined by the decision of this court in State v. Carroll, 57 Wash. 202, 106 Pac. 748. The office there involved was civil service commissioner of the city of Seattle. Chealander, the appointee, did not then, nor thereafter, give and file the bond required by the city charter before entering upon the duties of such office. Touching the question of whether or not Chealander was a de jure or merely a de facto officer, Justice Fullerton, speaking for the court, at page 208 of the decision, said:

"The failure to give a bond does not render an officer duly elected or appointed a de facto officer. He is a de jure officer holding by a defeasible title. Foot v. Stiles, 57 N. Y. 399. The giving of a bond is a mere ministerial act for the security of the government, and not a condition precedent to the officer's authority to act, unless especially made so by statute. Glavey v. U. S. 182 U. S. 595. The courts generally hold that, even though the statute expressly provides that, upon a failure to give a bond within the time prescribed, the office shall be deemed vacant and may be filled by appointment, the default is a ground for forfeiture only, not forfeiture ipso facto, and that if, notwithstanding such default, the state or other power sees fit to excuse the delinquency by granting the officer his commission, the defects of his title are cured, and it is a title de jure having relation back to the time of his election or appointment."

[412] The earlier decision of State v. Ruff, 4 Wash. 234, 29 Pac. 999, 16 L.R.A. 140, lends support to this view.

Now, § 7722, above quoted, requires only that the marshal shall "execute a bond to such town" before entering upon the duties of his office, not that such bond shall be approved by the council before entering upon the duties of his office. Manifestly, then, when appellant so executed and delivered to the town clerk his official bond, sufficient upon its face as to form and qualification of sureties, as this bond plainly was, he had performed every duty required of him by § 7722 as a prerequisite to his right to enter upon the duties of his office. Plainly the delivery to the town clerk was a delivery to the town, and also a delivery to the council for its approval. It is not claimed that the counsel ever affirmatively rejected this bond or demanded of appellant another or different bond. It may be that the council could have required another bond, so far as the sufficiency of the sureties are concerned, and that the failure on the part of appellant to furnish a bond such that the qualifications of the sureties would meet the council's approval would be cause for his removal from the office of marshal; but that is foreign to the question of appellant then being the lawful incumbent of the office of marshal. It seems quite clear to us that appellant was, during the year for which he claims salary, the marshal de jure.

It seems plain from the authorities that the quantity of service rendered by a de jure officer, or even the question of neglect to render the official services required of him, in any event when such failure falls short of an actual abandonment of the office, is wholly immaterial to the question of his right to the salary or compensation which the law attaches to the office; this, manifestly upon the theory that the question of his right to compensation is not a question of contract. The question was considered learnedly and at some length in the supreme court of Iowa in Bryan v. Cattell, 15 Ia. 538. [413] That case involved an attempt to collect salary by a district attorney from the state, the auditor declining to issue the warrant therefore because of his absence from the state and neglect of the duties of that office. Recognizing the possible wrong and injustice to the state, but there being no statute providing for the deduction or forfeiture of salary for the cause which there appeared and which might be considered as morally entitling the state to resist payment of the salary, the court observed, on page 552, as follows:

"It must be remembered, however, that we are dealing with a practical, and not an abstract, question. And practically, the difficulty in the view suggested is, that it would be impossible to tell where the true line should be drawn. That is to say, how long an absence from official duties—how great delinquency shall work a forfeiture of salary. In the absence of statute, shall it be one day, or one week, or one month, or one year? Where shall faithfulness end, and delinquency begin? Add to these considerations the fact, that it is frequently impossible to tell to what extent the services of the officers were necessary, at the time covered by the supposed delinquency, and the propriety of the rule which entitles the officer to his salary so long as he remains in office, becomes reasonably manifest. The better and safer rule doubtless is, that if he is in point of law actually in office, he has a legal right to the salary pertaining to it. His conduct may be such as to render him liable to removal, but when the statute makes no deduction for absence or neglect of duty, and the state takes no step as a consequence of such absence or delinquency, we suppose it is the legal right of the officer to demand the full salary allowed him by law."

The reason of this doctrine is rendered evident by the general rule stated in Throop on Public Officers, in § 443, as follows:

"It has been often held, that an officer's right to his compensation does not grow out of a contract between him and the state, or the municipality by which it is payable. The compensation belongs to the officer, as an incident of his office, and he is entitled to it, not by force of any contract, but because the law attaches it to the office."

[414] See also Mechem, Public Officers, § 855, and 29 Cyc. 1423.

The undisputed facts which bring this case within this doctrine are: Appellant's appointment, his bond and official oath on file with the town clerk, which are record facts; and also the undisputed fact that appellant held himself out and assumed to act as town marshal, having possession of such property of the town as usually attaches to such an office. The conflicting evidence has only to do with the extent of the official duties performed by appellant as town marshal, but even as to that, there is no evidence in this record tending to show that he neglected to perform all such duties as he was called upon to perform or that were necessary for him to perform.

We cannot escape the conclusion that appellant was the town marshal de jure and, as such, entitled to the salary which by law attached to that office during the year claimed, that he was entitled to the ruling for an instructed verdict as asked for when respondent rested its case, and that the rebuttal and sur-rebuttal evidence thereafter introduced did not cure the error of the court in denying appellant's motion for a directed verdict.

Some claim is made in appellant's complaint touching the matter of interest upon his unpaid salary. The question is not, however, presented here by either argument or citation of authority. We therefore give it but passing attention without assuming to lay down any rule of law relative to cases of this kind, and conclude that appellant is entitled to interest upon his year's salary of $720 at the legal rate of six per cent from the 13th day of September, 1913, the date of filing his complaint in this action. He may be technically entitled to interest commencing at an earlier date, but under all the circumstances, we conclude to fix this as the date of the commencement of his interest.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the superior court with direction to enter judgment in appellant's [415] favor and against respondent for $720, with legal interest thereon from September 13, 1913.

Introductory.

This note discusses the cases dealing with the effect of the neglect of duty by a public officer on his right to salary. The term "neglect of duty" as used here refers not only to a voluntary failure to perform the services called for by an office, but also to a prevention of performance of duties by the acts of others. The general rule deducible from the cases is that a public officer is entitled to the compensation attached to the office as long as he is the lawful incumbent thereof, though he does not perform the duties thereof, either through his own fault or because he has been wrongfully excluded or ousted from it. The rule rests on the reason that the officer's right to compensation is statutory and not contractual.

In State v. Gordon, 245 Mo. 12, 149 S. W. 638, the court said: "Compensation to a public officer is a matter of statute, not of contract; and it does not depend upon the amount or value of services performed, but is incidental to the office. Throop on Public Officers (sec. 443) says: 'It has been often held, that an officer's right to his compensation does not grow out of a contract between him and the state. The compensation belongs to the officer, as an incident of his office, and he is entitled to it, not by force of any contract, but because the law attaches it to the office.' Mechem on Public Offices and Officers says: 'Sec. 855. As has been seen, the relation between the officer and the public is not the creature of contract, nor is the office itself a contract. So his right to compensation is not the creature of contract. It exists, if it exists at all, as the creation of the law, and when it so exists, it belongs to him "not by force of any contract, but because the law attaches it to the office." The most that can be said is that there is a contract to pay him such compensation as may from time to time be by law attached to the office. 'Sec. 856. Unless, therefore, compensation is by law attached to the office, none can be recovered. A person who accepts an office to which no compensation is attached is presumed to undertake to serve gratuitously, and he cannot recover anything upon the ground of an implied contract to pay what the service is worth.'"

See also Bennett v. Orange, 69 N. J. L. 176, 54 Atl. 249, wherein it was said: "But it must be remembered that the officer's right to compensation does not grow out of a contract between him and the municipality by which it is payable. The compensation belongs to him, not by force of any contract, but because the law attaches it to the office. . . . And where a salary thus attaches to an office the right to it is not affected by a diminution of the duties of the office—the office itself remaining."

Office Not Abandoned.

IN ABSENCE OF STATUTE.

When an officer does not abandon his office, the fact that he does not perform all or any of its duties will not affect his right to the salary attached thereto unless a statute otherwise provides.

Washington.—See the reported case.

Thus in MacFarlane v. Damon, 8 Hawaii 19, the court said: "As to the third ground of defense, i. e., that the petitioner has not performed the duties of the office, and has been absent from the country during a large part of the time for which he claims to be paid, I feel, as I have suggested above, that the best remedy for such a state of things is to dismiss the official so failing to perform. But it seems to me that a person holding an office is entitled to the pay of the office in full, so long as he remains in it. To admit that the minister of finance has the discretion to call an official to account for lost time or incompetent performance, and investigate his official record with a view to pay him only for work actually performed, and to discount his salary accordingly, would place upon his shoulders, in addition to his other responsibilities, a duty so onerous and uncertain and easily capable of abuse as to render its performance well-nigh impracticable, and its attempt inconsistent with public policy. The obvious remedy for official dereliction is dismissal, which is one of the arguments before stated for the necessity of a responsible appointing power. A decrease by the executive of the salary of an official, fixed by law, would be in the nature of an interference with the legislation, the legislature being the sole judge of the value to the government of the work pertaining to any office."

In People v. Bradford, 267 Ill. 486, 108 N. E. 732, it was said: "The law is well settled in this state that the right to the salary is attached to and follows the legal title to the office. This is true irrespective of the question by whom the services were, in fact, actually rendered. . . . In City of Chicago v. Luthardt [191 Ill. 516] supra, it is said: 'The legal right to the office carries with it the right to the salary or emoluments of the office. The salary follows the legal title. This doctrine is so generally held by the courts that authorities hardly need be cited.' While this rule has been most frequently announced and applied in suits between de jure and de facto officers over the salary to an office, it is nevertheless a basic principle of law and one of general application. It has been so applied not only in cases of protracted absence and nonperformance of duties, . . . but in cases of actual suspension from office. . . . An officeholder may recover the full amount of the salary accruing during the time of his suspension, without any deduction of the amount he may have earned in other employments during that time. . . . That the duties of appellee's office were actually performed by someone is disputed. Had they been performed by a mere intruder or interloper, without warrant or authority of law, the right of appellee to recover such salary must be conceded. . . . That these duties may have been performed by the other commissioners under a claim of right and lawful authority to do so does not alter the situation. This would be true, also, in the case of a de facto officer."

In Leonard v. Terre Haute, 48 Ind. App. 104, 93 N. E. 872, the court said: "The salary of an official position belongs to the officer occupying such position as an incident to the office, and does not depend upon his performance of the duties of the office. The statute makes provision for the chief of the fire force. It also provides for his appointment, the manner of fixing his compensation, and the proceedings by which he can be removed. His duties are of a public nature. We therefore conclude that the duties of the chief of the fire force or a member of the department are so far official in their character that one holding either position is entitled to draw his salary as an incident to such position, whether he performs the duties of such position or not."

In Bryan v. Cattell, 15 Ia. 538, it was said: "It seems to us, the dictate of reason and good conscience, that the state should not be required to pay for services never rendered; that public officers should be paid their salaries when and only when they discharged the duties imposed upon them by law; that the same rule should apply to the state as to individuals, and that no court ought to consent to the auditing of a demand against the state where it was admitted that the claimant made no pretense of having rendered the services for which he claims. It must be remembered, however, that we are dealing with a practical, and not an abstract, question. And practically, the difficulty in the view suggested is, that it would be impossible to tell where the true line should be drawn. That is to say, how long an absence from official duties—how great delinquency shall work a forfeiture of salary. In the absence of statute, shall it be one day, or one week, or one month, or one year? Where shall faithfulness end, and delinquency begin? Add to these considerations the fact that it is frequently impossible to tell to what extent the services of the officers were necessary, at the time covered by the supposed delinquency, and the propriety of the rule which entitles the officer to his salary so long as he remains in office, becomes reasonably manifest. The better and safer rule doubtless is, that if he is in point of law actually in office, he has a legal right to the salary pertaining to it. His conduct may be such as to render him liable to removal, but when the statute makes no deduction for absence or neglect of duty, and the state takes no step as a consequence of such absence or delinquency, we suppose it is the legal right of the officer to demand the full salary allowed him by law."

In Baker v. Nashua, 77 N. H. 347, 91 Atl. 872, it was said: "Although some courts hold that a de jure officer cannot recover under such circumstances when the salary has been paid to a de facto officer without notice of the former claim, most courts hold that the simple fact an officer de jure has not performed the duties of his office is no defense to an action to recover the salary attached to the office."

In Putman v. Custer County, 25 S. D. 542, 127 N. W. 641, the court said: "The decisions and textwriters, however, lay down the rule that, so long as an officer is permitted to remain in office he is entitled to the salary prescribed by law, even though his failure to perform his duties is made a crime, in the absence of a statute establishing a different rule."

In Reinhard's Case, 10 Ct. Cl. 282, it appeared that the plaintiff was a clerk in the United States Treasury Department. He handed in his resignation to take effect October 31st, having been given a leave of absence during October. It was held that he was entitled to his salary during that month notwithstanding he did not work.

In Dineen v. Bradford, 190 Ill. App. 289, it appeared that the plaintiff was duly elected and qualified as a city commissioner. The mayor and other members of the commission refused to pay him his salary alleging that he had not attended a meeting of the council for some time and had neglected to perform his duties. In an action to recover the salary, it was held that though the plaintiff had neglected all of his duties, it was his right to demand full salary for the term of his office if the statute under which he held office made no provision for such delinquency; and that the fact that he was not present at the council meetings did not affect his right to recover unless some one else had been paid to perform his duties.

In Miami County v. Collins, 47 Kan. 417, 28 Pac. 175, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed to the office of probate judge at a specified salary per annum. The statute under which he was appointed provided that he should perform certain acts, but also provided for his salary in terms absolute and unconditional. The plaintiff's claim for salary was rejected on the ground that he had not performed all of the duties laid on him by the statute. It was held that since the salary was not conditioned on the performance of the duties, he was entitled to his salary whether they were performed or not. The court said: "The terms of the statute are absolute and unconditional; his office is open, and he is in attendance day by day to discharge the additional duties imposed upon him by the act of the legislature. If the conditions are such that no labor is imposed upon him, this is no reason why we should disregard a plain command of the lawmaking power. Such a construction would involve the courts or the boards of county commissioners in prolonged investigations as to whether salaried officers of the state and county had performed all or any of the particular acts enumerated in the statute that are required of persons occupying these salaried positions."

In Goetting v. New York, 29 Misc. 717, 61 N. Y. S. 334, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed a justice of the municipal court. This office was intended to take the place of that of justices of the peace which was abolished a month after the plaintiff qualified. In an action to collect salary for that month it was held that the compensation was due from the moment the plaintiff had entered into office irrespective of how much work was performed, and that though he did not carry out any of its duties for a month he could recover. The court said: "The defendant contends that because the justices' courts and the office of justice of the peace in the borough of Brooklyn were not abolished until midnight of January 31, 1898 (Charter, §§ 1350, 1384), and the municipal court justices, who were to exercise on an enlarged plan the powers of the superseded officials, were not to have possession of the rooms assigned for holding their courts until February 1, 1898 (Id. § 1380), when the machinery of their courts was to go into full and active operations, the salary belonging to the office did not commence until that day. Such a result could follow only the mistaken notion that a fixed salary belonging to a judicial office must be earned by the incumbent before it is recoverable by him. Such a salary is not measured by the duties the official actually performs or is called upon to perform, and is recoverable without regard to the labors imposed or the manner of their performance. . . . There is no variation in official salaries on account of light or heavy work, or the total absence of work—a feature that may perhaps have attracted some to official life, and led to the repeated use of that much-abused term 'sinecure.'"

In Tanner v. Edwards, 31 Utah 80, 10 Ann. Cas. 1091, 86 Pac. 765, 120 Am. St. Rep. 919, it appeared that the relator was commissioned as state engineer by the governor, and he took the oath of office March 14th. He did not perform any duties until March 31st, and the auditor of public accounts refused to pay him his salary for the period prior to that date. The relator then applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the auditor to pay him this salary. It was held he was entitled to his salary from the time he was appointed and qualified.

Where a public officer is absent from illness, it is generally held that he may recover for the period that he is away and not working. Thus in O'Hara v. New York, 33 Misc. 53, 66 N. Y. S. 909, the court said: "While sickness may furnish sufficient reason for the removal of a public officer, when his absence on that account has been permitted he is entitled to compensation until some action is taken on the subject." See also Cavanee v. Milan, 99 Mo. App. 672, 74 S. W. 408; Minto v. New York, 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 384.

In Sleigh's Case, 9 Ct. Cl. 369, it appeared that the claimant was a clerk of the third class in the Treasury Department at Washington. A regulation of the department provided that when a clerk was absent from illness he must furnish a certificate of the attending physician, and the regulation did not authorize a stoppage of salary for such absence. The claimant was sick for 122 days and away from his desk, for which he had leave of absence with pay. After this time he again applied for a continued leave because of his sickness, but the department refused to pay him for the second leave of absence. The claimant brought his claim before the court of claims. It was held that he was entitled to compensation as long as he held his office, though he was disabled by illness from performing its duties. If he held his office at the will of the appointing power, the latter could remove him; but could not, in the absence of an express law or regulation, stop the compensation while the office was held. The court said: "The incumbent of an office is prima facie entitled to the lawful compensation thereof so long as he holds the office, though he may be disabled by disease or bodily injury from performing its duties. If it be an office held at the will of the appointing power, and that power does not see fit to have the compensation go on while the incumbent is so disabled, the only remedy, in the absence of express law or regulation authorizing the stoppage of the compensation during the disability, is to remove the incumbent and so end his right to compensation. If the appointing power suffers him to continue in office, notwithstanding the disability, he is entitled to the compensation. This right may be cut off by law or regulation authorizing it; but not by the act of the appointing power without the authority of law or regulation."

In People v. French, 91 N. Y. 265, the court said: "It would then appear that the salary is annexed to, or is an incident of, the office, and the relator entitled to it so long as he possesses the title to the office. It is not only fixed by statute, but the same laws provide (§ 43, supra) that the commissioners may 'fix the salary and compensation of such clerks other than policemen,' whom they may be authorized by law to appoint, and therefore by implication forbids them to enlarge or diminish the salary of one of the excepted class." See also O'Leary v. New York Board of Education, 93 N. Y. 1, 45 Am. Rep. 156.

In Brizzolari v. Crawford, 38 Ark. 218, it appeared that the petitioner had been duly appointed as special judge of the circuit court, and after the term of his office had expired the state auditor refused to pay him his salary on the ground that during the time he was alleged to have acted as special judge no business had been transacted. It was held that since he was duly appointed under a statute, he was entitled to his full salary regardless of the work he had performed; and that the auditor could not inquire into the amount of service rendered, or the degree of fidelity with which he had acted. See also Auditor v. Adams, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 150; Garrard v. Nuttall, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 106; Auditor v. Cochran, 9 Bush (Ky.) 7; Perkins v. Auditor, 79 Ky. 306; and Holder v. Sykes, 77 Miss. 64, 24 So. 261.

UNDER STATUTE.

In some jurisdictions statutes applicable to certain officers or certain municipalities provide that there shall be no compensation unless the duties of an office are actually performed. Under such an act an officer cannot recover compensation unless he has performed the duties of the office. Ricksecker v. Reno County, 83 Kan. 346, 111 Pac. 427; Wheatly v. Covington, 11 Bush (Ky.) 18; Wilkinson v. Saginaw, 111 Mich. 585, 70 N. W. 142, 3 Detroit Leg. N. 809; Hawkins v. Bay City, 149 Mich. 268, 112 N. W. 997, 14 Detroit Leg. N. 424; Smith v. New York, 37 N. Y. 518; Wilkes-Barre v. Meyers, 113 Pa. St. 395, 6 Atl. 110; Cox v. Oil City, 157 Pa. St. 613, 27 Atl. 786; Robbins v. Wilkes-Barre, 37 Pa. Super Ct. 382. See the preceding subdivision of this note for cases from the same jurisdictions involving officers to whom no such statute was applicable.

In Wheatly v. Covington, 11 Bush (Ky.) 18, the court said: "Where specific compensation is given by law to a public officer by way of fees or commissions, for the performance of specific duties, the true rule would seem to be that he is not entitled to the compensation unless he performs the services; . . . nor can he recover damages on account of having been prevented from performing the services whereby he would have earned the designated compensation."

In Ricksecker v. Reno County, 83 Kan. 346, 111 Pac. 427, it was held that where a statute provided that the salary of an officer was conditioned upon his performing the duties specified in the statute, he could not recover the salary, unless the duties had been performed.

In Robbins v. Wilkes-Barre, 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 382, it appeared that the plaintiff was an auditor of the borough of Wilkes-Barre and under a statute was entitled to $2.50 for each day's work. It was held that where he was prevented from performing the duties of his office even though wrongfully, he could not recover compensation for work not done.

In Wilkes-Barre v. Meyers, 113 Pa. St. 395, 6 Atl. 110, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed a policeman of the city of Wilkes-Barre. An ordinance of the city provided that patrolmen absent from duty without leave should forfeit their pay for the time of such absence except in cases of illness when properly certified by a physician. The plaintiff was absent for five months without leave because of illness, and he did not present the proper certificate. He brought an action to recover for salary during his illness. It was held that he could not recover because he had not performed any work, nor had he obeyed the conditions of the ordinance. The court said: "It is well settled that a person holding a public office has a prima facie right to the salary thereof, although he be physically disabled from performing his duties. If there be no law or regulation authorizing the discontinuance of the compensation during the disability, the only remedy is his removal. It may be granted that police officers are not excepted out of this general rule. But there was a regulation of the city providing that the officer absent from duty without leave should forfeit all pay during the time of such absence, except when sick and so certified by a physician. The plaintiff forebore to procure and give the certificate; the council forbore to remove him. Had he brought himself within the exception, the council at once might have ended liability by his removal. Under the circumstances the council preferred not to act. There is no pretense that his sickness was of such a nature as to prevent him procuring a certificate." See also Cox v. Oil City, 157 Pa. St. 613, 27 Atl. 783.

A statute providing for a deduction from the salary of a judge during a time when he is without fault on his part absent from his duties has been held to be in violation of a constitutional provision against the diminution of judicial salaries. White v. State, 123 Ala. 577, 26 So. 343, wherein it appeared that the petitioner was a regularly elected circuit court judge who had qualified as such. While engaged in holding his court, he received news of the serious illness of his mother which resulted in her death. During his absence as a result of this, he made arrangement for the attendance of a special judge. On his return, the auditor of the state refused to pay him his salary for the time he was away on the ground that a statute directed him to deduct from the judge's salary one-half of the amount due him during the time a special judge was required to sit for him. It was held that the statute was in violation of a constitutional provision forbidding the diminution of a circuit judge's salary; that he could not be deprived of his salary except for neglect of duty in his official capacity; and in order to constitute such neglect there must not only be a failure to perform from design or carelessness, but there must also be the capacity on the part of the judge to perform. The court said: "We are fully aware and we entertain no doubt of its correctness, that this court has repeatedly held, that the right to an office is not property, and that if it be one of legislative creation the office may be abolished by the creator without impairing any constitutional property rights of the incumbent. And so, too, it must be conceded that the people undoubtedly have the right by legal methods, such as a constitutional convention, to abolish the circuit courts, or depose an incumbent thereof, or diminish or destroy the amount of his compensation he was to receive when elected. But all this has nothing to do with the question of the property right of a circuit judge in and to the compensation secured to him under the constitution. The people have not abolished the court, the office, or deposed the judge, and the right to his salary becomes fixed upon his induction into office, and is immutably fixed, so long as the constitution is permitted to stand as the organic law, and he cannot be deprived of it or any portion of it, so long as he remains in the office, unless he has been guilty of neglect of duty in his official capacity. . . . There must be not only a failure by carelessness or design to perform the duty required to be performed, but the party failing must have the capacity to perform the acts required of him as they should be done, provided the incapacity is not superinduced by his fault or the result of his own misconduct. The nature of judicial duties is such, that a judge is under no duty to undertake the discharge of them when without his fault he is mentally or physically unfit to perform them. On the contrary, we may affirm, that when from any cause his physical or mental condition is such as to impair his capacity to discharge the responsible duties required of him, it is his duty not to undertake a performance of them; and this too, without reference to the cause which precipitated such incapacity. No one doubts that if his incapacitated condition is the result of his own act or misconduct, this would be a neglect of official duty. But if his condition is the result of the serious illness of his mother or other causes over which he has no control, providential in their character, it is not and cannot be a breach of duty but a misfortune to 'which all flesh is heir.' It is against the intent of the constitution and the policy of our government that he should attempt to determine the property rights of parties litigant or pass upon the rights of the commonwealth and the citizen charged with crime, involving the maintenance of the law to the end of depriving a citizen of life or liberty, when physically or mentally disabled. The character of his duties are too consequential in their results, of too great importance to a just administration of the law, and decisions rendered by him, and his manner of conducting the trials of causes are too potential in their moral effect upon the people, to say nothing of the consequences to litigants in his court, to punish him by a diminution of his salary for his failure to hold his court when his mental or physical condition, without fault on his part, is such as to render him incapable of doing so."

In Ex p. Tully, 4 Ark. 220, 38 Am. Dec. 33, it appeared that one of the circuit judges of the state failed to hold court as required by law, and the auditor in accordance with a statute withheld a part of his salary in order to meet the statutory forfeiture of $150 for failure to hold the court. The judge brought a writ of mandamus to compel the payment of his full compensation. It was held that the legislature under the constitution had no power to diminish the salary of a judge during the time for which he was elected, and therefore it could not affect his compensation indirectly by means of a forfeiture. The court said: "If the judges fail to do their duty they are liable to removal by address or impeachment. The constitution forbids their salary being taken from them or reduced in its amount. The legislature cannot effect, indirectly, what it is forbid to do directly. It is certainly a clear proposition, that the legislature cannot declare that the salary of the judges, upon a failure to discharge their duties, shall be forfeited to the state. To allow them to do that, necessarily makes them the judges of what should constitute a forfeiture, and that would indirectly place in their hands the power to lessen, or entirely take away their salary during the term for which they are elected, which is clearly and pointedly inhibited by the constitution. The salaries of the judges of the supreme and circuit courts stand upon the same ground, and the legislature can no more touch the salary of the one than of the other. They are both fixed, so far as their diminution is concerned, by the constitution, and are inviolate and excepted out of the powers of the legislature. The act in question declares, in express terms, a penalty against the circuit judges for a failure to hold a court in each circuit of a hundred and fifty dollars, and makes the auditor a judge of the sufficiency of the excuse, upon the certificate of the clerk of the county, and makes it his duty, if the judge was not prevented from attending his courts by causes unavoidable, rendering his attendance impossible, to withhold from him his salary for that amount. We can regard this law in no other light than as an act of forfeiture in favor of the state for the non-performance of a judicial duty, and for that failure it decrees a certain amount of the judge's compensation forfeited to the state. If this does not expressly diminish the salary of the judge during the time he is in office by indirect, yet effectual means, then we are sure language cannot give the power. To our mind, the act is a clear and palpable violation of the constitution. It is a direct and dangerous attack upon the independence of the judiciary, and upon the freedom and happiness of the people, and in contravention of their supreme will, as expressed in the constitution."

Office Abandoned.

Where an officer abandons his office before the end of his term, he cannot recover his salary for the remainder of the term. Thwing's Case, 16 Ct. Cl. 13; Barbour's Case v. U. S. 17 Ct. Cl. 149; Howard v. U. S. 22 Ct. Cl. 305; Cote v. Biddeford, 96 Me. 491, 52 Atl. 1019, 90 Am. St. Rep. 417; Phillips v. Boston, 150 Mass. 491, 23 N. E. 202; Byrnes v. St. Paul, 78 Minn. 205, 79 Am. St. Rep. 384; Monroe v. New York, 28 Hun (N. Y.) 258; Wardlaw v. New York, 137 N. Y. 194, 33 N. E. 140; Devlin v. New York, 149 N. Y. S. 1061; Bush v. Newton County (Tex.) 135 S. W. 604; San Antonio v. Steingruber (Tex.) 177 S. W. 1023. Thus in Wardlaw v. New York, supra, the court said: "An officer suspended from the performance of the duties of his office by the appointing power, but not removed, is entitled to the salary of the office during the period of the suspension. . . . But the suspended officer may waive that right by express agreement or by conduct from which such an agreement or intention on his part may be fairly and reasonably inferred." In Barbour's Case, 17 Ct. Cl. 149, it appeared that the claimant was assistant appraiser in the custom house commissioned by the President. It was recommended that the office should be abolished. The secretary of the treasury determined to vacate the office and requested the claimant's resignation. He did not send it in and was thereupon suspended. At the next session of the Senate no nomination was made. On the adjournment of the Senate, the claimant did not seek to recover the office, nor did he offer to perform any services, and he did not seek reinstatement nor the salary of his office; but on the contrary accepted the balance due him at the time of his suspension. Some time later he claimed that his suspension could not last longer than the end of the next session of the Senate, as a new appointment had not been made nor had the office been abolished by Congress. It was held that the acts of the claimant after his suspension had practically amounted to an abandonment of his office and he could not recover any compensation.

In Phillips v. Boston, 150 Mass. 491, 23 N. E. 202, it appeared that the plaintiff was a police officer of the city of Boston. By a vote of the police commissioners he was dismissed without any charges being preferred and without a chance for a hearing; and he gave up the buttons and the badge of his office and all other city property in his possession. The plaintiff did not resign his office, nor was there any communication between him and the police commissioners. He did not offer to perform any of the duties of his office, but ten years later he brought an action to recover the salary due to him. It was held that by waiting so long he had abandoned his office and could not maintain an action for the salary. The court said: "If one voluntarily relinquishes an office, as if he accepts another inconsistent therewith, or if he removes from the place where its functions must be exercised, no formal resignation would be necessary. If, having it in his power to reinstate himself, or be reinstated by proper proceedings, in an office from which he has been wrongfully but actually removed, and he makes no effort to that end, but submits for a long term of years to the removal, the inference is inevitable that he waives his right thereto during that period. In the case at bar, the plaintiff yielded to the demand made upon him for the badge of his office and the city property in his possession. He made no effort to retain them, nor did he insist that he might rightfully do so as the lawful possessor thereof. While it is found that he was prevented by the commissioners from further performing his duties as a member of the police force of the city, it is also found that he neither performed nor attempted to perform any act of police duty. At no time by any formal demand did he ever assert (so far as appears) that he was of right a member of the police force, or claim to be put on duty as such by the commissioners, nor did he demand his salary as such from the defendant. While the failure to pay it might not be a bar to its recovery, except so far as the statute of limitations might operate, the failure to demand it tends strongly to show that he had ceased to consider himself a police officer. If his removal was unlawful, it was in his power to bring up the proceedings of the board by petition for certiorari, by which its action could have been quashed and the petitioner afterwards restored by mandamus to his public office. It was his duty to initiate this promptly, and not to wait, and seek, after ten years of apparent acquiescence, to maintain that during all this time he was of right entitled to a public office in which he made no effort to be reinstated, and the duties of which he did not attempt to perform." In Brynes v. St. Paul, 78 Minn. 205, 80 N. W. 959, 79 Am. St. Rep. 384, it was said: "An appointive municipal officer, as was plaintiff, unlawfully dismissed and prevented from rendering any service, who has made no complaint to the mayor or to the city council, has not attempted to secure a reinstatement, but who has apparently acquiesced in the dismissal, cannot recover of the municipality the compensation incident to the office during the period in which he has performed no service."

Suspension from Office.

ILLEGAL SUSPENSION.

Where an officer is illegally suspended he may unless he waives his rights by an abandonment of the office (see the preceding subdivision of this note) recover his salary notwithstanding his failure to perform the duties of his office. Corcoran v. U. S. 38 Ct. Cl. 341; Steele v. U. S. 40 Ct. Cl. 403; Beuhring v. U. S. 45 Ct. Cl. 404; Ward v. Marshall, 96 Cal. 155, 30 Pac. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198; Bergerow v. Parker, 4 Cal. N. 315; State v. Carr, 3 Mo. App. 6; State v. Walbridge, 153 Mo. 194, 94 S. W. 447; People v. Police Com'rs, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 261; Morley v. New York, 58 Hun 610 mem. 12 N. Y. S. 609; *Myers v. S. 785; Gregory v. New York, 113 N. Y. 416, 21 N. E. 119, 3 L.R.A. 854; Emmitt v. New York, 128 N. Y. 117, 28 N. E. 19; People v. Woods, 218 N. Y. 124, 112 N. E. 915; Reising v. Portland, 57 Ore. 295, Ann. Cas. 1912D 895, 111 Pac. 377; Pratt v. Swann, 16 Utah 483, 52 Pac. 1092; Bringgold v. Spokane, 27 Wash. 202, 67 Pac. 612.

In Corcoran v. U. S. 38 Ct. Cl. 341, it appeared that the claimant was a letter carrier. A postmaster suspended him and preferred charges against him. The postmaster-general, having investigated, found him to be innocent and directed that he should be restored to duty. It was held that as the law protected the letter carrier in his office and did not give the postmaster authority to suspend or dismiss him, he was entitled to his salary during the period of suspension. The court said: "It will be noted that the suspension from duty was by the postmaster and not by the postmaster-general; and it will be remembered that letter carriers may be dismissed by the postmaster-general, but not by a postmaster. From a legal point of view it seems as impossible that a postmaster can deprive a duly appointed officer serving under him of his lawful salary by suspending him as that the colonel of a regiment can deprive an officer under his command of his lawful pay by putting him under arrest and thereby preventing him from rendering service. Whether the postmaster-general can delegate to postmasters, by regulations, the power of depriving a letter carrier of his pay for thirty days is a question not presented by this case and concerning which the court expresses no opinion. Two things are essential to deprive an officer of his statutory compensation: The first is that the power so to do must be lodged, directly or by necessary implication, in some official hands; the second is that it must be exercised actually and expressly, and not indirectly or by implication. The two principal facts in this case are, first, that the claimant was acquitted and not convicted, and therefore stands innocent ab initio, prevented from rendering service which he was willing to render and from receiving the salary which he was prevented from receiving by the unfounded charges of the postmaster. The second is that the postmaster-general did not exercise his power of inflicting punishment by dismissing the carrier or of punishing him by forfeiture to pay, but, on the contrary, restored him to duty." See also Steele v. U. S. 40 Ct. Cl. 403; Beuhring v. U. S. 45 Ct. Cl. 404.

In Ward v. Marshall, 98 Cal. 155, 30 Pac. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198, it appeared that the plaintiff, a justice of the peace, was convicted of misconduct in office, and was then suspended from office. He appealed from the conviction, and the judgment was reversed. He then brought a writ of mandamus to recover his salary during the suspension. It was held that since the right of a public officer to receive his salary was attached to his office he could not be deprived of it because, without his fault and against his will, he was suspended from his office and released from performing his duties, pending his appeal from an erroneous judgment. The court said: "The plaintiff, by virtue of his election and qualification as justice of the peace, became entitled to the salary attached to such office during the term, if he should live so long, and was not guilty of any misconduct for which he should be removed, or did not otherwise forfeit his legal title to such office. The right to receive the salary is an incident which attaches itself to the legal title to the office. . . . And when an officer is accused of misconduct in office, and an action brought to remove him therefrom, the question of his guilt or innocence can only be determined by the final judgment in the proceeding; and when, in the action brought against plaintiff, it was finally adjudged that he was not guilty of the misconduct charged against him, or that the accusation itself did not state facts which would justify his removal, the litigation was then terminated in his favor, and it would be unreasonable to hold that notwithstanding the final judgment to the effect that he had done nothing to warrant his removal from office, yet he had, by the erroneous and reversed judgment, been deprived of all that made the office of any pecuniary value. The fact that during the time of his suspension from office its duties were performed by a person properly appointed for that purpose, and that the county has paid him the salary, does not affect the right of plaintiff to recover. He was, without fault on his part and against his consent, released from the performance of the duties of such office for the period named."

In Bergerow v. Parker, 4 Cal. App. 169, 87 Pac. 248, it appeared that the plaintiff was duly elected to and qualified for the office of constable. Two weeks later he was arrested on a charge of murder. He was detained in jail for two years before the charge was finally dismissed. He returned to the township where he had been elected and served continuously until he moved away from the county. During his confinement he did not resign, nor voluntarily cease from the duties of his office; nor was the office declared vacant. The plaintiff brought suit for his salary during the two years of his confinement. It was held that no vacancy occurred from his mere arrest and detention; that in order to constitute a vacancy under a statute (Political Code § 996) because of "ceasing of the incumbent to discharge the duties of the office for the period of three consecutive months," the cessation must be the voluntary act of the incumbent, and that he was entitled to receive the entire salary as an incident of his legal title to the office.

In Morgan v. Denver, 14 Colo. App. 147, 59 Pac. 619, it appeared that the plaintiff, a license inspector, was suspended by the city treasurer who had no power to do so. The plaintiff continued to offer to do his work; but he was prevented from doing so. It was held that he was entitled to his salary during the suspension. The court said: "But it is said that to enable the plaintiff in error to maintain this action, he should first proceed by mandamus to compel his reinstatement. A reinstatement supposes a removal. Where the power of removal is confided to a board or officer, and the power is irregularly or wrongfully exercised, mandamus will lie to undo the act. But there must be a removal, and in the absence of power to remove, there can be no removal. The treasurer had no authority to discharge the license inspector, and the action he assumed to take was not a discharge. Morgan remained the license inspector and needed no reinstatement; and, as he performed the duties of his office, in so far as he could do so in the face of the active hostility of the treasurer, continuously down to the time of this proceeding, he is entitled to the salary which he has earned, amounting, according to the stipulation of counsel, to $800."

In Louisville v. Ross, 138 Ky. 764, 129 S. W. 101, it was held that a police officer who was suspended without any charges being filed against him could recover salary during the period of the suspension. See to the same effect Newberry v. Smith, 157 Mich. 181, 121 N. W. 746, 16 Detroit Leg. N. 315.

In People v. Police Com'r, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 261, the court said: "There is no doubt of the general rule that an officer is not entitled to compensation unless he has rendered the service incidental to his office. . . . But this rule can have no application to a case where the officer is prevented by the exercise of a superior power, residing within the sovereignty of the state, which unjustly deprives him of his liberty. The relator was arrested by a superior officer on behalf of the people, on a charge of which he was declared to be innocent, and held in durance vile for a long time, and thus precluded from discharging his duty. He was not voluntarily absent from his post from the time of his arrest until the day of his acquittal, and on that day, as soon as the opportunity occurred, he presented himself for duty. It cannot be said with any propriety, therefore, that he was absent without leave, which implies and necessarily involves an omission to appear or present himself for duty voluntarily when he had the opportunity to do otherwise. His position could not be considered vacant, and it would seem, from his trial by the police commissioners subsequent to his acquittal, that his office was not regarded as having been vacated up to the time of his acquittal. Not having lost his office and having been restrained of his liberty unjustly by the people of the state, in the exercise of their power, initiated through a member of the police department, it would seem to be unjust that he should be deprived of his salary during the period of his confinement."

In Pratt v. Swann, 16 Utah 483, 52 Pac. 1092, it was said: "To hold that, under the circumstances of this case, the incumbent of a public office had forfeited his right to the emoluments of the office, would be a menace to good government, because it would enable the suspending power to be exercised from mere ill-will, caprice, or other improper motive, regardless of the public weal. Competent persons would doubtless be loath to enter the public service, under such a condition of affairs, if their salaries could be forfeited and their reputations attacked, for an indefinite period, by mere suspension, without an opportunity to be heard. No such power will be aided by judicial construction. It savors too much of despotism and injustice, and will not be countenanced, except upon the mandate of positive law. Whether the suspension in the first instance was merited we have no means of knowing, and, because of the total failure of the suspending power to provide for a hearing, we would not be justified in assuming that it was so. If, however, the appellant failed in the performance of his duty, or was guilty of improper conduct, he ought to have been suspended, and then his case promptly heard, and, if upon the hearing it had been ascertained that the charges were sufficient and sustained, he ought to have been as promptly removed, or suspended without pay, as the evidence might have warranted. In such event, forfeiture of salary could not have been questioned. Plain business principles as well as the law dictate such a course, and persons endowed with a public trust must not forget that they are bound by every principle of honor to discharge public affairs with the same fidelity as they would their own. But, aside from these considerations, we have already decided that the appellant was and is the lawful incumbent, or de jure officer, and, in the absence of a lawful suspension without pay, the right to hold the public office includes the right to receive the salary, which is an incident to the office itself. This is the settled rule in this state."

In Gregory v. New York, 113 N. Y. 416, 21 N. E. 119, 3 L.R.A. 854, it appeared that the plaintiff was an inspector of excise in the city of New York. He was notified by a resolution of the excise board that he was suspended without pay, but he never received a notice of dismissal. He brought an action to recover the salary due him during this suspension. It was held that though the board of excise commissioners had the right to dismiss, they did not have the right to suspend without pay, and that since the plaintiff had been illegally suspended, he was entitled to recover the salary accruing during this time.

In Morley v. New York, 58 Hun 610 mem. 12 N. Y. S. 609, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed to the office of assistant engineer in the department of public works. After acting in this office for about a year, he was notified that he was suspended. During several months he was not permitted to perform any services, though repeatedly stating his willingness to do so. He never received a notice of dismissal. In an action to recover his salary, it was held that the department of public works had no right to suspend one of its officers, and as the plaintiff had never been dismissed and was already to perform his duties if permitted, he was entitled to recover his salary. See also Emmitt v. New York, 128 N. Y. 117, 28 N. E. 10; Phalem v. New York, 14 N. Y. S. 785; Shane v. New York, 63 Misc. 304, 116 N. Y. S. 685; Jenkins v. Scranton, 205 Pa. St. 598, 55 Atl. 788.

LEGAL SUSPENSION.

Where a public officer is legally suspended from his office, he cannot recover his salary subsequently accruing. Small v. U. S. 45 Ct. Cl. 13; Westberg v. Kansas City, 64 Mo. 493; Lewis v. St. Louis, 12 Mo. App. 570; Blackwell v. Thayer, 101 Mo. App. 661, 74 S. W. 375; Shannon v. Portsmouth, 54 N. H. 183; Kastor v. New York, 39 Misc. 709, 80 N. Y. S. 952; People v. Butler, 120 App. Div. 751, 105 N. Y. S. 631; Steubenville v. Culp, 38 Ohio St. 18, 43 Am. Rep. 417; Craighead v. Philadelphia, 5 Pa. Dist. 310; In re Simmers, 12 Pa. Dist. 285, 27 Pa. Co. Ct. 658. Thus in Westberg v. Kansas City, supra, the court said: "After a tolerably extensive examination of cases, we have failed to find one where an officer, legally suspended from office, was permitted to recover for services, which he did not, and had no right to, render. If a legally suspended officer can, notwithstanding his suspension, recover his salary, a suspension is to be coveted by him, for he could then lie in the shade and draw compensation for labor performed by some one else. In what condition would this place incorporated towns and cities? The duties imposed upon their officers are important, and there must always be some one in place to perform them. The law gives the corporation the right to suspend one, and this suspension is generally for some fault of the officer, and necessitates the employment of another to perform his duties. If compelled to pay both, the city will hesitate to exercise the right to suspend, and be tempted to keep in office unfit and unworthy men, or expel from office, to their disgrace, those whose faults do not merit so extreme a punishment. We hold, therefore, that whether removed or suspended, plaintiff was not entitled to recover the salary, or any part of it, from the date of such removal or suspension."

Where a public officer is given a leave of absence without pay, it amounts to a limited dismissal, and he cannot recover his salary. See Small v. U. S. 45 Ct. Cl. 13.

Where an officer is legally suspended on charges and is later dismissed, he is not entitled to his salary during the suspension. People v. Butler, 120 App. Div. 751, 105 N. Y. S. 631, wherein the court said: "It would be a strained construction of this section of the charter to hold that an officer, who was concededly liable to be removed because of misconduct in office, should be permitted, during the term of his suspension, to draw the salary attached to the office where it appeared upon the hearing that the facts not only warranted a dismissal at the time the charges were made, but that the delay which occurred was to a considerable extent due to himself.

. . . Here, as we have already seen, the commissioner not only had the right to remove, but also to suspend, and if the suspension were during the pendency of the trial of charges, the result of the trial, in case of removal, related back and took effect as of the date of the suspension." In O'Brien v. New York, 57 Misc. 639, 108 N. Y. S. 611, it was held that where a tenement house commissioner was suspended pending investigation of charges, and they were found to be true and the plaintiff dismissed as a result, the suspension was legal, and no recovery could be had for salary during the period of suspension.

Some cases hold that where a public officer is suspended legally, he cannot recover his salary even if he is later reinstated. Blackwell v. Thayer, 101 Mo. App. 661, 74 S. W. 375; Shannon v. Portsmouth, 54 N. H. 183; Steubenville v. Culp, 38 Ohio St. 18, 43 Am. St. Rep. 417.

In the case of In re Simmers, 12 Pa. Dist. 285, 27 Pa. Co. Ct. 658, the court said: "Inasmuch as suspension prevents the rendering of the services, it is clear that there is nothing earned during the period of suspension. If it were otherwise, suspension would be ineffectual, for it would give the pecuniary benefit to the suspended officer, while exacting no equivalent in service in return. The entire loss would then fall upon the public and not upon the officer. Reinstatement, while restoring the status of the individual and giving him the right to earn in future the salary attached to the post, gives him no claim for salary or wages during the period of suspension. There was and could be no opportunity during suspension to render the services for which the salary constitutes the compensation. This is necessarily involved in the very idea of suspension, which is not simply a moral but a legal discipline, involving a double loss—a loss to the suspended officer and a loss to the public—for the services of the officer are irrecoverably lost and can never be made up to the commonwealth. If a substitute be employed, the expense is at the cost of the public; if there be no substitute, the crippling of the service is still a loss to the state. Hence, it is clear that the suspended officer cannot point to the hardship of his own position and assert that the hardship falls upon him alone. I find no authority, either in the general principles of law or in the statutes, which would authorize the payment of salary or wages to a man under such circumstances, even though he be reinstated."

Removal from Office.

ILLEGAL REMOVAL.

It is generally held that where a public officer is illegally removed, he may unless he waives his rights by abandoning the office (see supra the subdivision Office Abandoned) recover his salary for the remainder of the term unless the salary has been paid to a de facto officer.

Utah.—Everill v. Swan, 20 Utah, 56, 57 Pac. 716.

Vermont.—Finneran v. Burlington, 89 Vt. 1, 93 Atl. 254.

Thus in Holt v. City of New York, 35 Misc. 242, 72 N. Y. S. 201, the court said: "The statutes have given permanency to positions in the public service, whether they be called 'officers' or 'employees,' and if, in violation of the statute, the individual is removed, and subsequently reinstated by the courts, he may recover his salary or compensation when no other person has filled the position and been paid for the performance of the duties."

In Smith's Case v. U. S. 2 Ct. Cl. 206, it appeared that the claimant was an assistant quartermaster in the volunteer army, and he was dismissed from the service in September, 1862, for the alleged reason that he was absent from duty when the army was fighting in the field. In 1864 it was discovered that the order of dismissal was founded on a mistake, and the claimant was reinstated. It was held that when the order of the President was revoked, as having been made without cause and by mistake, it was revoked from its inception and all of its consequences annulled. Therefore the claimant was entitled to his salary from the date of dismissal to the date of reinstatement. The court said: "When the order of dismissal was revoked, it was revoked from its inception, and altogether, because, from its nature, it was indivisible and could not operate for a term; for if it did, it would be in effect a suspension merely, and that was not intended, and is legally impossible; for, though an officer may be suspended from his duty, he cannot be suspended from his office, for that once vacant, can be filled again only, like any other vacancy, by a nomination by the President, confirmed by the Senate; and when a dismissal is without cause and by mistake, the reason for revoking it goes to the whole, and not to a part of it, and such is to be taken as the purpose of the revocation." See also Winters's Case, 3 Ct. Cl. 136. But compare Reynolds's Case, 3 Ct. Cl. 197, wherein it was held that where an officer was discharged by order of the President, and then was reinstated by a new appointment, he could not claim salary between the time of his dismissal and that of his new appointment.

In Collins v. U. S. 45 Ct. Cl. 63, it appeared that the claimant was appointed tinner for the Carlisle School, by the commissioner of Indian affairs under the civil service, and he duly reported for work. The superintendent refused to permit him to enter on his duties and directed him to return to Washington. The claimant lingered around for three months offering to perform the duties of his office and then engaged in other work. Later he brought suit for the salary covering the three months. It was held that he was entitled to recover the salary until he was properly discharged from service by the proper authority or by his own act. The court said: "We think that when the claimant regularly received his appointment as tinner by the proper authorities and was assigned to duty and reported for duty, he thereby became invested with that office and entitled to receive the salary attached to the same until he was detached from the service either by some proper authority or by his own act. The findings show not only that the claimant reported for duty as such tinner at the place to which he was assigned, but that he remained ready and willing to discharge the duties of his position until such time as his own conduct may be said to have separated him from the service; and for such time we believe he is entitled to recover for his stated salary in this suit."

In U. S. v. Wickersham, 201 U. S. 390, 26 S. Ct. 469, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 798, it appeared that the claimant, a stenographer, was appointed to a position in the office of the U. S. surveyor-general. Under an executive order, he was brought within the protection of the civil service law so that he could be removed only for just cause and on written charges or notice with an opportunity to defend. He was removed by the surveyor-general, though no written or verbal charges were made. It was held that as long as he remained ready and willing to perform the duties of his office, he could not be deprived of the compensation legally belonging to him notwithstanding his discharge by the surveyor-general. The court said: "Whether he could have been summarily removed or suspended by the President or other competent authority is not the question now before the court, but the question is whether the employee during his wrongful suspension by a subordinate officer is entitled to the compensation provided by law. We see no reason in such an attitude of the case, where the wrongful suspension is clearly established, and the ability of the incumbent to discharge the duties of his office affirmatively found, for withholding from him the compensation given by law to an incumbent of the place. If this be not so, then a regular and duly qualified employee in the public service, protected by the statute and the orders of the President made in pursuance thereof, can be deprived of the benefit and emolument of his position by a wrongful and illegal suspension from his duties. We do not think such a contention can be sustained either by reason or authority. Where an officer is wrongfully suspended by one having no authority to make such an order, he ought to be, and is, entitled to the compensation provided by law during such suspension."

In Magner v. St. Louis, 179 Mo. 495, 78 S. W. 782, it was held that where an officer was illegally deprived of his office and was otherwise entitled to it, the fact that there was not sufficient appropriation to meet his salary would not be a defense in a proceeding to compel payment.

In State v. Walbridge, 153 Mo. 194, 94 S. W. 447, the court said: "To the office of policeman from which he was removed he had good title, he was in possession, and no one was disputing it. To that office the law attached a monthly salary, and to that salary he was entitled so long as the law remained in force and under it he lawfully held the office. The legal right to the office carried with it the right to the salary. The board by its wrongful act could not deprive him of this legal right. The right of a public officer to the salary of his office, it is a right created by law, is incident to the office, and not the creature of contract, nor dependent upon the fact or value of services actually rendered. . . . Hence, the fact that the relator after he was wrongfully and without warrant of law discharged from his position as policeman, and was thereby and thereafter prevented from discharging the duties of that position, and did not in fact discharge those duties or offer to do so, affords no ground for denying him his salary, and the court committed no error in awarding him a mandamus therefor." See also Gracey v. St. Louis, 213 Mo. 384, 111 S. W. 1159; Basse v. St. Louis, 213 Mo. 401, 111 S. W. 1165; Butterfield v. St. Louis, 213 Mo. 402, 111 S. W. 1165; Williams v. St. Louis, 213 Mo. 403, 111 S. W. 1165.

In Chicago v. Luthardt, 91 Ill. App. 324, affirmed 191 Ill. 516, 61 N. E. 410, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed a member of the detective bureau of the police department of Chicago. He entered on the performance of his duties, but was dismissed illegally by the chief of police and was not allowed to perform his duties until he was reinstated by a writ of mandamus. He brought an action to recover his salary for the period of his illegal dismissal. It was held that he was entitled to his full salary.

In Fitzsimmons v. Brooklyn, 102 N. Y. 536, 7 N. E. 787, 55 Am. Rep. 835, it appeared that the plaintiff was a police officer in the service of the city of Brooklyn. The police commissioners made an order removing him, but the order of removal was reversed on certiorari and the plaintiff restored to his office. It was held that he was entitled to recover his full salary. The court said: "We have often held that there is no contract between the officer and the state or municipality by force of which the salary is payable. That belongs to him as an incident of his office, and so long as he holds it; and when improperly withheld he may sue for it and recover it. When he does so he is entitled to its full amount, not by force of any contract, but because the law attaches it to the office; and there is no question of breach of contract or resultant damages out of which the doctrine invoked has grown."

In Finneran v. Burlington, 89 Vt. 1, 93 Atl. 254, the court said: "An office having emoluments attached to it is a thing of value, though it is primarily an agency for public purposes. The right to the emoluments attaches to and follows the legal title to the office. A de jure officer cannot be deprived thereof without due process of law. . . . Such an officer may recover his salary after an attempted removal which fails for illegality. The action of Mayor Bigelow being ineffective as a removal, the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

Where an officer is removed under an unconstitutional or void statute, ordinance or resolution, he is entitled to salary notwithstanding the illegal removal. In Kimball v. Salem, 111 Mass. 87, it appeared that a city passed an ordinance under the authority of a general statute requiring the school committee to elect a superintendent of schools annually, and one was duly elected. The city council repealed the ordinance before the year was up. It was held that the superintendent was entitled to his salary for the year in spite of the repeal of the ordinance, as the power to appoint when once exercised was effectual for the whole year, and the city council had no further control over the matter.

In People v. Howe, 88 App. Div. 617, 84 N. Y. S. 604, affirmed 177 N. Y. 499, 69 N. E. 1114, 86 L.R.A. 664, it appeared that the relator was superintendent of the Albany county penitentiary appointed for four years. Two years after this appointment, assuming to act under an unconstitutional statute, the Albany penitentiary commission attempted to remove the relator and place the penitentiary under the charge of the sheriff of the county. The relator then applied for an injunction to restrain the commission from removing him. It was issued, but the commission appealed. During the pendency of the appeal the county treasurer refused to pay his salary to the relator. It was held that the relator could not be removed under the statute, and that as a de jure officer he was entitled to his salary regardless of his illegal removal by the commission.

In San Antonio v. Mickeljohn, 89 Tex. 79, 33 S. W. 735, it appeared that the city of San Antonio passed an ordinance creating the office of superintendent of public works. The ordinance did not state the length of the term, but the constitution of Texas provided that the terms of all officers not otherwise limited should be for two years. After the plaintiff had served in the office for a few months, the city attempted to abolish the office by a resolution. No other method was attempted. The plaintiff was ready and willing to perform the duties of his office, but was prevented by the city. It was held that as the office was created by an ordinance, it could not be abolished by a resolution; that under the constitution it was created for two years; and as the plaintiff had been illegally removed, and had always been willing and ready to perform his duties, he was entitled to his salary for the two years.

Some cases hold that where an officer has been illegally removed, he must be reinstated in his office or the act of removal must be formally reversed before he can recover salary for the time subsequent to the removal. Gersch v. Chicago, 192 Ill. App. 190; Dolan v. Louisville, 142 Ky. 818, 135 S. W. 272; Kammerer v. Louisville, 142 Ky. 848, 135 S. W. 411; Van Sant v. Atlantic City, 68 N. J. L. 449, 53 Atl. 701; Hagan v. Brooklyn, 126 N. Y. 643, 27 N. E. 265; McManus v. Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. S. 424.

In Kammerer v. Louisville, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff was illegally discharged from the police force of Louisville. Subsequently the roster of the police force was filled up. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover his salary until he had proved his right to the office in a direct suit against those who had been appointed after his illegal discharge. The court said: "But appellant contends that the rule is a hard one, because it would require the discharged policeman, in case he was denied a recovery merely because the roster was full, to sue every member of the force in order to establish his right to his office. Such is not the result. If only one policeman should be removed, he could sue the new appointee. On the other hand, if several policemen should be removed at one time and the roster thereafter filled, each would have to sue only the new appointees. In no event, then, would it be necessary ever to sue any one except the men subsequently appointed to complete the roster. Nor will this rule permit the board of safety to violate the law and make illegal dismissals. If that board does not fill the roster, the discharged policeman may recover. If it does fill the roster, he may sue immediately. This, in our opinion, is better than to permit the discharged policeman to wait an indefinite time and then recover the full amount of his salary, notwithstanding the fact that his place has been filled by some one else who has performed the duties and received the pay of the policeman discharged."

In Van Sant v. Atlantic City, 68 N. J. L. 449, 53 Atl. 701, it appeared that the plaintiff was a police officer of Atlantic City. He alleged that he was dismissed by the mayor without cause, without complaint and without a hearing, and that he was protected by a statute which prevented him from being removed arbitrarily. The plaintiff brought an action to recover his salary during the dismissal. It was held that the mayor in removing the plaintiff was acting judicially; that his decision could be reversed because there were no charges and no trial, but while unreversed, it stood; that before the plaintiff could sue for his salary, the mayor's proceeding must be reversed by a direct proceeding to set aside the illegal removal or there must be a mandamus issued to compel the city to restore him to the office; and therefore he could not recover in the present action.

In Hagan v. Brooklyn, 126 N. Y. 643, 27 N. E. 265, it was held that where an officer was illegally removed from an office to which another had been appointed, he could not recover the salary accruing during the illegal removal, if he had not first obtained a reversal of the order removing him, or a reinstatement in the office by the authority having the power to do so.

LEGAL REMOVAL.

Where an officer has been legally removed from an office, he cannot recover salary for the remainder of the term. Queen v. Atlanta, 59 Ga. 319; Hay v. Pleasure Driveway, 181 Ill. App. 23; Fassey v. New Orleans, 17 La. Ann. 299; Mandell v. New Orleans, 21 La. Ann. 9; Wood v. New York, 44 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 321; Wiley v. Worth, 61 N. C. 171. Thus in Queen v. Atlanta, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed as a police officer for a definite term. He was charged with immoral conduct, tried before the commissioners of police and dismissed from the police force. He then brought an action to recover his salary for the full term of his appointment. It was held that the commissioners had jurisdiction to try the plaintiff; that having been found guilty of immoral conduct, he was properly expelled from the force; and that he could not recover his salary for the balance of the term.

In Hay v. Pleasure Driveway, 181 Ill. App. 23, it appeared that the plaintiff was an engineer who had been appointed by a park board for the period of one year. The statute under which the appointment was made provided that the board could appoint at its pleasure. The plaintiff was dismissed before his term expired, and brought suit for his salary, contending that though the board could appoint at pleasure the appointment for a year was an expression of that pleasure and it could not afterwards discharge him. It was held that the mere appointment for a year did not deprive the board of its right to remove at pleasure, and therefore the plaintiff could not recover his salary. The court said: "It is insisted by appellee that the board having elected to designate the term of office for the chief engineer for one year, that this was an expression of the pleasure of the board, and it could not afterwards discharge him. We cannot agree with this contention. The statute gave the engineer only the right to hold the office during the pleasure of the board; he took his office with full knowledge of this provision of the statute and is bound thereby. To hold this contention would be to deprive the board of the powers expressly given it by the statute. If the contention could be maintained that when the board designated one year as the limit of his appointment he was not subject to removal within that time, if the board had seen fit to designate the limit of his appointment for either two, three, four or five years, the same result would follow, and he could not be removed until the expiration of the full term designated in his appointment. The mere fact that the board designated one year as the limit of his appointment did not deprive it of the right to remove him at its pleasure."

In Wood v. New York, 44 Super Ct. 321, it appeared that the plaintiff was the foreman of a fire engine company in the fire department of New York. He was tried on charges, found guilty, and sentenced to be retired from active service on a small annuity. It was held that after the plaintiff was legally retired from duty, he was not entitled to recover his salary. The court said: "This being so, and the plaintiff not having performed the duties of the office since that time, it is difficult to perceive how he can recover the compensation which would have attached if he had performed the duties. The corporation of the city of New York is only liable to pay such compensation when the officer, having possession of the office, has performed the necessary services. No contract exists between the plaintiff and the corporation, by which the latter is bound to pay the salary irrespective of the question whether the plaintiff exercises the duties of the office or not. In a case like the present, the right to the salary arises out of the rendition of services, and not out of any contract between the government and the officer that the services shall be rendered by him."

In Fassey v. New Orleans, 17 La. Ann. 299, it appeared that the plaintiff was appointed tax assessor of New Orleans in the year 1862. Before his duties were fully performed, the military authorities of the United States took possession of the city. The plaintiff was removed and another person was placed in office. The plaintiff brought suit for his compensation. It was held that as he was removed by the military authorities who recognized only martial law, he could not recover from the city. See also Wendell v. New Orleans, 21 La. Ann. 9.

In Smith v. Philadelphia County, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 293, it was held that where the plaintiff was appointed for the term of one year to the office of register clerk by the board of commissioners of the county of Philadelphia, the board could remove him at any time even though he had performed his duties faithfully without being liable to pay his salary during the remainder of the term. The court said: "A clerk of the commissioners of the county holds his office during the pleasure of the power that appoints him, and they can discharge him for any cause they please; and they are not bound to pay him a salary for any longer period than they choose to continue him in office. It is not, in the language of the supreme court, a 'contract.' The man who accepts an office under any municipal public corporation, only holds it at the will and pleasure of the power that confers the appointment; it is a will which can be determined at any moment, and when determined by the officers of the corporation the appointee has no legal remedy against the corporation, for an alleged injury arising from a dismissal from office. He accepts the appointment subject to such a contingency, and must abide by his acceptance on those terms. This is the settled law." See also Koontz v. Franklin County, 76 Pa. St. 154. Compare Jenkins v. Scranton, 205 Pa. St. 598, 55 Atl. 788, where in it was found that there was in fact no removal.

Occupancy of Office by De Facto Officer.

Where a de jure officer is prevented from performing the duties of his office by a de facto officer to whom the salary is paid, the general rule is that there can be no recovery of the salary by the de jure officer except in some instances where the de facto officer is a mere intruder. See the notes to Nall v. Coutler, 4 Ann. Cas. 671; Tanner v. Edwards, 10 Ann. Cas. 1091; Cleveland v. Luttner, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1134; and Andrews v. Portland, 10 Am. St. Rep. 280. As to the right to recover the salary from the de facto officer, see the notes to Chubbuck v. Wilson, 12 Ann. Cas. 888; Jones v. Dusan, Ann. Cas. 1916D 472; and Howard v. Benke, 140 Am. St. Rep. 159.

YOUNG

TOWN OF MORRIS.

Oklahoma Supreme Court—July 13, 1915.

47 Okla. 748; 150 Pac. 684.

Public Officers — Neglect of Duty — Effect as Creating Vacancy.

The law of this state requires that the incumbent of a public office shall devote his personal attention to the duties of the office to which he is elected or appointed (article 2, § 11, Const.), but does not contemplate that such officer shall lose his title to office because he may be absent for a short period of time, for any reason, and does not, during such period of time, personally give all his time and attention to the duties of his office. While such failure of duty may furnish grounds of removal, it does not ipso facto create a vacancy.

Effect on Right to Salary.

The compensation of a public officer is a matter of statute, incidental to the office, and not of contract; nor does it depend on the amount or value of the services rendered. While such officer holds the office, his right to the salary is in no wise impaired by his absence from office or neglect of duty.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to County Court, Okmulgee county:
JOHNS, Judge.

Action by Frank Young, plaintiff, against Town of Morris, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

James M. Hayes for plaintiff in error.
C. B. McCrory for defendant in error.

[744] SHARP, J.—This action was instituted by plaintiff, in a justice court in Okmulgee county, according to the averments of the bill of particulars, to recover from the defendant salary for himself as town marshal, and one Hornbeck as deputy marshal, for the months of August and September, 1911. From the judgment rendered in the justice court, defendant appealed to the county court, where trial was had, the jury returning a verdict for the defendant. From the judgment rendered in accordance therewith, plaintiff brings error.

From the evidence it would seem to be plain that Young was the duly elected and qualified marshal of the town of Morris during August and September, 1911, and entitled to his salary for said months, unless it be that he had abandoned said office or had been removed therefrom. In June prior thereto, plaintiff, Young, secured the consent of the board of trustees of the town to confirm the appointment of one Hornbeck as deputy marshal, who would perform the duties of marshal (section 706, Rev. Laws 1910), but receive no salary therefor, except such as would be paid to him by Young. This arrangement apparently was satisfactory to all parties until a meeting of the board of trustees, September 7th following, at which [745] time Young was informed that he must appoint another party as deputy marshal in the place of Hornbeck. This was not done, however, and Hornbeck continued to act as deputy until October 7th thereafter. During the larger part of the months of August and September, plaintiff worked as a carpenter in the construction of a house a mile from the town of Morris, and it was this fact upon which defendant attempts to base its claim that the office was abandoned, and that therefore plaintiff was not entitled to salary.

It is not contended that proceedings were at any time had to remove plaintiff as marshal, the only question of fact at the trial being: Did he prior to, or during the months of August and September, abandon the office of marshal? There is no evidence in the record that plaintiff did so abandon his office, other than that with the consent of the board of trustees he appointed a deputy, who was to act in his place and stead during the time plaintiff was absent from town. From the fact that the board confirmed plaintiff's appointment of Hornbeck as deputy, and at the meeting September 7th informed him that he must appoint some one else as deputy, it is clear that he was, at least up until that time, considered marshal of the town by the board of trustees. That he did not perform the duties of town marshal during the larger part of said months, and that most of said time he was engaged in the carpentry trade, did not prove an abandonment of the office—at least, not when taken in connection with the fact that Hornbeck was appointed deputy without pay other than that received from Young. Probably such a course of conduct as that pursued by plaintiff would be sufficient, if true, upon which to base an action for his removal, but it did not of itself, without any action of the proper authorities, remove him from the office to which he was elected. It is the purpose of the law of this state that the [746] incumbent of an office shall devote his personal attention to the duties of the office to which he is elected or appointed. Article 2, sec. 11, Const. But this does not mean that he shall lose his title to office because he may be absent or away for a short period of time, for any reason, and does not, during such period of time, personally give all of his time and attention to the duties of his office. That he does not fulfil the mandate of the Constitution would serve as grounds of removal, but would not ipso facto remove him.

The above provision of the Constitution is similar to article 2, sec. 18, of the Missouri Constitution, which was under consideration in the case of State v. Slover, 113 Mo. 202, 20 S. W. 788. From the opinion in that case it must be concluded that it was not intended by said provision to remove a public official from office without a hearing. In Christy v. Kingfisher, 13 Okla. 585, 76 Pac. 135 (a case arising before the adoption of our Constitution), it was held, in effect, that while abandonment is clearly a cause for forfeiture of an office, it does not of itself create a completed vacancy, but a judicial determination of the fact is necessary to render it conclusive. In State v. Chaney, 23 Okla. 788, 103 Pac. 133 (an opinion of this court since the adoption of the Constitution), the Christy Case was followed, and it was held that the mayor and counsel of a town had no power to try and remove a city marshal, because the procedure called for judicial action, and not the exercise of political or administrative power or action. Among the authorities supporting this rule are the following: Sutcliffe v. New York, 61 Misc. 514, 115 N. Y. S. 186 (reversed in 132 App. Div. 831, 117 N. Y. S. 813, but this principle adhered to); Atty.-Gen. v. Maybury, 141 Mich. 31, 104 N. W. 324, 113 Am. St. Rep. 512; Bush v. State, 10 Ga. App. 544, 73 S. E. [747] 697; Graham v. Cowgill, 13 Kan. 114; Throop on Public Officers, sec. 421; Dillon, Municipal Corporations, secs. 480, 481.

It follows that plaintiff, during the months in question, still retaining the office of marshal, was entitled to the salary. The rule in such cases is that the salary of an official position belongs to the officer occupying such position as an incident to the office, and does not depend upon his performance of the duties of the office. The right of an officer to salary is such only as is prescribed by statute, and while he holds the office such right is in no wise impaired by his occasional or protracted absence from his office or the neglect of his duties. Such derelictions find their correction in the power of removal, impeachment, and punishment, provided by law. Bates v. St. Louis, 153 Mo. 18, 54 S. W. 439, 77 Am. St. Rep. 701; Leonard v. Terre Haute, 48 Ind. App. 104, 93 N. E. 872; State v. Gordon, 245 Mo. 12, 149 S. W. 638; Sutcliffe v. New York, supra; Fitzsimmons v. Brooklyn, 102 N. Y. 536, 7 N. E. 787, 55 Am. Rep. 835; Emmitt v. New York, 128 N. Y. 117, 28 N. E. 19; Bergerow v. Parker, 4 Cal. App. 169, 87 Pac. 248; Adams v. Justices, 21 Ga. 206; Larsen v. St. Paul, 83 Minn. 473, 86 N. W. 459; Putnam v. Custer County, 25 S. D. 542, 548, 127 N. W. 641; 29 Cyc. 1423.

As said by Throop in his excellent work on Public Officers, sec. 500:

"The compensation for official services are not fixed upon any mere principle of quantum meruit, but upon the judgment and consideration of the Legislature, as a just medium for the services which the officer may be called upon to perform. These may, in some cases, be extravagant for the specific services, while in others they may furnish a remuneration which is wholly inadequate. The time and occasion may, from change of circumstances, render the service onerous and oppressive, and the Legislature [748] may also increase the duties to any extent it chooses; yet nothing additional to the statutory reward can be claimed by the officer. He accepts the office 'for better or for worse,' and whether oppressed with constant and overburdening cares, or enabled, from absence of claims upon his services, to devote his time to his own pursuits, his fees, salary, or statutory compensation constitutes what he can claim therefor, and is yet to be accorded, although he performs no substantial service, or neglects his duties. The fees or salary of office are quicquid honorarium and accrue from mere possession of the office."

There being error in the instruction given by the court, in the above regard, the judgment of the trial court should be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

All the Justices concur.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that while neglect of duty by a public officer may be a ground for his removal it does not ipso facto create a vacancy, and that, while the office is retained, the incumbent's right to compensation is not impaired by his absence or neglect of duty. The note to Bartholomew v. Springdale, reported ante, this volume, at page 432, collates the cases passing on the neglect of duty by a public officer as affecting his right to salary.

SOPER

v.

CISCO ET AL.

New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—
November 15, 1915.

85 N. J. Eq. 165; 95 Atl. 1016.

Deeds — Consideration — Future Support.

A deed for lands made by a grantor in consideration of "support during her natural life" therein recited, is not a gift, but is founded upon a valuable consideration, and when made by one having the mental capacity to make it, and without fraud, duress or undue influence, will be sustained.

Capacity of Grantor — Test.

The test of mental capacity to make a deed is that a person shall have ability to understand the nature and effect of the act in which he is engaged and the business he is transacting.

Gifts — Conveyance by Parent to Child — Presumption and Burden of Proof.

No presumption of undue influence in the case of a conveyance by a parent to a child, in consideration of support of the grantor, arises from the mere relation of the parties, and, therefore, the burden is upon the party attacking the conveyance to show undue influence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The rule that undue influence is not to be presumed from the mere relation of parent and child, in case of a conveyance from a parent to a child, does not conflict with the broad rule that where parties stand in confidential relation to each other a conveyance from the weaker to the dominant party is presumed to result from undue influence, and therefore, where facts are shown, other than the mere relation of parent and child, establishing between the parties a confidential relation in which the child is the dominant party, a conveyance from the parent to the child is presumed to be tainted with undue influence, and the burden is upon the child to show the bona fides of the transaction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A mother, seventy-seven years of age, in the full possession of her mental faculties and in good physical health, made a deed for her homestead property to her daughter, forty-five years of age, who had been her chief support for fifteen years prior thereto. The consideration for the deed was $300 and "support during her natural life" therein expressed. It was drawn by and acknowledged before a competent lawyer, with whom the mother conferred privately, and was recorded immediately. The property was then worth about $5,000, but of small rental value and not readily marketable. The bargain was made at the solicitation of the mother, the daughter being reluctant. No effort was made to keep the transaction secret. Before and at the time of making the deed and until eleven years thereafter, when failing mental faculties rendered some restraint necessary, the mother had perfect liberty of action and freely saw such of her other children as she wished to see and who wished to see her. Her daughter supported the mother satisfactorily at the homestead for sixteen years after the deed was made, when the mother, without any fault of the daughter, went away and refused to return. Held, that the bargain was a natural and provident one for the mother to make and was not the product of undue influence, and will not be set aside for failure to show that the mother had "independent advice."

Laches — Proof Obscured by Delay.

He who, without adequate excuse, delays asserting his rights until the proofs respecting the transaction out of which he claims his rights arose, are so indeterminate and obscure that it is impossible for the court to see whether what is asserted to be justice to him is not injustice to his adversary, has no right to relief.

Same.

A grantor, having made a conveyance of her property to her daughter in consideration of $300 and "support during her natural life" therein expressed, and having at the time the undoubted mental capacity to make it, and who delays challenging its validity for sixteen years and until the lawyer who transacted the business is dead, and the memory of other witnesses respecting important facts is dim, and the mental faculties and memory of the grantor herself have been so impaired as to render her testimony valueless, will not be permitted to set aside such conveyance when it appears that during all such time she had been supported by her daughter satisfactorily, and the grantor for eleven years after the conveyance was well aware that she had made it and was under no physical or mental disability nor prevented by coercion or poverty from filing a bill to set it aside if she had desired to do so.

Contracts — Contract for Future Support — Rescission after Part Performance.

After a partial performance by the grantee of his obligation to support the grantor, the grantor may not abandon the same or prevent further performance upon the part of the grantee and take advantage of such failure to secure equitable aid to cancel or rescind the deed.

Construction of Contract — Place of Support.

When an obligation upon the part of the grantee to support the grantor is created by deed and there is no express direction where and how the support should be furnished, the grantor is entitled to require it to be furnished at any place he may select if it can be supplied there without needless or unnecessary expense.

Cancellation of Instruments — Decree — Enforcing Performance of Condition.

Where a grantor under a deed is entitled to support, and, at the age of ninety-three, when her mental faculties are so impaired as to render it unjust to hold her to a strict accountability for her attitude, declines to be supported at the place where she has been satisfactorily supported for sixteen years, and makes no demand for support elsewhere but files a bill for cancellation of the deed, which relief must be denied by the court, equity requires that at the option of the complainant provision for prompt and adequate support shall be secured to her in that proceeding.

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Action by Mary Soper, plaintiff, against Mary S. F. Cisco et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Bilder & Bilder for appellants.

Lefferts & Lefferts for respondent.

[167] TRENCHARD, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from a decree of the court of chancery, setting aside two deeds of conveyance, made by the complainant to the defendant Mary S. F. Cisco, of two tracts of land, aggregating about twelve acres, situate at Lodi, Bergen county, New Jersey. The deeds are dated respectively, March 30th, 1897, and November 5th, 1898, each being recorded on the day of their respective dates.

The complainant is the mother of Mary S. F. Cisco, and the widow of Benjamin Soper, and was residing at the time the conveyances were made with Mary and the latter's husband in the homestead located upon the tract in question.

About the middle of March, 1897, the complainant expressed a desire to convey the property to her daughter Mary, in consideration of $300 and support during her natural life, and also in the consideration of the fact that Mary had cared for her and supported her for fifteen years prior thereto.

On March 30th, 1897, the complainant attended at the office of Ernest Koester, a counselor-at-law, at Hackensack, and at her request, he prepared and she executed, acknowledged and delivered the 1897 deed. At the same time, there was paid to the complainant $300, for which she signed a receipt, witnessed by Mr. Koester and his stenographer. The deed expressed the consideration as follows: "In consideration of the sum of one dollar, filial affection, and support during her natural life."

Shortly prior to November 5th, 1898, the complainant told her daughter Mary that she had another lot which she still owned, and which had not been transferred, and that she desired, to sell it for its assessed value, which was fifty dollars, which proposal was accepted and a deed executed for the lot. The deed was drawn by and acknowledged before A. H. G. Maidment, an attorney-at-law, at his office in Hackensack.

[168] At the time of the conveyance of 1897, the complainant represented that the premises were free and clear of all encumbrances, but in 1900, the defendants learned that the complainant in 1896 had given a lease of the premises for the term of her natural life to her son Oliver Soper. After an expenditure of $200 by the defendants, that interest was obtained from Oliver.

Ernest Koester, the lawyer who drew the 1897 deed and took complainant's acknowledgment thereto, died on August 2d, 1909.

This bill of complaint was filed August 30th, 1913, and charged that the deeds were obtained by fraud, duress and undue influence. The answer of the defendants denies such charges.

The learned advisory master found that the deeds in question were "mere voluntary gifts," that the complainant was without "independent advice," and that by the transfer, she parted with her whole estate, thereby impoverishing herself, and advised a decree that the deeds were "from the execution and delivery of the same, voidable and of no force or effect, at the option of the complainant," and directing that they be delivered up and canceled and the property re-conveyed to the complainant.

After careful consideration we are of the opinion that the conclusion of the advisory master cannot be sustained, for reasons we will now state.

It is quite clear that these conveyances were not "mere voluntary gifts," and in that respect are to be distinguished from those set aside in Slack v. Rees, 66 N. J. Eq. 447, 59 Atl. 466, 69 L.R.A. 393, and Post v. Hagan, 71 N. J. Eq. 235, 65 Atl. 1026, 124 Am. St. Rep. 997.

The conveyance of 1898 was for a consideration of $50. It is so stated in the deed. That the $50 was paid to the complainant is demonstrated by the production of the receipt, the testimony of the lawyer who drew the receipt upon the occasion of the execution and delivery of the deed, and by the entry in complainant's savings bank deposit book. We pause to remark that this deed is of relatively small importance because it appears that $50 was probably a fair price, for the land conveyed by it, that being its valuation for taxation purposes.

[169] It is equally plain that the conveyance of 1897 was not a "mere voluntary gift." It appears to our satisfaction that $300 was paid to the complainant. This is demonstrated by the production of the receipt witnessed by the lawyer who drew the deed, and his stenographer, and by the entry in the complainant's savings bank deposit book.

But apart from such money consideration the deed itself recites that it was made in consideration of "support during her natural life," and in that respect this case is to be distinguished from Mott v. Mott, 49 N. J. Eq. 192, 22 Atl. 997, and Walsh v. Harkey, 69 Atl. 726. Now a deed for lands made by a grantor in consideration of "support during her natural life" therein recited, is not a gift, but is founded upon a valuable consideration, and when made by one having the mental capacity to make it, and without fraud, duress or undue influence, will be sustained. Collins v. Collins, 45 N. J. Eq. 813, 15 Atl. 849, 18 Atl. 860; Holland v. John, 60 N. J. Eq. 435, 46 Atl. 172.

The test of mental capacity to make a deed is that a person shall have ability to understand the nature and effect of the act in which he is engaged and the business he is transacting. It appears beyond dispute, and it is not seriously questioned, that the complainant had such mental capacity. The fact that there was an outstanding lease not mentioned by the complainant does not show mental incapacity, but rather shows, as the evidence indicates, her willingness to conceal the fact in order to make a bargain with her daughter which complainant regarded as advantageous to her.

It remains to be considered whether the deeds were obtained by fraud, duress or undue influence.

The real contention of the complainant is that these deeds were the product of that species of fraud known as undue influence.

We think that contention is not well founded.

No presumption of undue influence in the case of conveyance by parent to child in consideration of support of the grantor, arises from the mere relation of the parties, and therefore, the burden is upon the party attacking the conveyance to show undue influence. Collins v. Collins, 45 N. J. Eq. 813, 15 Atl. 849, 18 Atl. 860.

[170] Of course the rule that undue influence is not to be presumed from the mere relation of parent and child, in case of a conveyance from a parent to a child, does not conflict with the broad rule that where parties stand in a confidential relation to each other a conveyance from the weaker to the dominant party is presumed to result from undue influence; and therefore, where facts are shown, other than the mere relation of parent and child, establishing between the parties a confidential relation in which the child is the dominant party, a conveyance from the parent to such child is presumed to be tainted with undue influence, and the burden is upon the child to show the bona fides of the transaction. Mott v. Mott, 49 N. J. Eq. 192, 22 Atl. 997. See also 17 Ann. Cas. 989, note.

At the time these conveyances were made the complainant was about seventy-seven years of age. She was living with her daughter, the defendant, who was then about forty-five years of age, and was practically dependent upon her daughter. No doubt the application of the rule stated casts upon the daughter the burden of showing the conveyance was without undue influence.

Whether or not the deeds were the product of undue influence of course depends upon the relation of the parties and the facts and circumstances leading up and surrounding the execution of the deeds. We shall hereinafter deal with the effect of the impossibility, by reason of the lapse of time, of the production of full proof with respect to these essential matters.

We turn now to a statement of what the evidence discloses, and what it does not disclose, concerning these relations and transactions.

In 1897 and 1898 when the deeds were made, the complainant was living at the homestead (the property in question) with her daughter Mary, the defendant. Mary had lived there all her life. Her father, in his later years, was an invalid. For fifteen years she ministered to him with loving care. The other children had left home. During these last fifteen years of her father's life Mary was the chief support of the family, her parents being without substantial means except the premises in question. The property was not readily marketable. It had [171] but slight rental value, most of the twelve acres being low lands and unproductive, and the buildings being in a dilapidated condition. Mary acquired somehow some cows and chickens, and by selling milk and eggs, and making and selling ladies' hats and bonnets, managed to support her father and mother until her father's death in 1895 at the age of eighty-seven years. That she did this substantially without help, seems not seriously questioned.

But it is said that, at this early day she had conceived the idea of getting the property, and that such was the motive for her self-denying conduct. We think not. We think rather that hers is the true version. At the hearing she was asked "Why did you struggle so?" She replied:

"I didn't want to see my father die in want, and I supported him for fifteen years. He was a good man, and when I saw them all . . . putting nothing in I said, 'Father, don't cry, I will stay with you, and you shall never want,' and I dressed him beautifully and gave him everything I could, and that is why I kept the cows for milk."

When her father died in 1895 Mary was forty-three years old. She remained at the homestead, with the acquiescence of her mother, who went to live with her married daughter, Helen Butterworth, near by in Garfield, Bergen county. In 1897 Mary married the defendant, Joseph Cisco, and was contemplating moving with her husband to New York, when the complainant returned unsolicited to the homestead, with the avowed purpose of making her home with her daughter, and proposed that Mr. Cisco purchase the homestead property. This Cisco declined to do stating that much of it was worthless, being covered by water. At that time the property was valued by the assessor for taxation purposes at $1,300. It probably was worth about $5,000. She then proposed to deed the property to Mary in consideration of past services, $300, and support during her natural life. Mary and her husband seem to have been unwilling to accept such a conveyance chiefly because they wished to go to New York to live unburdened with their mother's care and support. However, they finally yielded, and a few weeks thereafter the complainant, and Mary, and Mr. Cisco went to the office of Mr. [172] Koester, in Hackensack, where the deed was prepared and delivered.

Of course what occurred there is of the utmost importance upon the question of undue influence, and we will deal with this phase of the case more particularly hereinafter.

At that time, according to the undisputed evidence, the complainant was at least of average mental and physical health for a person of her age. She could read and write; her eyesight was good and her hearing fair. According to the testimony of the defendants she transacted the business with Mr. Koester herself, being alone with him in his private office, and the defendants waiting in the outer office until the deed was ready for delivery. The deed was recorded immediately. No effort was made to keep the transaction secret. The complainant frequently mentioned it to those with whom she came in contact, and the other children seem to have been apprised of it in due course of events and many years before this bill was filed. It is quite clear that they knew of it as early as 1904.

We have no further evidence worthy of consideration as to the circumstances surrounding the execution of the deed. Sixteen years elapsed before this bill was filed. Meanwhile Mr. Koester died and the complainant's mental faculties have so far failed that she can give no intelligent account of what then took place. Indeed we are constrained to think that her memory is so far gone, and is so unreliable, that we cannot give any weight at all to her testimony.

Following the execution of the deed, the complainant lived with the defendants happily for sixteen years. She was supported by them there at the homestead, was furnished with ample food and clothing, was nursed and furnished medicine and medical attendance when ill. She visited and received visits from her daughter Helen and from friends and neighbors. As we shall hereafter have occasion to point out she saw freely such of her other children as she chose to see and who wished to see her.

For eleven or twelve years her mental and physical health was usually good considering her advanced age. But about 1908 or 1909 she began to fail both physically and mentally. For [178] a time her physical ailments rendered almost constant nursing necessary. Thereafter she improved physically but continued to fail mentally. In the last year or two her mental condition rendered it necessary to put more or less restraint upon her. Her old friend and physician testifies that in these last years she "has not been herself." She became restive under this necessary restraint, and in May, 1913, she evaded the vigilance of her daughter Mary and went to the home of her daughter Helen Butterworth near by.

Shortly thereafter the defendant Joseph Cisco went to Mrs. Butterworth's and sought to induce the complainant to return to her home, but she declined to do so. In August following complainant filed this bill, acting with the assistance, and no doubt at the instigation of her daughter Helen Butterworth, and her son Warren Soper. The son Oliver had long since died and the son John took no interest in this controversy.

During these sixteen years while the defendants were thus supporting and caring for the complainant, they paid all of the expenses. They paid the insurance upon the property. They made improvements thereon amounting to over $1,100. They paid assessments amounting to about $340. They paid the taxes amounting to over $1,600. During all these years they received no income from the property, it being unproductive. At no time did its rental exceed $25 per month, but no doubt its present market value, due chiefly to improvements in the neighborhood, is largely in excess of what its rental value indicates.

This outline of the facts and circumstances surrounding and leading up to this conveyance, when taken in connection with other facts to which we shall hereafter refer, shows, we think, that the bargain in which it resulted was a natural and provident one for the complainant to make, and that it was not the product of undue influence.

But it is contended that this conveyance should be set aside for want of "independent advice." We think not. It is true that if a child upon whom a parent by reason of advanced years or infirmity has in fact come to be dependent, accepts from such dependent parent a voluntary conveyance of all of [174] his or her estate, a court of equity, moved by the apparent improvidence of such gift, will presume that the donor did not appreciate the consequence to himself of his voluntary act, and hence will place upon the donee the burden of overcoming this presumption by showing that the donor in making the conveyance had the benefit of proper independent advice. Post v. Hagan, 65 Atl. 1026, 71 N. J. Eq. 234, 124 Am. St. Rep. 997. It is also true that proper independent advice, in this connection, means that the donor had the preliminary benefit of conferring fully and privately upon the subject of his intended gift with a person who was not only competent to inform him correctly of its legal effect, but who was, furthermore, so disassociated from the interests of the donee as to be in position to advise with the donor impartially and confidentially as to the consequences to himself of his proposed benefaction. Post v. Hagan, supra. In the present case we should hesitate before saying that the defendants have not borne such burden, because as we have pointed out, the proof seems to indicate that complainant conferred privately with the quite competent lawyer who drew the deed. But however that may be it is plain that under the facts of this case no such burden is cast upon the defendants. The conveyance was not a voluntary gift. It was for a valuable consideration. The bargain in which it resulted was a natural and provident one for the complainant to make and the defendants have borne the burden of showing that it was not the product of undue influence.

But if we were to take a different view, and were also to assume that they have failed to bear that burden, or the burden of showing absence of undue influence, still this complainant could not succeed in setting aside these deeds in the circumstances disclosed by this record.

The general rule is well settled that he who, without adequate excuse, delays asserting his rights until the proofs respecting the transaction, out of which he claims his rights arose, are so indeterminate and obscure that it is impossible for the court to see whether what is asserted to be justice to him is not injustice to his adversary, has no right to relief. McCartin v. Traphagen, 43 N. J. Eq. 324, 11 Atl. 156, affirmed 45 N. J. Eq. 265, 17 Atl. 809.

[175] Now sixteen years intervened between the making of the conveyance in question and the filing of the bill. The result was that at the time of hearing the lawyer who drew and took complainant's acknowledgment of the 1897 deed was dead, and the lawyer who drew and took her acknowledgment of the 1898 deed had no reliable memory of the transaction. The memory of other witnesses with regard to important facts had become dim. The complainant herself had reached such an extreme age, and her mental faculties had become so far impaired as to render her testimony practically valueless. Meanwhile defendants had supported complainant and had expended large sums on the property. Such delay, in such circumstances, without adequate excuse, is a bar to relief.

We find no excuse for the delay. At the time of these conveyances and for eleven or twelve years thereafter the complainant was in the full possession of her faculties, and enjoyed fair health. She was well aware that she had made the conveyances. She was not either directly or indirectly prevented by the defendants from taking steps to avoid the deeds. She had the financial ability to protect her rights if she thought they had been violated. She was not restrained of her liberty or freedom of action. She saw and visited such of her other children as she wished to see and visit, and who wished to see her. No doubt at times the relations between her and her other children were strained. Her daughter Helen for years before and after these conveyances were made seems to have been rather inattentive to her. No doubt complainant resented that. For seventeen years prior to the making of the deeds her son Warren seems not to have visited his parents nor contributed to their support. Indeed not until 1903, six years after the conveyances were made, did he visit his mother, and then not again until 1908, when and later he manifested more interest. It is clear that complainant resented his inconsiderate conduct. This is made quite clear by the letter which she wrote him in 1909 requesting him to stay away and in which, not without some reason it seems, she characterized him as a "dangerous man." This reasonable attitude of the complainant [176] towards Warren, in our opinion, is the reason for her disinclination to see Warren, and Helen when accompanied by him, which she exhibited in the years 1908 and 1909.

As we have pointed out the complainant has left the defendants' home and seems unwilling to return and receive support and maintenance there as before. Of course that fact cannot justify setting aside these conveyances. The rule is that after a partial performance by the grantee of his obligation to support the grantor, the grantor may not abandon the same or prevent further performance upon the part of the grantee and take advantage of such failure to secure equitable aid to cancel or rescind the deed. See 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932, note.

But there remains the obligation to support the complainant during her natural life. Where, as here, there is no express direction where and how the support should be furnished, the person entitled to receive it is held to have a right to require it to be furnished at any place he may select, if it can be supplied there without needless or unreasonable expense. 13 Cyc. 699. In the present case, there has been no demand for outside support. But looking beneath the surface, and considering the impaired mental condition of the complainant, and her extreme age, we perceive that it would be inequitable to hold her to a strict accountability for her conduct and apparent attitude. Equity requires that at the option of the complainant provision for prompt and adequate "support during her natural life" shall be secured to her in this proceeding.

The decree below will be reversed and the record remitted to the court of chancery for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion.

Costs will be awarded the appellant in this court.

For affirmance: The Chief-Justice, and Parker, Black, Terhune and Heppenheimer, JJ.—5.

For reversal: Garrison, Swayze, Trenchard, Bergen, Minturn, Kallisch, Vredenburg, White, and Williams, JJ.—9.

NOTE.

Presumption and Burden of Proof of Undue Influence in Case of Conveyance Inter Vivos by Parent to Child.

Introductory, 457.

Mere Relation of Parties, 457.

Relation of Parties and Other Circumstances, 458.

Introductory.

It is intended in this note to review the recent cases passing on the presumption and burden of proof of undue influence in the case of a conveyance inter vivos by a parent to a child. The earlier cases are collected in the notes to Burton v. Burton, 17 Ann. Cas. 984; Hawthorne v. Jenkins, Ann. Cas. 1915D 707; and Richmond's Appeal, 21 Am. St. Rep. 85.

Mere Relation of Parties.

It is held generally that the mere relation of parent and child raises no presumption that a conveyance inter vivos from the former to the latter is the result of undue influence and hence the burden of showing undue influence rests on the person attempting to invalidate the conveyance. Whaley v. Crittenden, 192 Ala. 341, 68 So. 886; Westphal v. Heckman (Ind.) 113 N. E. 299; Thill v. Freiermuth, 132 Minn. 242, 156 N. W. 260; Youtsey v. Hollingsworth (Mo.) 178 S. W. 105; McFarland v. Brown (Mo.) 193 S. W. 800; Jacobus v. Waits, 86 N. J. Eq. 148, 97 Atl. 958; Huggins v. Huggins, 107 S. C. 470, 93 S. E. 129. And see the reported case.

It was held in Huggins v. Huggins, supra, that the mere fact that a mother usually conformed to the will of her son was not conclusive proof that a conveyance of property made by the former to the latter without consideration was the result of undue influence. The court said: "Where two persons are closely associated in the affairs of life and deeply concerned in the welfare of each other, the mere fact that one usually conforms to the will of the other is by no means conclusive proof that it is the result of undue influence. Happily for society, it is most often the result of commendable motives on the part of both, the desire of the one to co-operate in the efforts of the other in the most helpful way, and the thoughtful consideration of the other, which makes no request that in reason cannot be cheerfully complied with. Harmony of thought and action so induced is not to be attributed to undue influence, which, in its legal sense, is an influence which destroys free agency and substitutes the will of the stronger for that of the weaker mind. There is no direct evidence that plaintiff had or exercised any such influence over his mother. If it had been so, surely some of the other children would have observed and testified to it. The conclusion that he had and exerted such influence rests solely upon the presumption which arose from the relationship between them, which, under the circumstances, was not very strong to begin with, and it was completely overcome by the facts and circumstances of the case and the testimony of the witnesses to the deed."

In Westphal v. Heckman (Ind.) 113 N. E. 299, the court said: "There are certain legal and domestic relations in respect to which the law raises a presumption of trust and confidence on one side and a corresponding influence on the other. The relations of attorney and client, principal and agent, husband and wife, and parent and child, belong to this class, and there may be others. Where such a relation exists between two persons and the one occupying the superior position has dealt with the other in such a way as to sustain a substantial advantage, the law will presume that improper influence was exerted and that the transaction is fraudulent. Keys v. McDowell, 54 Ind. App. 263, 100 N. E. 385, and cases there cited. This so-called presumption, when indulged, arises out of relations which exist between the contracting parties regardless of any facts or circumstances having a tendency to show that a confidence was reposed by one of the parties and an influence gained by the other. Proof of the existence of such a relation between the parties establishes prima facie that the dominant party to such relation occupies a position of trust and confidence which he must not abuse. This rule, however, is applied only as against the one who is assumed to be the dominant party in the relation shown. In the relation of parent and child the parent is assumed to be the dominant party, and, where one seeks to show that the child is the dominant party, he must do so by showing the condition and situation of the parties, their treatment of each other, and other circumstances from which such ultimate fact may be inferred, and unless such fact is found by the court or jury trying the issue he cannot prevail. This court has held that no presumption of fraud or undue influence arises in a case of a conveyance from a parent to a child on account of the mere existence of such relation." Westphal v. Heckman (Ind.) 113 N. E. 299.

It was held in Youtsey v. Hollingsworth (Mo.) 178 S. W. 105, that although there was no presumption that a deed from a parent to a child made in consideration of the natural affection attending the relation, was unfairly obtained, yet the relation itself was a confidential one and when undue influence was charged it should be taken in consideration in determining the extent and effect of such influence.

Relation of Parties and Other Circumstances.

Though it is held generally that the mere relation of parent and child raises no presumption of undue influence with respect to a conveyance from the former to the latter, where facts appear tending to establish not only confidential relations between parent and child but also that the will of the child predominated, the presumption of undue influence arises and the burden rests on the child to show the bona fides of a conveyance to him. Whaley v. Crittenden, 192 Ala. 341, 68 So. 886; Preston v. Lloyd, 269 Ill. 152, 109 N. E. 697; Gish v. St. Joseph Loan, etc. Co. (Ind.) 113 N. E. 394; Hull v. Mitchell (Ia.) 162 N. W. 235; Miller v. Taylor, 165 Ky. 463, 177 S. W. 247; Kelly v. Fields, 137 Ky. 796, 181 S. W. 657; Shields v. Burge, 171 Ky. 149, 188 S. W. 321; Williamson v. Lowe, 172 Ky. 86, 188 S. W. 1065; Williams v. Williams (Mich.) 164 N. W. 374; Thill v. Freiermuth, 132 Minn. 242, 156 N.

W. 260; Shaughnessy v. Shaughnessy, 135 Minn. 262, 160 N. W. 769; Jacobus v. Waits, 36 N. J. Eq. 148, 97 Atl. 958. And see the reported case.

Where a son was shown to have had much influence over his mother in business matters, and the mother had often stated that she wished her property to be divided equally, in an action to set aside a conveyance of the entire property to the son made by the mother, at the age of seventy years, when she was in poor health, it was held that the burden was on the son to show not only the fairness of the transaction but that it was the free and voluntary act of a capable mind. Kelly v. Fields, 167 Ky. 796, 181 S. W. 657.

It has been held that where an educated physician managed the business affairs of his illiterate father, and thereby gained an advantage through conveyances and leases from the father, there was a presumption of constructive fraud. Gish v. St. Joseph Loan, etc. Co. (Ind.) 113 N. E. 394, wherein the court said: "In this confidential relation the son, by reason of his education, strength, and business ability, and the age, illiteracy, and declining strength of his father, occupied the superior position, and in the transactions in controversy the son obtained a substantial advantage. . . . Where such confidential relation exists, and it appears that the party occupying the superior position has dealt with the one to whom he owes a duty arising out of such relation, and has gained a substantial advantage thereby, the burden is on the one who holds such superior position to prove that he acted in perfect good faith, gave to the other party full and accurate information possessed by him, took no advantage of his knowledge, or his influence over the other party, and that the transaction involved was fair, well understood, and voluntarily carried out by the person to whom he owed such duty."

In Shields v. Burge, 171 Ky. 149, 188 S. W. 321, it was said: "Under the construction of social life prevailing in this country, members of families, as they arrive at mature years, drift away from the home where they were reared, and from the association with their parents, and commence the imposed social duty of rearing families of their own. If perchance others are left at home with the parents, they should not be permitted, and are not permitted, by artifices and wiles which they may practice upon their parents, to secure for themselves the property to which the absent children have as just a claim as themselves, for it cannot be said, as a rule, that the parents only are the beneficiaries of such relationships, because observation teaches that more frequently than otherwise the ones remaining at home are the greater beneficiaries. And it is the policy of the law, when it is found that the rule just referred to has been violated, to clearly scrutinize all the facts and circumstances, and if it is found that the confidence imposed and growing out of the relationship existing between the parties has been abused, and undue advantages obtained, to correct such abuses by granting such equitable relief as the facts justify."

Where a son was in entire control of the affairs of his mother who was unexperienced in business, the fact that a deed of conveyance by her to him was without adequate consideration has been held to warrant a presumption that he procured the execution of the deed by undue influence and the burden of overcoming this presumption was on him. Hull v. Mitchell (Ia.) 162 N. W. 235.

Where it appeared that a deed of conveyance by a mother was made by her in her last illness, it was held that the proof of undue influence, exercised by the grantee, her daughter, need not be very strong since the law looks with suspicion on deathbed transfers. Miller v. Taylor, 165 Ky. 463, 177 S. W. 247, wherein a mere suggestion by the daughter to the mother that the other children made mean remarks about her which tended to work up the mother's feelings against the other children was held to be sufficient to set aside the deed.

It was held in Whaley v. Crittenden, 192 Ala. 341, 68 So. 886, that while the prima facie presumption is that the parent was the stronger and dominant party, when it is shown by proof that the child as a matter of fact was the dominant party the burden shifts to the child to show the fairness of a conveyance to him.

A conspicuously unequal division of the father's property by deeds of conveyance to his several children, giving the largest parcel of land to the one who was in constant attendance on the grantor who was of weak mentality, has been held to be sufficient to put the burden on the grantee to show that the transaction was fair. Williamson v. Lowe, 172 Ky. 80, 188 S. W. 1065. Compare Westphal v. Heckman (Ind.) 113 N. E. 299.

Where at the time of making a deed a father was seventy-two years of age and largely under the influence of his son and the evidence tended to show that the father did not understand that the deed would limit or circumscribe his rights in respect to his property, and that the execution of the deed was conceived and brought about by some other controlling mind, the circumstances were held to be sufficient to support a decree setting aside the deed. Normand v. Normand, 89 Vt. 77, 94 Atl. 172.

In Jacobus v. Waits, 36 N. J. Eq. 148, 97 Atl. 958, it appeared that a mother, seventy years old, while seriously ill and unable to understand fully the consequences of her acts, conveyed to her daughter nearly all of her property without consideration; the evidence tended to show that the mother did not make the conveyance voluntarily but at the solicitation of her daughter while at the latter's home. In an action brought by the mother to set aside the deeds, it was held that the burden was on the daughter to show that the transaction was not tainted with undue influence.

In Preston v. Lloyd, 269 Ill. 152, 109 N. E. 687, it appeared that a father, who was an old man, was about to remarry. His daughter, after hearing of the proposed marriage of her father and with a view of protecting the rights of herself and family in his property, made an appeal to his sense of justice and his affections and thus persuaded him to convey to her certain property. In an action to set aside the deed it was held that the daughter's appeal under the circumstances did not amount to undue influence. The court said: "Upon the issue of undue influence in procuring the execution and delivery of the deed, chiefly relied upon as the bill stood before amendment, we think appellant has not made such proof as would justify setting aside and vacating the deed. Mrs. Lloyd prudently consulted legal counsel and a physician, after receiving notice of the proposed marriage of her father at the age of seventy-seven years, with a view of protecting the rights of himself and of herself and family in his property through a conservatorship, if the same should appear necessary. He knew of this, but her appeal to him to put in writing his promises to her concerning the farm appears to have been made through his affections and his sense of justice, and this is not wrongful and is not undue influence."

It has been held that the fact that a mother depended on her son for advice more than on others and that "he was her pet" was not enough to raise a presumption of undue influence; that there must be substantial evidence showing a special trust in the management of the mother's business matters or unusual influence arising from the son's personal care and charge of the mother to create the presumption. McFarland v. Brown (Mo.) 193 S. W. 800.

In Williams v. Williams (Mich.) 164 N. W. 374, it appeared that a father deeded his property to his son in consideration of maintenance and support. At the time of the conveyance the father was seventy-seven years old, and somewhat hard of hearing. The evidence did not disclose that the son exercised undue influence in bringing about the conveyance. On the contrary it appeared that the father was satisfied with the arrangement, and that the son performed the conditions on which the conveyance was given. The court refused to set aside the conveyance, saying: "That the presumptions are against transactions of this nature and they are critically scrutinized by the courts, putting the burden of proof upon those seeking to sustain them, requires no citation of authority. In view of plaintiff's age, their kinship, and the confidential relations shown to exist between them at the time, it was incumbent upon defendants to show that the agreement with their father was not to his disadvantage, was fair to him and of his own free will, that no advantage was taken by them of his age, mental condition, or confidence in them, that they have fulfilled the terms of their agreement, in letter and spirit, so far as permitted by him, and are ready and willing to continue so to do."

It was held in Shaughnessy v. Shaughnessy, 135 Minn. 262, 160 N. W. 769, that the burden of establishing undue influence in a conveyance by a mother to her daughter was on the person attacking the conveyance, and an instruction to the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the relations between the parent and the child were such that the former relied on the latter in all her business affairs, then the burden of proof shifted and it devolved on the child to show that the deeds were free from undue influence, was held to be erroneous. The court said: "While proof of confidential relationship under certain circumstances gives rise to a presumption, or more accurately, perhaps, to an inference of undue influence exerted by the one benefited by the transaction, we take it the jury is not compelled to accept the presumption or inference as sufficient to establish undue influence as a fact. Hence the court should not instruct that the mere coming into play of an evidentiary presumption, which may or may not be accepted by the jury, shifts the burden of proof from the party upon whom it is placed by the general rules of practice."

Following the decision in Rader v. Rader, 108 Minn. 139, 121 N. W. 393, it was held in Thill v. Freiermuth, 135 Minn. 262, 156 N. W. 260, that a transaction resulting in a deed from a parent to a child will be scrutinized carefully; but that the presumption is in favor of the validity of the deed.

HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY

v.

MITCHELL ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—December 10, 1917.

245 U. S. 229; 38 S. Ct. 65.

Appearance — Objection to Jurisdiction — Effect.

Under the federal practice, an appearance to object to the jurisdiction of the court does not bind the parties appearing to submit to the jurisdiction on the overruling of the objection.

Injunctions — Parties — Successor of Official — Necessity of Service of Process.

In a suit for an injunction against officers of certain labor unions and others, it is error to grant personal relief by injunction against persons who, pending the suit, were chosen to succeed some of the original defendants as officers of such unions, but who were not served with process and did not appear, on the ground that they were before the court by representation, as there is no such privity between the holder of an office in a voluntary association and his successor as to bind the latter by process issued against the former, and the suit was not a representative one within equity rule 38 (198 Fed. xxix, 115 C. C. A. xxix), providing that when a question is one of common or general interest to many persons constituting a class so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the whole.

Form of Decree — Official Party — Injunction in Individual Capacity Only.

In a suit to enjoin certain persons individually and as officers of labor unions, the error, if any, in enjoining them only in their individual capacities, and not in their official capacities, may not be complained of by them.

Improper Inclusion of Persons in Injunction — Right of Others to Object.

In a suit for injunction against officers of labor unions, a clause in the decree, enjoining as confederates all present and future members of the unions, is not a matter of which the defendants may complain.

Labor Combinations — Injunction against Officer — Possibility of Injury to Complainant.

Where one attempting to organize the employees of a mine was acting as agent of an organized body of men united in a purpose to close the mine unless the proprietor would make it a union mine, and who lacked the power to carry out that purpose only because they had not, as yet, persuaded a sufficient number of the miners to join with them, and employed such agent with the very object of securing the support of the necessary number of miners, the right to an injunction against his activities is not dependent on whether he had power or authority to shut down the mine.

Injunction against Unionizing Employees.

An employer, operating a nonunion mine and having agreements with his employees that they would not become members of a union, is as much entitled to an injunction to prevent the unionizing of the miners as the unionizing of the mine, assuming that there is a practical distinction between the two; the first being but a step in the process of unionizing the mine.

[See note at end of this case.]

Conspiracy — Declarations of Coconspirators — Proof of Conspiracy as Prerequisite to Admission.

In order that the declarations and conduct of third persons may be admissible against defendant, it is necessary to show by independent evidence that there was a combination between them and defendants, but it is not necessary to show by independent evidence that the combination was criminal or otherwise unlawful, and the element of illegality may be shown by the declarations themselves.

Same.

Where H. was engaged in an effort to organize the coal mines of a particular district as the representative of a voluntary association of which defendants were active members, and in the execution of a purpose to which they had given consent, and in which some of them were actively co-operating, his declarations and conduct while so doing are evidence against defendants.

Labor Combinations — Right of Employer to Forbid Membership.

An employer is acting within his lawful rights in making nonmembership in a union a condition of employment, and no explanation or justification for such course is needed.

Same.

The right of an employer to make nonmembership in a union a condition of employment is a part of the constitutional rights of personal liberty and private property which cannot be taken away even by legislation, unless through some proper exercise of the paramount police power.

Injunction against Unionizing Employees.

Where an employer makes nonmembership in a labor union a condition of employment, with the free assent of its employees, the fact that the employment is at will and terminable by either party at any time does not affect the right of the employer to an injunction against the efforts of third parties to organize the employees.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The right of employees to strike gives no right to a third party having no agency for the employees to instigate a strike, even though they have a grievance.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Workingmen have a right to form unions and to enlarge their membership by inviting other workingmen to join, but this right, like all other rights, must be exercised with reasonable regard for the conflicting rights of others.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A combination to procure concerted breaches of contract by plaintiff's employees constitutes a violation of plaintiff's legal rights, though the measures resorted to stop short of physical violence or coercion through fear of such violence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Plaintiff was operating a nonunion mine under a mutual agreement, assented to by every employee, that it would not recognize the union, and that if any man wanted to become a member of the union he might do so, but could not be a member and remain in its employ. Defendants, with full notice of this working agreement and without any agency for the employees, but as representatives of an organization of mine workers in other states and in order to require the operation of the mine as a union mine, sent their agent to the mine, who with full notice of and for the very purpose of subverting the status arising from the working agreement and subjecting the mine to union control, proceeded, without physical violence, but by persuasion accompanied by deceptive statements, to induce the employees to join the union, and at the same time to break their agreement with plaintiff by remaining in its employ after joining, and this was done, not for the purpose of enlarging the membership of the union, but of coercing plaintiff through a strike, or the threat of one, into recognition of the union. It is held that the purpose and the methods resorted to were unlawful and not justified as a fair exercise of the right to increase the membership of the union, and plaintiff was entitled to an injunction against such acts; the damage resulting from a strike being regarded as irretrievable at law.

Certiorari to United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit.

[232] PITNEY, J.—This was a suit in equity, commenced October 24, 1907, in the United States Circuit (afterwards District) Court for the Northern District of West Virginia, by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, against certain citizens of the State of Ohio, sued individually and also as officers of the United Mine Workers of America. Other non-citizens of plaintiff's State were named as defendants but not served with process. Those who were served and who answered the bill were T. L. Lewis, Vice President of the U. M. W. A. and of the International Union U. M. W. A.; William Green, D. H. Sullivan, and "George" W. Savage (his correct Christian name is Gwilym), respectively President, Vice President, and Secretary-Treasurer of District No. 6, U. M. W. A.; and A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, and Lee Rankin, respectively President, Vice President and Secretary-Treasurer of Sub-district No. 5 of District No. 6.

[233] Plaintiff owns about 5,000 acres of coal lands situate at or near Benwood, in Marshall County, West Virginia, and within what is known as the "Pan Handle District" of that State, and operates a coal mine thereon, employing between 200 and 300 men, and having an annual output, in and before 1907, of about 300,000 tons. At the time of the filing of the bill, and for a considerable time before and ever since, it operated its mine "non-union," under an agreement with its men to the effect that the mine should be run on a non-union basis, that the employees should not become connected with the Union while employed by plaintiff, and that if they joined it their employment with plaintiff should cease. The bill set forth these facts, inter alia, alleged that they were known to defendants and each of them, and "that the said defendants have unlawfully and maliciously agreed together, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, the purpose of which they are proceeding to carry out and are now about to finally accomplish, namely: to cause your orator's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled, until such time as your orator shall submit to the demand of the Union that it shall unionize its plant, and having submitted to such demand unionize its plant by employing only union men who shall become subject to the orders of the Union," etc. The general object of the bill was to obtain an injunction to restrain defendants from interfering with the relations existing between plaintiff and its employees in order to compel plaintiff to "unionize" the mine.

upon made a motion to modify the injunction, which was refused. 172 Fed. 963. An appeal taken by defendants from this order was dismissed by the Circuit Court of Appeals 176 Fed. 549. Afterwards [234] they applied for and obtained leave to withdraw their answers and file others; the order, however, prescribed that the withdrawn answers were "not to be removed from the file." The new answers denied all material averments of the bill, some of which had been admitted in the former answers. Plaintiff, having filed replications, obtained an order that the former answers should be treated as evidence on behalf of the plaintiff upon the issue joined. Upon this evidence and other evidence introduced before the court orally, the case was submitted, with the result that a final decree was made January 18, 1913, granting a perpetual injunction. 202 Fed. 512. This was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals June 1, 1914 (214 Fed. 685), but the mandate was stayed pending an application to this court for a writ of certiorari. Afterwards an appeal was allowed. This court dismissed the appeal, but granted the writ of certiorari (241 U. S. 644), the record on appeal to stand as a return.

The final decree of the District Court included an award of injunction against John Mitchell, W. B. Wilson, and Thomas Hughes, who while named as defendants in the bill were not served with process and entered no appearance except to object to the jurisdiction of the court over them. Under the federal practice, the appearance to object did not bind these parties to submit to the jurisdiction on the overruling of the objection (Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 479, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 237, 238; Southern Pac. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 206, 13 S. Ct. 44, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 942, 945; Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194, 209, 13 S. Ct. 859, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 699, 705; Goldrey v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518, 15 S. Ct. 559, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 517; Davis v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 217 U. S. 157, 174, 18 Ann. Cas. 907, 30 S. Ct. 463, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 708, 718, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 823), and since the injunction operates only in personam, it was erroneous to include them as defendants. It also was erroneous to include personal relief by injunction against certain named parties who, pending suit, were chosen to succeed some of the original defendants as officers of the international, district, and sub-district [235] unions, but who were not served with process and did not appear, they being included upon the ground that they were "before the court by representation through service having been had upon their said predecessors in office." This suit was commenced, and was carried to final decree in the trial court, before the taking effect of the present Equity Rules (226 U. S. 629), and hence is governed by the former Rule 48 (210 U. S. 524), under which the rights of absent parties were expressly reserved.

But these procedural difficulties do not affect that part of the decree which awarded an injunction against the answering defendants (Lewis, Green, Sullivan, Savage, Watkins, Zelenka, and Rankin) "individually" and not as officers of the Union or its branches except as to Savage, against whom the decree goes in both his individual and official capacities, he alone having retained at the time of the final decree the same office he held at the beginning of the suit. If there was error in excluding the "official" responsibility of the others, it was not one of which they could complain, and it was not assigned for error upon their appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals. If they were subject to injunction at all, they were so in their individual capacities. Whether the decree will bind their successors in office, or their fellow-members of the Union, is a question to be determined hereafter, if and when proceedings are taken to enforce the injunction against parties other than the answering defendants.

We proceed, therefore, to consider the case as it stands against the answering defendants.

The District Court based its decision upon two grounds: (1) That the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America, and its branches, as conducted and managed at the time of the suit and for many years before, was a common-law conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of trade, and also and especially a conspiracy against the rights of non-union miners in West Virginia; [236] and (2) That the defendants, in an effort to compel the plaintiff to enter into contractual relations with the Union relating to the employment of labor and the production of coal, although having knowledge of express contracts existing between plaintiff and its employees which excluded relations with the Union, endeavored by unlawful means to procure a breach of these contracts by the employees.

A brief recital of previous transactions between the parties becomes material. The Union is a voluntary and unincorporated association which was organized in the year 1890 in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and afterwards was extended to other States. It is made up of national or "international," district, sub-district, and local unions. District No. 6 comprises the coal districts of Ohio and the Panhandle of West Virginia. Sub-district No. 5 of that district comprises five counties and parts of counties in Ohio, and the Panhandle.

The answering defendants were and are active and influential members—leaders—of the Union, as well as officers. Savage, Lewis, and Sullivan have been members from its formation in 1890, and have held important offices in it and attended the national conventions. The others are long-time members, and possessed an influence indicated by the offices they held, but not limited to the duties of those offices.

From 1897 to 1906 what were known as joint interstate conferences were held annually or biennially between officials of the Union and representatives of the operators in the "Central Competitive Field" (which includes Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, but not West Virginia), for the purpose of agreeing upon the scale of wages and the conditions of employment in that field. In addition there were occasional conferences of the same character affecting other States and districts.

[237] Plaintiff's mine is within the territorial limits of Sub-district No. 5 of District No. 6. Coal-mining operations were commenced there in the early part of the year 1902, and the mine was operated "non-union" until April, 1903, when, under threats from the Union officials, including defendants Watkins and Sullivan, that a certain unionized mine in Ohio, owned by the same proprietors, would be closed down if the men at the Hitchman were not allowed to organize, plaintiff consented to the unionization of the latter mine. This went into effect on the 1st of April, 1903, and upon the very next day the men were called out on strike because of a disagreement with the company as to the basis upon which mining should be paid for. The strike continued until May 23, requiring plaintiff to cease operations and preventing it from fulfilling its contracts, the most important of which was one for the daily supply of engine coal to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at a coaling station adjoining the mine. The financial loss to plaintiff was serious. The strike was settled and the men resumed work upon the basis of a modification of the official mining scale applicable to the Hitchman mine.

Again, in the spring of 1904, there was difficulty in renewing the scale. A temporary scale, agreed upon between operators and miners for the month of April, 1904, was signed in behalf of the Hitchman Company on the 18th of April. Two days later the men at the Hitchman struck, and the mine remained idle for two months, during which time plaintiff sustained serious losses in business and was put to heavy expense in obtaining coal from other sources to fill its contract with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. The strike was settled by the adoption of the official scale for the Panhandle District, with amendatory local rules for the Hitchman mine.

After this there was little further trouble until April 1, [238] 1906, when a disagreement arose between the Union and an association of operators with which plaintiff was not connected—the association being in fact made up of its competitors—about arranging the terms of the scale for the ensuing two years. At the same time a similar disagreement arose between the operators and the Union officials in the Central Competitive Field. The result was a termination of the interstate conferences and a failure to establish any official scale for the ensuing two years, followed by a widespread strike, or a number of concurrent strikes, involving the most of the bituminous coal-producing districts. There was absolutely no grievance or ground of disagreement at the Hitchman mine, beyond the fact that the mining scale expired by its own terms on March 31, and the men had not received authority from the Union officials either to renew it or to agree to a new one in its place. Plaintiff came to an understanding with the local union to the effect that if its men would continue at work the company would pay them from April 1st whatever the new scale might be, except that if the new scale should prove to be lower than that which expired on March 31, there should be no reduction in wages, while if the scale was raised the company would pay the increased amount, dating it back to April 1st. This was satisfactory to the men; but as the question of a new scale was then under discussion at a conference between the officials of the Union and the representatives of the Operators' Association, and plaintiff's employees wished to get the sanction of their officers, the manager of the Hitchman mine got into communication with those officials, including defendant Green, President of District No. 6, and endeavored to secure their assent to the temporary arrangement, but without success. Then a committee of the local union, including Daugherty, its President, took up the matter with Green and received permission to mine and load engine coal [239] until further notice from him. Under this arrangement the men remained at work for about two weeks. On April 15th, defendant Zelenka, Vice President of the sub-district, visited the mine, called a meeting of the miners, and addressed them in a foreign tongue, as a result of which they went on strike the next day, and the mine was shut down until the 12th of June, when it resumed as a "non-union" mine, so far as relations with the U. M. W. A. were concerned.

During this strike plaintiff was subjected to heavy losses and extraordinary expenses with respect to its business, of the same kind that had befallen it during the previous strikes.

About the 1st of June a self-appointed committee of employees called upon plaintiff's president, stated in substance that they could not remain longer on strike because they were not receiving benefits from the Union, and asked upon what terms they could return to work. They were told that they could come back, but not as members of the United Mine Workers of America; that thenceforward the mine would be run non-union, and the company would deal with each man individually. They assented to this, and returned to work on a non-union basis. Mr. Pickett, the mine superintendent, had charge of employing the men, then and afterwards, and to each one who applied for employment he explained the conditions, which were that while the company paid the wages demanded by the Union and as much as anybody else, the mine was run non-union and would continue so to run; that the company would not recognize the United Mine Workers of America; that if any man wanted to become a member of that union he was at liberty to do so; but he could not be a member of it and remain in the employ of the Hitchman Company; that if he worked for the company he would have to work as a non-union man. To this each man employed gave his assent, understanding [240] that while he worked for the company he must keep out of the Union.

Since January, 1908 (after the commencement of the suit), in addition to having this verbal understanding, each man has been required to sign an employment card expressing in substance the same terms. This has neither enlarged nor diminished plaintiff's rights, the agreement not being such as is required by law to be in writing.

Under this arrangement as to the terms of employment, plaintiff operated its mine from June 12, 1906, until the commencement of the suit in the fall of the following year.

During the same period a precisely similar method of employment obtained at the Glendale mine, a property consisting of about 1,200 acres of coal land adjoining the Hitchman property on the south, and operated by a company having the same stockholders and the same management as the Hitchman; the office of the Glendale mine being at the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company's office. Another mine in the Panhandle, known as the Richland, a few miles north of the Hitchman, likewise was run "non-union."

In fact, all coal mines in the Panhandle and elsewhere in West Virginia, except in a small district known as the Kanawha field, were run "non-union," while the entire industry in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois was operated on the "closed-shop" basis, so that no man could hold a job about the mines unless he was a member of the United Mine Workers of America. Pennsylvania occupied a middle ground, only a part of it being under the jurisdiction of the Union. Other States need not be particularly mentioned.

The unorganized condition of the mines in the Panhandle and some other districts was recognized as a serious interference with the purposes of the Union in the [241] Central Competitive Field, particularly as it tended to keep the cost of production low, and, through competition with coal produced in the organized field, rendered it more difficult for the operators thereto maintain prices high enough to induce them to grant certain concessions demanded by the Union. This was the subject of earnest and protracted discussion in the annual international convention of the U. M. W. A. held at Indianapolis, Indiana, in the month of January, 1907, at which all of the answering defendants were present as delegates and participated in the proceedings. The discussion was based upon statements contained in the annual reports of John Mitchell, as President of the Union (joined as a defendant in the bill but not served with process), and of defendant Lewis, as Vice President, respecting the causes and consequences of the strike of 1906, and the policy to be adopted by the Union for the future. In these reports it was made to appear that the strike had been caused immediately by the failure of the joint convention of operators and miners representing the central and southwestern competitive fields, held in the early part of the year 1906, to come to an agreement for a renewal of the mining scale; that the strike was widespread, involving not less than 400,000 mine workers, was terminated by "district settlements," with variant results in different parts of the territory involved, and had not been followed by a renewal of the former relations between the operators and miners in the Central Competitive Field. Another result of the strike was a large decrease in the membership of the Union. Two measures of relief were proposed: first, that steps be taken to re-establish the joint interstate conferences; and second, the organization of the hitherto unorganized fields, including the Panhandle District of West Virginia, under closed-shop agreements, with all men about the mines included in the membership of the United Mine Workers [242] of America. In the course of the discussion the purpose of organizing West Virginia in the interest of the unionized mine workers in the Central Competitive Field, and the probability that it could be organized only by means of strikes, were repeatedly declared and were disputed by nobody. All who spoke advocated strikes, differing only as to whether these should be nation-wide or sectional. Defendant Lewis, in his report, recommended an abandonment of the policy of sectional settlements which had been pursued in the previous year. This recommendation, interpreted as a criticism of the policy pursued under the leadership of President Mitchell in the settlement of the 1906 strike, was the subject of long and earnest debate, in the course of which Lewis said: "When we organize West Virginia, when we organize the unorganized sections of Pennsylvania, we will organize them by a strike movement." And again, towards the close of the debate: "No one has made the statement that we can organize West Virginia without a strike." Defendant Green took part, favoring the view of Mr. Lewis that strikes should be treated nationally instead of sectionally. In the course of his remarks he said: "I say to you, gentlemen, one reason why I opposed the policy that was pursued last year was because over in Ohio we were peculiarly situated. We had West Virginia on the south and Pennsylvania on the east, and after four months of a strike in eastern Ohio we had reached the danger line. We felt keenly the competition from West Virginia, and during the suspension our mines in Ohio chafed under the object lesson they had. They saw West Virginia coal go by, train-load after train-load passing their doors, when they were on strike. This coal supplied the markets that they should have had. There is no disguising the fact, something must be done to remedy this condition. Year after year Ohio has had to go home and strike in some portion of the district to enforce the [243] interstate agreement that was signed up here. . . . I confess here and now that the overwhelming sentiment in Ohio was that a settlement by sections would not correct the conditions we complained of. Now, something must be done; it is absolutely necessary to protect us against the competition that comes from the unorganized fields east of us." Mr. Mitchell opposed the view of defendant Lewis, reiterating an opinion, repeatedly expressed before, that West Virginia and the other unorganized fields, "would not be thoroughly organized except as the result of a successful strike;" but declaring that "they will not be organized at all, strike or no strike, unless we are able to support the men in those fields from the first day they lay down their tools. . . . Now, I believe it is possible, indeed I believe it is probable, that in the not distant future we will be able to inaugurate a movement in West Virginia and the other unorganized fields that will involve them in a strike, and then we will expect you to furnish the sinews of war, as you have done in the past, to keep these men in idleness."

The discussion continued during three days, and at the end of it the report of a committee which expressed disagreement with Vice President Lewis' opposition to sectional settlements and recommended "a continuation in the future of the same wise, conservative business-like policies" that had been pursued by President Mitchell, was adopted by a viva voce vote.

The plain effect of this action was to approve a policy which, as applied to the concrete case, meant that in order to relieve the union miners of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois from the competition of the cheaper product of the non-union mines of West Virginia, the West Virginia mines should be "organized" by means of strikes local to West Virginia, the strike benefits to be paid by assessments upon the union miners in the other States mentioned, while they remained at work.

[244] This convention was followed by an annual convention of Sub-district 5 of District 6, held in the month of March, 1907, at which defendants Watkins and Rankin were present as President and Secretary of the sub-district. Defendant Lewis, as National Vice President, occupied the chair during several of the sessions. Defendant Zelenka was present as a delegate, and also Thomas Hughes, who, while named as a defendant in the present suit, was not served with process. Watkins and Rankin in their reports recommended the complete unionization of the mines in the Panhandle counties, with particular reference to the Hitchman, the Glendale, the Richland, and two others; and as a result it was resolved "that the Sub-District officers, together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done."

Evidently in pursuance of this resolution, defendants Green, Zelenka, and Watkins, about July 1, 1907, called at plaintiff's office and laid before its general manager, Mr. Koch, a proposition for the unionization of the mine. He declined to consider it, but at their request laid it before plaintiff's board of directors, who rejected the proposition, and the manager informed Green of this. In one of the interviews Koch informed these defendants of the terms of plaintiff's working agreement with its employees to the effect that the mine was to be run non-union and they were not to become members of the Union.

About the same time, a Mr. McKinley, who was operating the Richard mine non-union, was interviewed by the Union leaders, notified of the resolution adopted by the sub-district convention, and, having asked that his mine be let alone, was met with the threat that they would secure the support of his men, and that if he did not recognize the Union they would shut down his mine. [245] In one of the interviews that ensued he was told that it was their purpose to organize the Glendale, the Hitchman, the Richland, and some other mines; that at the Glendale they had twenty-four men who had joined the organization, "and that they had sixty men who had signed up or had agreed to join the organization at Hitchman, and that they were going to shut the mine down as soon as they got a few more men." With respect to their progress at his own mine he was kept in the dark until about the middle of October, 1907, when, through the activities of the organizer Hughes, they succeeded in shutting it down, and it remained closed until a restraining order was allowed by the court, immediately after which it resumed non-union.

The evidence renders it clear that Hughes was sent into the Panhandle to organize all the mines there, in accordance with the resolution of the sub-district convention. The bill made a statement of his activities, and alleged that he was acting as an organizer for the Union. Defendants' final answers made a complete denial, but in this are contradicted by admissions made in the earlier answers and by other and undisputed evidence. The only defendant who testified upon the subject declared that Hughes was employed by District No. 6 as an organizer, but denied that he had power or authority to shut down the Hitchman mine.

He arrived at that mine some time in September, 1907, and remained there or in that vicinity until the latter part of October, conducting a campaign of organization at the Hitchman and at the neighboring Glendale and Richland mines.

The evidence shows that he had distinct and timely notice that membership in the Union was inconsistent with the terms of employment at all three mines, and a violation of the express provisions of the agreement at the Hitchman and Glendale.

[246] Having unsuccessfully applied to Koch and McKinley for their co-operation, Hughes proceeded to interview as many of the men as he could reach and to hold public meetings in the interest of the Union. There is clear and uncontradicted evidence that he did not confine himself to mere persuasion, but resorted to deception and abuse. In his public speeches he employed abusive language respecting Mr. Pickett, William Daugherty, and Jim Jarrett.¹ He prophesied, in such a way that ignorant, foreign-born miners, such as he was addressing, naturally might believe him to be speaking with knowledge, that the wages paid by the Hitchman would be reduced unless the mine was unionized. The evidence as to the methods he employed in personally interviewing the miners, while meagre, is significant. Myers, a Hitchman miner, testified: "He told me that he was a good friend of Mr. Koch, and that Mr. Koch had nothing against having the place organized again. He said he was a friend of his, and I made the remark that I would ask Mr. Koch and see if it was so; and he said no, that was of no use because he was telling me the truth." He did not confine his attentions to men who already were in plaintiff's employ, but in addition dissuaded men who had accepted employment from going to work.

A highly significant thing, giving character to Hughes' entire course of conduct, is that while his solicitation of the men was more or less public, as necessarily it had to be, he was careful to keep secret the number and the names of those who agreed to join the Union. Myers, being asked to allow his name to be entered on a book [247] that Hughes carried, tried to see the names already entered, "but he would not show anything; he told me he had it, and I asked him how many names was on it, and he said he had about enough to 'crack off.'" To Stewart, another Hitchman miner, he said "he was forming a kind of secret order among the men; he said he had a few men—he did not state the number of them—and he said each man was supposed to give him so much dues to keep it going, and then he said after he got the majority he would organize the place." Pickett, the mine superintendent, had learned of only five men at the Glendale who were inclined to join Hughes' movement; but when these were asked to remain outside of the mine for a talk, fifteen other men waited with them, and upon being reminded that while the company would not try to prevent them from becoming members of the Union, they could not be members and at the same time work for the Glendale Company, they all accepted this as equivalent to a notice of discharge. And, as has been stated, the owner of the Richland, while repeatedly threatened with unionization, was kept in the dark as to the progress made by the organizer amongst his employees until the mine was actually shut down.

The question whether Hughes had "power or authority" to shut down the Hitchman mine is beside the mark. We are not here concerned with any question of ultra vires, at the Hitchman, and had been, respectively, President and Financial Secretary of the local union at the time of the 1906 strike, when the local deserted the U. M. W. A.

¹ Mr. Pickett was superintendent of the Hitchman and Glendale mines, and it was with him that the miners made their agreements to refrain from membership in the Union; Daugherty and Jarrett were miners but with an actual threat of closing down plaintiff's mine, made by Hughes while acting as agent of an organized body of men who indubitably were united in a purpose to close it unless plaintiff would conform to their wishes with respect to its management, and who lacked the power to carry out that purpose only because they had not as yet persuaded a sufficient number of the Hitchman miners to join with them, and hence employed Hughes as an "organizer" and sent him to the mine with the very [248] object of securing the support of the necessary number of miners. They succeeded with respect to one of the mines threatened (the Richland), and preparations of like character were in progress at the Hitchman and the Glendale at the time the restraining order was made in this cause.

If there be any practical distinction between organizing the miners and organizing the mine, it has no application to this case. Unionizing the miners is but a step in the process of unionizing the mine, followed by the latter almost as a matter of course. Plaintiff is as much entitled to prevent the first step as the second, so far as its own employees are concerned, and to be protected against irreparable injury resulting from either. Besides, the evidence shows, without any dispute, that defendants contemplated no half-way measures, but were bent on organizing the mine, the "consent" of plaintiff to be procured through such a control of its employees as would render any further independent operation of the mine out of the question. This is evident from the discussions and resolutions of the international and sub-district conventions, from what was said by defendants Green, Zelenka, and Watkins to plaintiff's manager, and to the operator of the Richland, and from all that was said and done by Hughes in his effort to organize the Hitchman, Glendale, and Richland mines.

In short, at the time the bill was filed, defendants, although having full notice of the terms of employment existing between plaintiff and its miners, were engaged in an earnest effort to subvert those relations without plaintiff's consent, and to alienate a sufficient number of the men to shut down the mine, to the end that the fear of losses through stoppage of operations might coerce plaintiff into "recognizing the union" at the cost of its own independence. The methods resorted to by their "organizer" were such as have been described. The legal consequences remain for discussion.

[249] The facts we have recited are either admitted or else proved by clear and undisputed evidence and indubitable inferences therefrom. The proceedings of the international and sub-district conventions were shown by the introduction of official verbatim reports, properly authenticated. It is objected that these proceedings, especially in so far as they include the declarations and conduct of others than the answering defendants, are not admissible because the existence of a criminal or unlawful conspiracy is not made to appear by evidence aliunde. The objection is untenable. In order that the declarations and conduct of third parties may be admissible in such a case, it is necessary to show by independent evidence that there was a combination between them and defendants, but it is not necessary to show by independent evidence that the combination was criminal or otherwise unlawful. The element of illegality may be shown by the declarations themselves. The rule of evidence is commonly applied in criminal cases, but is of general operation; indeed, it originated in the law of partnership. It depends upon the principle that when any number of persons associate themselves together in the prosecution of a common plan or enterprise, lawful or unlawful, from the very act of association there arises a kind of partnership, each member being constituted the agent of all, so that the act or declaration of one, in furtherance of the common object, is the act of all, and is admissible as primary and original evidence against them. Pleasants v. Stearns, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 560, 563, 35 Am. Dec. 382; Love v. Dairymple, 117 Pa. St. 564, 568, 12 Atl. 567; Main v. Aukam, 4 App. Cas. (D. C.) 51, 56.

Upon a kindred principle, the declarations and conduct of an agent, within the scope and in the course of his agency, are admissible as original evidence against the principal, just as his own declarations or conduct would be admissible. Barreda v. Silsbee, 21 How. 146, 164, 165, 16 U. S. (L. ed.) 86, 92; Vicksburg, etc. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 104, 7 S. Ct. 118, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 299, 301; LaAbra Silver Min. Co. v. U. S. 175 U. S. 423, 498, 20 S. Ct. 168, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 223, 250. And since the evidence of Hughes' agency is clear and undisputed—that as the representative of a voluntary association of which the answering defendants were active members, and in the execution of a purpose to which they all had given consent, and in which some of them were actively co-operating, he was engaged in an effort to organize the coal mines of the Panhandle District—it is equally clear that his declarations and conduct while so doing are evidential against the defendants.

What are the legal consequences of the facts that have been detailed?

That the plaintiff was acting within its lawful rights in employing its men only upon terms of continuing nonmembership in the United Mine Workers of America is not open to question. Plaintiff's repeated costly experiences of strikes and other interferences while attempting to "run union" were a sufficient explanation of its resolve to run "non-union," if any were needed. But neither explanation nor justification is needed. Whatever may be the advantages of "Collective bargaining," it is not bargaining at all, in any just sense, unless it is voluntary on both sides. The same liberty which enables men to form unions, and through the union to enter into agreements [251] with employers willing to agree, entitles other men to remain independent of the union and other employers to agree with them to employ no man who owes any allegiance or obligation to the union. In the latter case, as in the former, the parties are entitled to be protected by the law in the enjoyment of the benefits of any lawful agreement they may make. This court repeatedly has held that the employer is as free to make non-membership in a union a condition of employment, as the working man is free to join the union, and that this is a part of the constitutional rights of personal liberty and private property, not to be taken away even by legislation, unless through some proper exercise of the paramount police power. Adair v. U. S. 208 U. S. 161, 174, 13 Ann. Cas. 764, 28 S. Ct. 277, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 436, 442; Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 14, 35 S. Ct. 240, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 441, 446, L.R.A.1915C 960. In the present case, needless to say, there is no act of legislation to which defendants may resort for justification.

Plaintiff, having in the exercise of its undoubted rights established a working agreement between it and its employees, with the free assent of the latter, is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of the resulting status, as in any other legal right. That the employment was "at will," and terminable by either party at any time, is of no consequence. In Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38, Ann. Cas. 1917B 283, 36 S. Ct. 7, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 131, 134, L.R.A.1916D 545, this court ruled upon the precise question as follows: "It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employee has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion, and, by the weight [252] of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will." (Citing many cases.)

In short, plaintiff was and is entitled to the good will of its employees, precisely as a merchant is entitled to the good will of his customers although they are under no obligation to continue to deal with him. The value of the relation lies in the reasonable probability that by properly treating its employees, and paying them fair wages, and avoiding reasonable grounds of complaint, it will be able to retain them in its employ, and to fill vacancies occurring from time to time by the employment of other men on the same terms. The pecuniary value of such reasonable probabilities is incalculably great, and is recognized by the law in a variety of relations. See Brennan v. United Hatters of North America (cited with approval in Truax v. Raich, supra), 73 N. J. L. 729, 749, 9 Ann. Cas. 698, 65 Atl. 165, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 254; *Brown v. The right of action for persuading an employee to leave his employer is universally recognized—nowhere more clearly than in West Virginia—and it rests upon fundamental principles of general application, not upon the English statute of laborers. Thacker Coal Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, 255; 8 Ann. Cas. 885, 886, 53 S. E. 161, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1091; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, 567; Angle v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 151 U. S. 1, 13, 14 S. Ct. 240, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 55, 63; Noice v. Brown, 39 N. J. L. 569, 572. We turn to the matters set up by way of justification or excuse for defendants' interference with the situation existing at plaintiff's mine.

The case involves no question of the rights of employees. [253] Defendants have no agency for plaintiff's employees, nor do they assert any disagreement or grievance in their behalf. In fact, there is none; but, if there were, defendants could not, without agency, set up any rights that employees might have. The right of the latter to strike would not give to defendants the right to instigate a strike. The difference is fundamental.

It is suggested as a ground of criticism that plaintiff endeavored to secure a closed non-union mine through individual agreements with its employees, as if this furnished some sort of excuse for the employment of coercive measures to secure a closed union shop through a collective agreement with the Union. It is a sufficient answer, in law, to repeat that plaintiff had a legal and constitutional right to exclude union men from its employ. But it may be worth while to say, in addition: first, that there was no middle ground open to plaintiff; no option to have an "open shop" employing union men and non-union men indifferently; it was the Union that insisted upon closed-shop agreements, requiring even carpenters employed about a mine to be members of the Union, and making the employment of any non-union man a ground for a strike; and secondly, plaintiff was in the reasonable exercise of its rights in excluding all union men from its employ, having learned, from a previous experience, that unless this were done union organizers might gain access to its mine in the guise of laborers.

Defendants set up, by way of justification or excuse, the right of workmen to form unions, and to enlarge their membership by inviting other workmen to join. The right is freely conceded, provided the objects of the union be proper and legitimate, which we assume to be true, in a general sense, with respect to the Union here in question. Gompers v. Bucks Stove, etc. Co. 221 U. S. 418, 439, 31 S. Ct. 492, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 797, 805, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874. The cardinal error of defendants' position lies [254] in the assumption that the right is so absolute that it may be exercised under any circumstances and without any qualification; whereas in truth, like other rights that exist in civilized society, it must always be exercised with reasonable regard for the conflicting rights of others. Brennan v. United Hatters of North America, 73 N. J. L. 729, 749, 9 Ann. Cas. 698, 65 Atl. 165, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 254. The familiar maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas—literally translated, "So use your own property as not to injure that of another person," but by more proper interpretation, "so as not to injure the rights of another," (Broom's Leg. Max. 8th ed. 289)—applies to conflicting rights of every description. For example, where two or more persons are entitled to use the same road or passage, each one in using it is under a duty to exercise care not to interfere with its use by the others, or to damage them while they are using it. And a most familiar application is the action for enticing an employee, in which it never was a justification that defendant wished to retain for himself the services of the employee. 1 Black Com. 429; 3 Id. 142.

Now, assuming defendants were exercising, through Hughes, the right to invite men to join their Union, still they had plain notice that plaintiff's mine was run "non-union," that none of the men had a right to remain at work there after joining the Union, and that the observance of this agreement was of great importance and value both to plaintiff and to its men who had voluntarily made the agreement and desired to continue working under it. Yet defendants, far from exercising any care to refrain from unnecessarily injuring plaintiff, deliberately and advisedly selected that method of enlarging their membership which would inflict the greatest injury upon plaintiff and its loyal employees. Every Hitchman miner who joined Hughes' "secret order" and permitted his name to be entered upon Hughes' list was guilty of a breach of his contract of employment and [255] acted a lie whenever thereafter he entered plaintiff's mine to work. Hughes not only connived at this, but must be deemed to have caused and procured it, for it was the main feature of defendants' plan, the sine qua non of their programme. Evidently it was deemed to be necessary, in order to "organize the Panhandle by a strike movement," that at the Hitchman, for example, man after man should be persuaded to join the Union, and having done so to remain at work, keeping the employer in ignorance of their number and identity, until so many had joined that by stopping work in a body they could coerce the employer and the remaining miners to "organize the mine," that is, to make an agreement that none but members of the Union should be employed, that terms of employment should be determined by negotiation not with the employees but with union officers—perhaps residents of other States and employees of competing mines—and that all questions in controversy between the mine operator and the miners should likewise be settled with outsiders.

True, it is suggested that under the existing contract an employee was not called upon to leave plaintiff's employ until he actually joined the Union, and that the evidence shows only an attempt by Hughes to induce the men to agree to join, but no attempt to induce them to violate their contract by failing to withdraw from plaintiff's employment after actually joining. But in a court of equity, which looks to the substance and essence of things and disregards matters of form and technical nicety, it is sufficient to say that to induce men to agree to join is but a mode of inducing them to join, and that when defendants "had sixty men who had signed up or agreed to join the organization at Hitchman," and were "going to shut the mine down as soon as they got a few more men," the sixty were for practical purposes, and therefore in the sight of equity, already members of the [256] Union, and it needed no formal ritual or taking of an oath to constitute them such; their uniting with the Union in the plan to subvert the system of employment at the Hitchman mine, to which they had voluntarily agreed and upon which their employer and their fellow employees were relying, was sufficient.

But the facts render it plain that what the defendants were endeavoring to do at the Hitchman mine and neighboring mines cannot be treated as a bona fide effort to enlarge the membership of the Union. There is no evidence to show, nor can it be inferred, that defendants intended or desired to have the men at these mines join the Union, unless they could organize the mines. Without this, the new members would be added to the number of men competing for jobs in the organized districts, while non-union men would take their places in the Panhandle mines. Except as a means to the end of compelling the owners of these mines to change their method of operation, the defendants were not seeking to enlarge the union membership.

In any aspect of the matter, it cannot be said that defendants were pursuing their object by lawful means. The question of their intentions—of their bona fides—cannot be ignored. It enters into the question of malice. As Bowen, L. J., justly said, in the Mogul Steamship Case, 23 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 613, "intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse." And the intentional infliction of such damage upon another, without justification or excuse, is malicious in law. Bitterman v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 207 U. S. 205, 223, 12 Ann. Cas. 693, 28 S. Ct. 91, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 171, 183; Brennan v. United Hatters of North America, 73 N. J. L. 729, 744 et seq. 9 Ann. Cas. 698, 65 Atl. 165, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254, and cases cited. Of course, in a court of equity, when passing upon the right of injunction, damage threatened, irremediable by action at law, is equivalent to damage done. And we cannot deem [257] the proffered excuse to be a "just cause or excuse," where it is based, as in this case, upon an assertion of conflicting rights that are sought to be attained by unfair methods, and for the very purpose of interfering with plaintiff's rights, of which defendants have full notice.

Another fundamental error in defendants' position consists in the assumption that all measures that may be resorted to are lawful if they are "peaceable"—that is, if they stop short of physical violence, or coercion through fear of it. In our opinion, any violation of plaintiff's legal rights contrived by defendants for the purpose of inflicting damage, or having that as its necessary effect, is as plainly inhibited by the law as if it involved a breach of the peace. A combination to procure concerted breaches of contract by plaintiff's employees constitutes such a violation. Flaccus v. Smith, 199 Pa. St. 128, 48 Atl. 894, 85 Am. St. Rep. 779, 54 L.R.A. 640; South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. [1905] A. C. 239, 244, 250, 253, 2 Ann. Cas. 436; George Jonas Glass Co. v. Glass Bottle Blowers' Assoc. 77 N. J. Eq. 219, 223, 79 Atl. 262, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 445.

The present is not a case of merely withholding from an employer an economic need—as a supply of labor—until he assents to be governed by union regulations. Defendants have no supply of labor of which plaintiff stands in need. By the statement of defendant Lewis himself, made in his formal report to the Indianapolis convention of 1907, out of more than 370,000 coal miners in the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, less than 80,000 (about 22 per cent) were members of the Union. Considering the Panhandle separately, doubtless the proportion was even smaller, and the supply of non-union labor ample. There is no reason to doubt that if defendants had been actuated by a genuine desire to increase the membership of the Union without unnecessary injury to the known rights of plaintiff, they would have permitted their proselytes to withdraw from plaintiff's employ when and as they became [258] affiliated with the Union—as their contract of employment required them to do—and that in this event plaintiff would have been able to secure an adequate supply of non-union men to take their places. It was with knowledge of this, and because of it, that defendants, through Hughes as their agent, caused the new members to remain at work in plaintiff's mine until a sufficient number of men should be persuaded to join so as to bring about a strike and render it difficult if not practically impossible for plaintiff to continue to exercise its undoubted legal and constitutional right to run its mine "non-union."

It was one thing for plaintiff to find, from time to time, comparatively small numbers of men to take vacant places in a going mine, another and a much more difficult thing to find a complete gang of new men to start up a mine shut down by a strike, when there might be a reasonable apprehension of violence at the hands of the strikers and their sympathizers. The disordered condition of a mining town in time of strike is matter of common knowledge. It was this kind of intimidation, as well as that resulting from the large organized membership of the Union, that defendants sought to exert upon plaintiff, and it renders pertinent what was said by this court in the Gompers Case, 221 U. S. 418, 439, 31 S. Ct. 492, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 797, 805, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874, immediately following the recognition of the right to form labor unions: "But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many as well as the many against the one."

[259] Defendants' acts cannot be justified by any analogy to competition in trade. They are not competitors of plaintiff; and if they were their conduct exceeds the bounds of fair trade. Certainly, if a competing trader should endeavor to draw custom from his rival, not by offering better or cheaper goods, employing more competent salesmen, or displaying more attractive advertisements, but by persuading the rival's clerks to desert him under circumstances rendering it difficult or embarrassing for him to fill their places, any court of equity would grant an injunction to restrain this as unfair competition.

Upon all the facts, we are constrained to hold that the purpose entertained by defendants to bring about a strike at plaintiff's mine in order to compel plaintiff, through fear of financial loss, to consent to the unionization of the mine as the lesser evil, was an unlawful purpose, and that the methods resorted to by Hughes—the inducing of employees to unite with the Union in an effort to subvert the system of employment at the mine by concerted breaches of the contracts of employment known to be in force there, not to mention misrepresentation, deceptive statements, and threats of pecuniary loss communicated by Hughes to the men—were unlawful and malicious methods, and not to be justified as a fair exercise of the right to increase the membership of the Union.

There can be no question that plaintiff was threatened with danger of an immediate strike as a result of the activities of Hughes.

The effect of his arguments and representations is not to be judged from the testimony of those witnesses who rejected his overtures. Naturally, it was not easy for plaintiff to find men who would testify that they had agreed with Hughes to break their contract with plaintiff. One such did testify. But the true measure of the extent of his operations and the probability of his carrying them to success are indicated by his [260] declaration to Myers that he had about enough names at the Hitchman to "crack off," by the statement to McKinley that twenty-four men at the Glendale mine had joined the organization, and sixty at the Hitchman, and by the fact that they actually succeeded in shutting down the Richland about the middle of October. The declaration made concerning the Glendale is corroborated by the evidence of what happened at that mine.

That the damage resulting from a strike would be irremediable at law is too plain for discussion.

Therefore, upon the undisputed facts of the case, and the indubitable inferences from them, plaintiff is entitled to relief by injunction. Having become convinced by three costly strikes, occurring within a period of as many years, of the futility of attempting to operate under a closed-shop agreement with the Union, it established the mine on a non-union basis, with the unanimous approval of its employees—in fact upon their suggestion—and under a mutual agreement, assented to by every employee, that plaintiff would continue to run its mine non-union and would not recognize the United Mine Workers of America; that if any man wanted to become a member of that Union he was at liberty to do so, but he could not be a member and remain in plaintiff's employ. Under that agreement plaintiff ran its mine for a year and more, and, so far as appears, without the slightest disagreement between it and its men, and without any grievance on their part. Thereupon defendants, having full notice of the working agreement between plaintiff and its men, and acting without any agency for those men, but as representatives of an organization of mine workers in other States, and in order to subject plaintiff to such participation by the Union in the management of the mine as necessarily results from the making of a closed-shop agreement, sent their agent to the mine, who, with full notice of, and for the very purpose of subverting, [261] the status arising from plaintiff's working agreement and subjecting the mine to the Union control, proceeded, without physical violence, indeed, but by persuasion accompanied with threats of a reduction of wages and deceptive statements as to the attitude of the mine management, to induce plaintiff's employees to join the Union and at the same time to break their agreement with plaintiff by remaining in its employ after joining; and this for the purpose not of enlarging the membership of the Union, but of coercing plaintiff, through a strike or the threat of one, into recognition of the Union.

As against the answering defendants, plaintiff's right to an injunction is clear; as to the others named as defendants, but not served with process, the decree is erroneous, as already stated.

Respecting the sweep of the injunction, we differ somewhat from the result reached by the District Court.

So far as it restrains—(1) Interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without its consent, by representing or causing to be represented to any of plaintiff's employees, or to any person who might become an employee of plaintiff, that such person will suffer or is likely to suffer some loss or trouble in continuing in or in entering the employment of plaintiff, by reason of plaintiff not recognizing the Union, or because plaintiff runs a non-union mine; (2) Interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing the mine without plaintiff's consent, and in aid of such purpose knowingly and wilfully bringing about the breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service known at the time to exist with plaintiff's present and future employees; (3) Knowingly and wilfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present or future, to leave plaintiff's service on the ground that plaintiff does not recognize the United Mine Workers of America or runs a non-union mine, [262] etc.; (4) Interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees so as knowingly and wilfully to bring about the breaking by plaintiff's employees, present and future, of their contracts of service, known to the defendants to exist, and especially from knowingly and wilfully enticing such employees, present or future, to leave plaintiff's service without plaintiff's consent; (5) Trespassing on or entering upon the grounds and premises of plaintiff or its mine for the purpose of interfering therewith or hindering or obstructing its business, or with the purpose of compelling or inducing, by threats, intimidation, violent or abusive language, or persuasion, any of plaintiff's employees to refuse or fail to perform their duties as such; and (6) Compelling or inducing or attempting to compel or induce, by threats, intimidation, or abusive or violent language, any of plaintiff's employees to leave its service or fail or refuse to perform their duties as such employees, or compelling or attempting to compel by like means any person desiring to seek employment in plaintiff's mine and works from so accepting employment therein;—the decree is fully supported by the proofs. But it goes further, and awards an injunction against picketing and against acts of physical violence, and we find no evidence that either of these forms of interference was threatened. The decree should be modified by eliminating picketing and physical violence from the sweep of the injunction, but without prejudice to plaintiff's right to obtain an injunction hereafter against these forms of interference if proof shall be produced, either in proceedings supplemented to this action or in an independent action, that such an injunction is needed.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed, and the decree of the District Court is modified as above stated, and as so modified it is affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

[263] BRANDEIS, J. (dissenting).—This suit was begun October 24, 1907. The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, plaintiff below, is the owner of a coal mine in West Virginia. John Mitchell and nine others, defendants below, were then the chief executive officers of the United Mine Workers of America and of its district and sub-district organizations having "jurisdiction" over the territory in which plaintiff's mine is situated; and were sued both individually and as such officers. The mine had been "unionized" about three years prior to April 16th, 1906; and until about that date was operated as a "union" mine, under a collective agreement with a local union of the United Mine Workers of America. Then a strike was declared by the union; and a short shut-down followed. While the strike so declared was still in force, as the bill alleges, the company re-opened the mine as a closed non-union mine. Thereafter persons applying for work were required as a condition of obtaining employment to agree that they would not, while in the service of the company, be a member of the union, and if they joined the union would withdraw from the company's employ.¹

"I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at [264] Alleging that efforts were being made illegally to unionize its mine "without its consent," the company brought in the United States Circuit (now District) Court for the Northern District of West Virginia this suit to enjoin such efforts. District Judge Dayton granted a restraining order upon the filing of the bill. An order was entered May 26, 1908, continuing it as a temporary injunction. A motion to modify the same was denied, September 21, 1909. 172 Fed. 963. An appeal from this order was dismissed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, March 11, 1910. 176 Fed. 549. The case was then heard on the merits; defendants having denied in their answer all the charges of unlawful conduct set forth in the bill; and on January 18, 1913, a decree was entered for a perpetual injunction substantially in the form of the restraining order. 202 Fed. 512. This decree was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals on June 1, 1914 (214 Fed. 685); but a stay was granted pending an application to this court for a writ of certiorari. The company appealed to this court and also applied for a writ of certiorari. The appeal was dismissed, as the jurisdiction of [265] the Circuit (District) Court was rested wholly upon diversity of citizenship, plaintiff being a corporation organized under the laws of West Virginia and all the defendants citizens and residents of other States. 241 U. S. 644. A writ of certiorari was granted, however, March 13, 1916. The case was argued at that term and a reargument was ordered.

The District Court held that the United Mine Workers of America with its subordinate branches constitutes an unlawful organization—illegal both under the law of West Virginia and under the Federal Anti-Trust Act; that its long continued effort to unionize the mines of West Virginia had not been "in the interest either of the betterment of mine labor in the State or of upholding that free commerce in coal between the States guaranteed by Federal law," but to restrain if not destroy it for the benefit of "rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Indiana, competitive fields" in which the mines had been unionized; and that "in pursuit of its unlawful purposes" the union "have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff . . . to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful effort to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employees."

The decree, besides the usual injunction against threat, intimidation, force or violence, and against inducing breaches of employees' contracts or trespassing upon plaintiff's property, enjoined defendants (and others hereinafter described), among other things, from—

1. "Representing ["for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent"] . . . to [266] any of plaintiff's employees, or to any person who might become an employee of plaintiff, that such person . . . is likely to suffer some loss or trouble in continuing in or in entering the employment of plaintiff, . . . representing . . . to such employee . . . that such loss or trouble . . . may come by reason of plaintiff not recognizing the United Mine Workers of America, or because plaintiff runs a non-union mine."

2. " . . . knowingly and wilfully enticing ["for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent"] plaintiff's employees, present or future, . . . to leave plaintiff's service, giving or assigning . . . as a reason for . . . leaving of plaintiff's service, that plaintiff does not recognize the United Mine Workers of America, or that plaintiff runs a non-union mine."

3. " . . . knowingly and wilfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present or future, . . . to leave plaintiff's service, without any time I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any efforts amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read."

Prior to that time, the agreement rested in oral understanding merely, and is sufficiently indicated in the following excerpts from the testimony of the mine superintendent as to what he told the men applying for employment:

"I also told them that any man who wanted to become a member of the United Mine Workers—that that was his business—but he could not be a member of the United Mine Workers and be affiliated with the United Mine Workers and be under the employ of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, or be under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers; that the mine was run non-union so far as the United Mine Workers of America were concerned.

"Q. You mean you made every man understand that while he worked for the Hitchman Company he must keep out of the union?

"A. Yes, sir; or at least they said they understood it."

plaintiff's consent, against plaintiff's will, and to plaintiff's injury."

4. "... establishing a picket . . . for the purpose of inducing . . . by . . . persuasion . . . any person . . . coming to plaintiff's mine to accept employment . . . to refuse . . . to accept service with plaintiff."

5. "... interfering in any manner whatsoever, either by . . . persuasion or entreaty with any person in the employ of plaintiff who has contracted with and is in the actual service of plaintiff to . . . induce him to quit the service of plaintiff . . . or assisting, or abetting in any manner" his doing so.

Three of the defendants—Mitchell, Wilson and Hughes—were never served with process and did not enter any appearance except to object to the jurisdiction of the court over them. Of the remaining seven all but two had, prior to the entry of the final decree, ceased to hold [267] any office either in the United Mine Workers of America or in any of the district or sub-district organizations. Nevertheless the decree directed that the injunction issue against each of the ten original defendants, "individually;" and also in their official capacities against their successors in office (who were named in the decree) although these had not been served with process or been named in the bill; the court declaring such persons to be "before the court by representation through service having been made upon their said predecessors in office, sued as such officers and as members of the United Mine Workers of America." The decree extended the injunction, among others, also to "all persons now members of said United Mine Workers of America, and all persons who though not now members do become members of said United Mine Workers of America."

The Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the decree of the District Court, held that the United Mine Workers of America was not an unlawful organization under the laws of West Virginia, that its validity under the Federal Anti-Trust Act could not be considered in this proceeding; that so long as defendants "refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate" their purpose "they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine;" that "the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance;" and specifically that there was nothing in the individual contracts which barred defendants from inducing the employees to join the union. With these conclusions I agree substantially.

First: The alleged illegality of the United Mine Workers of America under the law of West Virginia.

The United Mine Workers of America does not appear to differ essentially in character and purpose from other international unions which, like it, are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Its membership is said [268] to be larger than that of any other; and it may be more powerful. But the common law does not limit the size of unions or the degree to which individual workmen may by union increase their bargaining power. As stated in Gompers v. Bucks Stove, etc. Co. 221 U. S. 418, 439, 31 S. Ct. 492, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 797, 805, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874: "The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence and power that come from such association." We do not find either in the decisions or the statutes of West Virginia anything inconsistent with the law as declared by this court. The union is not an unlawful organization, and is not in itself an unlawful conspiracy. We have no occasion to consider the legality of the specific provisions contained in its constitution or by-laws.

Second: The alleged illegality of the United Mine Workers of America under the Federal Anti-Trust Act.

The District Judge undertook to pass upon the legality of the United Mine Workers of America under the Federal Anti-Trust Act; but the question was not in issue in the case. It had not been raised in the bill or by answer. Evidence bearing upon the issue was properly objected to by defendants and should have been excluded.

Third: The alleged conspiracy against the West Virginia Mines.

It was doubtless the desire of the United Mine Workers to unionize every mine on the American continent and especially those in West Virginia which compete directly with the mines of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other States already unionized. That desire and the purpose to effect it were not unlawful. They were part of a reasonable effort to improve the condition of workmen engaged in the industry by strengthening their bargaining power through unions; and extending the field of union power. No conspiracy to shut down or otherwise injure West Virginia was proved, nor was there [269] any averment in the bill of such conspiracy, or any issue otherwise raised by the pleadings which justified the consideration of that question by the District Court.¹

¹ This alleged conspiracy not being in issue, the District Court improperly allowed the introduction of, and considered, a mass of documents referring to various mine workers' conventions, and joint conventions of miners and operators held years previous to the filing of the bill. Judge Dayton laid great stress

Fourth: "Unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent."

The fundamental prohibition of the injunction is against acts done "for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent." Unionizing a shop does not mean inducing the employees to become members of the union.¹ It means inducing the employer [270] to enter into a collective agreement with the union governing the relations of the employer to the employees. Unionizing implies, therefore, at least formal consent of the employer. Both plaintiff and defendants insisted upon exercising the right to secure contracts for a closed shop. The plaintiff sought to secure the closed non-union shop through individual agreements with employees. The defendants sought to secure the closed union shop through a collective agreement with the union. Since collective bargaining is legal, the fact that the workingmen's agreement is made not by individuals directly with the employer, but by the employees with the union and by it, on their behalf, with the employer, is of no significance in this connection. The end being lawful, defendant's efforts to unionize the mine can be illegal, only if the methods or means pursued were unlawful; unless indeed there is some special significance in the expression "unionizing without plaintiff's consent."

It is urged that a union agreement curtails the liberty of the operator. Every agreement curtails the liberty of those who enter into it. The test of legality is not whether an agreement curtails liberty, but whether the parties have agreed upon some thing which the law prohibits or declares otherwise to be inconsistent with the public welfare. The operator by the union agreement [271] binds himself: (1) to employ only members of the union; (2) to negotiate with union officers instead of with employees individually the scale of wages and the hours of work; (3) to treat with the duly constituted representatives of the union to settle disputes concerning the discharge of men and other controversies arising out of the employment. These are the chief features of a "unionizing" by which the employer's liberty is curtailed. Each of them is legal. To obtain any of them or all of them men may lawfully strive and even strike. And, if the union may legally strike to obtain each of the things for which the agreement provides, why may it not strike or use equivalent economic pressure to secure an agreement to provide them?

It is also urged that defendants are seeking to "coerce" plaintiff to "unionize" its mine. But coercion, in a legal sense, is not exerted when a union merely endeavors to induce employees to join a union with the intention thereafter to order a strike unless the employer consents to unionize his shop. Such pressure is not coercion in a legal sense. The employer is free either to accept the agreement or the disadvantage. Indeed, the plaintiff's whole case is rested upon agreements secured under similar pressure of economic necessity or disadvantage. If it is coercion to threaten to strike unless plaintiff on reported declarations of the delegates to these conventions, although the declarations of alleged co-conspirators were obviously inadmissible, there being no foundation for the conspiracy charge.

1 A witness for the defendants testified as follows:

"There is a difference between unionizing a mine and unionizing the employees in a mine; unionizing the employees is having the men join the organization; unionizing a mine is creating joint relations between the employers and employees; a mine cannot be unionized unless the employer enters into contractual relations with the union; it is not the policy or purpose of the United Mine Workers as an organization to coerce a man into doing a thing against his will; this distinction between unionizing a mine and unionizing the employees of a mine has existed since the organization came about, and this method of unionizing a mine existed in 1906 and 1907."

A witness for the plaintiff testified that "the term 'union,' when applied to mining, means the United Mine Workers, and a union mine is a mine that is under their jurisdiction and so recognized. . . ." The contrary is "non-union or open shop." And further, "The men might be unionized at a mine and the mine owners not recognize the union. That would in effect be an open shop. When I said 'unionize the employees' I meant practically all of the employees; but a union mine, as I understand it, is one wherein the closed shop is practically enforced." In such case, the witness explained, the operator would be practically in contract relation with the organization.

It was also testified: "The difference between organizing the men at the mine and organizing the mine is that when the miners are organized the work of organizing the mine is only just started. They next proceed to meet with the operator who owns the mine, or operates it, for the purpose of making contracts or agreements. Under the constitution and methods of the United Mine Workers a mine cannot be organized without the consent of the owner, and it is not the object or purpose of the United Mine Workers to do so, and never has been; it has never been attempted as far as witness knows. After a mine has been organized, the agreement between the employer and the organization is paramount. The constitution of the organization has nothing to do with the workings afterwards; that agreement does not take away from the operator the control of his men."

consents to a closed union shop, it is coercion also to threaten not to give one employment unless the applicant will consent to a closed non-union shop. The employer may sign the union agreement for fear that labor may not be otherwise obtainable; the workman may sign the individual agreement for fear that employment may not be otherwise obtainable. But such fear does not imply coercion in a legal sense.

In other words an employer, in order to effectuate the closing of his shop to union labor, may exact an agreement to that effect from his employees. The agreement [272] itself being a lawful one, the employer may withhold from the men an economic need—employment—until they assent to make it. Likewise an agreement closing a shop to non-union labor being lawful, the union may withhold from an employer an economic need—labor—until he assents to make it. In a legal sense an agreement entered into, under such circumstances, is voluntarily entered into; and as the agreement is in itself legal, no reason appears why the general rule that a legal end may be pursued by legal means should not be applied. Or, putting it in other words, there is nothing in the character of the agreement which should make unlawful means used to attain it, which in other connections are recognized as lawful.

Fifth: There was no attempt to induce employees to violate their contracts.

The contract created an employment at will; and the employee was free to leave at any time. The contract did not bind the employee not to join the union; and he was free to join it at any time. The contract merely bound him to withdraw from plaintiff's employ, if he joined the union. There is evidence of an attempt to induce plaintiff's employees to agree to join the union; but none whatever of any attempt to induce them to violate their contract. Until an employee actually joined the union he was not, under the contract, called upon to leave plaintiff's employ. There consequently would be no breach of contract until the employee both joined the union and failed to withdraw from plaintiff's employ. There was no evidence that any employee was persuaded to do that or that such a course was contemplated. What perhaps was intended was to secure agreements or assurances from individual employees that they would join the union when a large number of them should have consented to do so; with the purpose, when such time arrived, to have them join the union [273] together and strike—unless plaintiff consented to unionize the mine. Such a course would have been clearly permissible under the contract.

Sixth: Merely persuading employees to leave plaintiff's employ or others not to enter it was not unlawful.

To induce third persons to leave an employment is actionable if done maliciously and without justifiable cause although such persons are free to leave at their own will. Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38, Ann. Cas. 1917B 283, 36 S. Ct. 7, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 131, 134, L.R.A.1916D 545; Thacker Coal Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, 8 Ann. Cas. 885, 53 S. E. 161, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1091. It is equally actionable so to induce others not to enter the service. The individual contracts of plaintiff with its employees added nothing to its right in this connection, since the employment was terminable at will.

As persuasion, considered merely as a means, is clearly legal, defendants were within their rights if, and only if, their interference with the relation of plaintiff to its employees was for justifiable cause. The purpose of interfering was confessedly in order to strengthen the union, in the belief that thereby the condition of workmen engaged in mining would be improved; the bargaining power of the individual workingman was to be strengthened by collective bargaining; and collective bargaining was to be ensured by obtaining the union agreement. It should not, at this day, be doubted that to induce workingmen to leave or not to enter an employment in order to advance such a purpose is justifiable when the workmen are not bound by contract to remain in such employment.

Seventh: There was no "threat, violence or intimidation."

The decree enjoined "threats, violence or intimidation." Such action would, of course, be unlawful though employed in a justifiable cause. But there is no evidence that any of the defendants have resorted to such means. The propaganda among plaintiff's employees was conducted almost entirely by one man, the defendant Hughes, a District No. 6 organizer. His actions were orderly and [274] peaceable, consisting of informal talks with the men, and a few quietly conducted public meetings,¹ in which he argued the benefits of organization and pointed out to the men that, although the company was

¹ Following is a notice of one of Hughes' meetings which was torn from a telegraph pole in the street by the plaintiff's mine superintendent:

"Notice to the miners of the Hitchman mine. There will be a mass meeting Friday evening at 6:30 P. M. at Nick Heil's Base Ball Grounds, for the purpose of discussing the principals of organization. President William Green will be present. All miners are cordially invited to attend."

then paying them according to the union scale, there would be nothing to prevent a later reduction of wages unless the men united. He also urged upon the men that if they lost their present jobs, membership in the union was requisite to obtaining employment in the union mines of the neighboring States. But there is no suggestion that he exceeded the moderate bounds of peaceful persuasion, and indeed, if plaintiff's witnesses are to be believed, men with whom Hughes had talked, his argument made no impression on them, and they expressed to him their satisfaction with existing conditions at the mine.

When this suit was filed no right of the plaintiff had been infringed and there was no reasonable ground to believe that any of its rights would be interfered with; and, in my opinion, the Circuit Court of Appeals properly reversed the decree of the District Court, and directed that the bill be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Clarke concur in this dissent.

NOTE.

The reported case, applying the rule that an interference with established contract relations may be unlawful though no illegal means are adopted to that end, holds that an attempt to organize a labor union among the employees of a particular company was unlawful under the circumstances disclosed and was properly enjoined. It appeared that a mine owner had by contract with its employees established a nonunion mine, the employees agreeing not to join a union during their employment and that in the event of their so joining the employment should terminate. This contract, the court holds, established a status which the employer was entitled to have protected against the acts of third persons. It is therefore held that an injunction was properly issued against the officers of a miners' union who sought to secure the employees to join the union secretly, with the intention of calling a strike to enforce the recognition of the union as soon as enough men had joined. The civil liability for interference with contract relations is discussed with specific reference to injunction against such interference by labor organizations, in the notes to South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. 2 Ann. Cas. 436; Beekman v. Marsters, 11 Ann. Cas. 332; Jones v. Leslie, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1158; Johnson v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. Ann. Cas. 1916E 603; and Webber v. Barry, 11 Am. St. Rep. 466. The holding of the reported case was reiterated in Eagle Glass, etc. Co. v. Rowe, 245 U. S. 275, 38 S. Ct. 80, decided on the same day.

CUNNINGHAM

v.

CUNNINGHAM.

Michigan Supreme Court—June 14, 1915.

187 Mich. 68; 153 N. W. 8.

Divorce — Cruelty — Habits of Spouse.

That complainant's husband was untidy in his habits, walked through the house with muddy feet, spat on the stove and occasionally indulged in a game of cards for small stakes at a place which formerly had been a saloon, is not "extreme cruelty" under the statute.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hillsdale county: CHESTER, Judge.

Action by Esther Cunningham, plaintiff, against Isaiah Cunningham, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Merton Fitzpatrick for appellant.
F. A. Lyon for appellee.

[69] KUH, J.—The defendant appeals from a decree granting complainant a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, and an allowance of $2,000 as permanent alimony.

The parties were married in 1892, in Pennsylvania, and at the time of their marriage the complainant was 23 years of age and the defendant 48. Shortly thereafter they moved to the State of North Dakota, where they lived on a farm until 1900. In that year they sold the Dakota farm and came to Michigan to live, purchasing a farm in the township of Allen in Hillsdale county, where they lived until 1903. In that year they moved to the city of Hillsdale, where they continued to reside until the time of their separation, December 22, 1913. While they were living in Dakota their only child, a daughter was born, who is now living and is 18 years of age.

On coming to the city of Hillsdale, the defendant engaged in the coal business, and during a portion of the time he also carried on a grocery and feed business in connection therewith. The home which they occupied was in close proximity to the railroad tracks and coal yards. It appears that at the time this property was purchased, the matter of going into the business was discussed between them, and that the deed to the property was taken in their joint names.

The allegations in the bill of complaint as originally filed consist largely of complaints of the personal habits [70] and manners of the defendant and of his conduct in and about the house. Simply as evidence of the character of these complaints, the following is taken from the testimony of the complainant:

"It was muddy and coal black and dirty around the place, and he would come in and walk through the store and into the kitchen and through the sitting room quite frequently; he would go through the whole house at times. He was quite a hand to smoke and knock ashes out on the stove, and to sit around in front of the stove and knock them out and light his pipe and snip the matches around. I told him I thought it was just as easy from him to empty his pipe into the stove as it was to empty it out onto the stove and the floor. He didn't say anything, but sometimes he'd say, 'Babe can sweep them up.' He meant our daughter Lorena. I worked all I possibly could. He told me I didn't do anything, and I wasn't interested in anything, and that I always threw the coal business aside for my washing."

And the following from the testimony of the daughter:

"Our home was right along by the railroad track. There was a house between our house and the road. Our house was on the back end of the lot. Mrs. Osborn and her daughter, Mrs. Perry, lived on the front end of the lot. Mr. Eldridge lives the first house west of Mrs. Osborn. There were no other houses on the back end of the lot. The Hillsdale Grocery Company's warehouse was directly east of our house. The coal bins were between our house and Mrs. Perry's. They were right by our house. We kept the groceries in the office. They would drive in to get coal between Mrs. Perry's and Mrs. Eldridge's, and they would drive in around to the grocery company's warehouse. They would have to drive in from the street. My mother did the housework and had no help except myself. There were four rooms below and only one carpeted. Mother had to mop all the other floors. It was real muddy down there when it rained. Father would track in mud; it would stick to his feet and he wouldn't try to get it off. This would happen every [71] day when it was muddy. It would dirty up the floor. I have heard mother ask him not to come in without cleaning his feet. He said that he would just as soon live in it. Father was always smoking and when he would empty his pipe he would empty it on the stove, on the outside of the stove, or else on the floor. I have heard mother speak to him about that. I don't remember what he would say. I have seen him blow his nose on the floor to dirty it. He did not chew tobacco very much; did once in awhile. He would sometimes spit on the stove. It would sometimes go in and sometimes beyond the side. My mother's conduct toward him was kind. During the past year his conduct toward her wasn't very kind. She couldn't do anything to please him, and he would find fault with everything she did. I heard him swear at her once."

Complaint is also made as to his lack of personal cleanliness, but it would profit no one to attempt to repeat the many seemingly trivial complaints which are set up in the record and discussed in the briefs of counsel.

After the case had been heard, an amendment was permitted to the bill of complaint to show misconduct on the part of the defendant because of his having visited frequently a resort known as "Boyd's Place," which it seems was at one time a saloon, and later a place where men congregated to play cards. It is complainant's claim, and she so testified, that knowledge of this habit of visiting Boyd's Place, because of its bad reputation, brought great shame, humiliation, and disgrace to her and her family.

There is unquestionably ground for the complaint that the defendant was inclined to enjoy a game of cards, which he indulged in even when small amounts of money were at stake, and this he frankly admits in his testimony. It is true that his conduct in frequenting the place where he indulged in this practice and the pleasure that he seemed to get from gambling in a small way, could be the subject of some criticism, but, as was said by this court in Cadieux v. Cadieux, [72] 180 Mich. 99, at page 105, 146 N. W. 161, at page 163:

"While culpable and an evidence of moral instability, we are not prepared to hold that, as proven, it amounted to a cause for divorce."

We have carefully read this record, and although having in mind the fact that the learned chancellor, who heard the case below, had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses, nevertheless we cannot escape the conclusion, taking the record as a whole and carefully weighing the testimony, that no just and legal cause for a divorce has been proved. These parties had resided together as man and wife for a period of 20 years, and it does not appear that any remarkable change has come about in the personal conduct and habits of the defendant from the time of his marriage. The record is convincing that both of the parties have been industrious and apparently willing to meet the everyday problems of life in the proper spirit, and considering their station in life and the surroundings in which the defendant toiled to fulfill his duties as a provider for his family, assisted by the complainant, it does not seem just and equitable that now, when the defendant has reached the age of 70 years, because of grievances of a character which might easily be found in the married life of many people in such a period of time, he should be deprived of the association and comfort of his wife and only child, both of whom he still insists he loves and wishes to have with him. As this court said in Root v. Root, 164 Mich. 638, 644, 130 N. W. 194, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 837, Ann. Cas. 1912B 740:

"Neither incompatibility of temper nor the ordinary misunderstandings and bickerings which are characteristic of the marriage relation in a considerable percentage of cases, have been made grounds for divorce in this State. The legislature might, if it chose, extend [73] the jurisdiction of courts to grant decrees of divorce upon these grounds. It has not done so, however, and those who are married must bear the real or fancied burdens they have assumed, unless the conduct of one entitles the other, that other being without fault, to a severance of the relation for one or other of the statutory causes."

We are of the opinion that in this case the proofs are not satisfactory to make out a case of extreme cruelty under the statute, and that the decree must be reversed and the bill dismissed, without costs to either party.

Brooke, C. J., and McAlvay, Stone, Ostrander, Bird, Moore, and Steere, JJ., concurred.

Introductory.

In view of the modern rule that physical violence is not necessary to constitute cruelty (see the note to Goff v. Goff, 9 Ann. Cas. 1083) it is impossible to formulate a general rule as to what habits or course of conduct of a spouse will constitute cruelty warranting a divorce. The habits and dispositions of different married persons vary so much that the courts must necessarily determine what constitutes such cruelty from the facts and circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, temperament and disposition of the parties to the action. "Cruelty," "extreme cruelty," and like terms used in different divorce statutes are exceedingly elastic in their application, and thus a course of conduct or language, which in some walks of life would pass as an ordinary incident of the marital relation, might constitute in others the very refinement of cruelty. The law in regard to cruelty as ground for divorce has been considerably modified in late years, both in England and the United States, it being now generally held that torture inflicted on the mental and emotional nature by constant insinuations of evil doing, unfounded and repeated charges of unfaithfulness, studied and gross discourtesies, and the like, which go to the extent of affecting bodily health may constitute cruelty. For an extended and learned discussion of this question, see Butler v. Butler, 4 Clark (Pa.) 388, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329.

In General.

FACTS WARRANTING DIVORCE.

The continued manifestation by one spouse of indifference or aversion to the other, coupled with persistent neglect of the duties incident to the marital relation may constitute cruelty warranting a divorce. Thus in Glenn v. Glenn, 84 Wash. 215, 146 Pac. 619, a divorce was granted for cruelty on the ground that a wife for several years manifested continual hatred and aversion for her husband and maintained an improper correspondence with other men.

In Sabot v. Sabot (Wash.) 166 Pac. 624, a finding of cruelty based on persistent neglect and expression of aversion by a wife was sustained.

In Eistedt v. Eistedt, 187 Mich. 371, 153 N. W. 676, the court said: "It is alleged that the defendant left her home without excuse, and this complainant and their children of tender age, and was gone for several days at a time, and on some of those occasions she consorted with other men, visiting rooming houses with them. If this charge were sustained by the proofs, the ground of extreme cruelty would be established."

In Massey v. Massey, 40 Ind. App. 407, 80 N. E. 977, 81 N. E. 732, it was held that "cruel and inhuman treatment" might consist in a wife's habit of reading frivolous literature to the neglect of her household duties and her cold, abusive and scornful neglect of her husband's welfare. And see Rice v. Rice, 6 Ind. 100.

Proof that for over a year, a husband purchased nothing but a pair of shoes and rubbers for the wife, he being worth from eight to ten thousand dollars, and that he had left her for six weeks without any funds with which to pay her board, besides using insulting and abusive language to her, has been held to be sufficient to support a divorce for cruelty. Carey v. Carey, 106 Mich. 646, 64 N. W. 510.

In Hiecke v. Hiecke, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 497, cruelty was held to be shown by certain facts found by the trial court.

In Mills v. Mills, 88 Neb. 596, 130 N. W. 419, the facts and conclusion of the court were stated as follows: "It is evident that the plaintiff is a hardworking, clean, and industrious but sickly woman, and that the defendant is a man of gruff manners, strong will, coarse language, and careless ways. There is no evidence of actual violence on his part against his wife, but there is ample proof of cruel, unfeeling, and harsh treatment of her. The plaintiff seems to have been singularly liable to accidents resulting in fractures of her upper and nether limbs. The last incident of this kind occurred in 1908. At this time she fell and broke the bones of her wrist when procuring water at the flowing well near the house. She testifies in detail to the harsh language and the cold and unfeeling conduct of defendant at that time and while she was partially disabled by the accident, and his own testimony in regard to the occurrence corroborates her. While the defendant was a good provider of food, this seems to have been all that he thought it was his duty to supply beyond the barest necessities in the way of house room, furniture, and clothing. The case falls under the rule of Ellison v. Ellison, 65 Neb. 412. It is unnecessary to refer to the argument on condonation. Sufficient cruelty has been proved since plaintiff's return to make a case. From the whole record we think the testimony justifies and requires the decree."

In Gloster v. Gloster, 23 App. Div. 336, 48 N. Y. S. 160, the following facts were held to warrant a divorce on the ground of cruelty: "The court found that the husband was guilty of cruel and inhuman treatment of the wife; that he compelled her from the time of the marriage until near the time of the birth of her child, against her remonstrances, not only to do the ordinary housework, but to cook free lunch for the saloon, the lunch consisting of large pieces of meat of different kinds, often weighing about fourteen pounds, to place this meat in a large iron pot which she had to lift upon a stove three feet high, the whole weighing about fifty pounds including water, to lift same down when cooked, she being all the while in delicate health, unused and physically unable to do this work; that he swore at her and used violent and profane language toward her, shocking her and causing her mental anguish; that he often left her alone at night, in great fear, saying on his return that he had been playing poker; that he failed to provide for her proper clothing to enable her to go out of doors, and finally abandoned her, refused her admittance to his house, and neglected to furnish her with the necessities of life. These findings were sufficiently supported by the evidence. The wife weighed only 103 pounds, and her health was not good. She was compelled by her husband to do the work described during her pregnancy, and until within three days of the birth of her child. It caused her a terrible feeling inwardly; lifting the pot caused her sides to feel as if falling in, and she had terrible stitching pains in the side from it. She complained to her husband, but he merely gave her abuse, swore at her, said that he didn't get her to put in a glass case, and that she couldn't live with him unless she did this work. Once she left him on this account, about four months after the marriage, but he made her fair promises and she returned, when he treated her the same again. It is no wonder the child, when born, was a feeble, sickly one and soon died. The treatment was cruel in the extreme, and, taken in connection with his swearing at her, his leaving her alone at night, and his refusal to furnish her proper clothing, and his denying her the right to visit her own people who lived nearby, was sufficient ground for granting the separation by reason of cruel and inhuman treatment."

In Glass v. Wynn, 76 Ga. 319, it was alleged by a wife as cruelty that her husband "would go off, neglect her, leave her when she was sick, would not provide proper food or assistance for her, and would call her names, and say that she was no better than a hound-dog or an African negro, and that he poisoned the mind of one of their sons against her and caused him to speak to her in an insulting and unbearable manner." The court said: "Even if there must be cruel treatment or voluntary separation in order that this proceeding may be had, we think in such a case cruel treatment may exist from conduct other than blows. Mental anguish, wounded feelings, constantly aggravated by repeated insults and neglect, are as bad as actual bruises of the person; and that which produces the one is not more cruel than that which causes the other."

In Marks v. Marks, 62 Minn. 212, 64 N. W. 561, the court reviewed the facts as follows: "It is enough to say that his bad conduct was systematic and continued; that he seems to have studied ways in which to humiliate and degrade his wife, that she might become strictly dutiful and obedient in the most trivial matters; and that by personal indignities, such as unmerited reproach, contemptuous and insulting expressions, open insult, and continual badgering, he became a petty tyrant in his household. His treatment all during the ten years we have mentioned was about as cruel and inhuman as it could have been without inflicting corporal punishment. The evidence before us establishes an exceptionally strong case of this character, and we wish here to emphasize what was, in substance, said in our former opinion—that, to warrant the granting of a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, where there is no proof of overt bodily harm, actually inflicted or threatened, the evidence must be strong and convincing, the course of ill treatment complained of long continued, of serious character, and further, that it must have had an injurious effect upon the health of the complainant.” See also the same case on a former appeal, 56 Minn. 284, 57 N. W. 651, 45 Am. St. Rep. 466.

In Emery v. Emery, 181 Mich. 646, 147 N. W. 452, persistence by a husband in harsh and exacting conduct with habitual use of profane and threatening language was held to constitute cruelty.

In Beebe v. Beebe, 10 Ia. 133, wherein it appeared that the husband's occupation was such that it was necessary for him to keep poison about the house, and that his wife often declared that she would be glad of his death, and continually threatened to poison him, her conduct was held to be sufficient to cause him to apprehend danger and to be cruel and inhuman treatment justifying a divorce.

In Wall v. Wall (Mich.) 162 N. W. 100, a finding of cruelty was held to be supported by proof of indignities inflicted by a husband such as marking the wife's face with an indelible pencil, holding her by the legs and making her walk on her hands and the like, though he testified that his acts were committed by way of jest.

In Kinsey v. Kinsey, 90 Va. 16, 17 S. E. 819, persistent conduct of a husband in exposing himself indecently not only before his wife and child but in public, and in teaching his child to swear, was held to amount to cruelty.

Wide circulation by a wife of anonymous letters making false charges against her husband has been held to amount to cruelty. Carpenter v. Carpenter, 30 Kan. 712, wherein the court said: “The next question to be considered is, whether the facts as found by the trial court and as proved on the trial constitute extreme cruelty on the part of the defendant below toward the plaintiff below. We think they do. In the first place, the evidence shows that the plaintiff, prior to his marriage and since, has been a man of some pretensions as to character, integrity and ability. He was (and we suppose still is) a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and professed to be an honest and faithful Christian; and he had high aspirations for political preferment. He was then holding the office of collector of internal revenue for the district of Kansas, and had twice before been a candidate for the office of governor of the state, though he was defeated in his own party for the nomination. In November and December, 1882, his wife kept a diary, in which she recorded many things derogatory to his character, and cruelly unjust to him. She sought for scandal affecting his moral standing; and then, to humiliate him in his own estimation, and to disgrace him in the opinion of all good people, sent cruel, anonymous letters to editors of newspapers known by her to be his personal or political enemies, with the expectation that these editors would publicly accuse him in their journals of immoral conduct, of which she herself did not believe him guilty, and of which she had no good reason to even suspect that he was guilty. She also sent to one of the clerks in his office similar anonymous letters falsely charging her husband with criminal intimacy with the wife of such clerk. Also, in the absence of her husband, she invited another clerk in his office to a secret interview with herself, and there poured forth her grievances, and exhibited to such clerk another of such anonymous letters, obscene in its character, and containing similar false charges against her husband. And after their separation, she wrote to her husband an insulting letter, falsely charging him with meanness and gross misconduct unbecoming a gentleman and finally filed an answer in this case falsely accusing him of many things which she at no time believed, and at no time even attempted to prove. The legal question that arises upon these facts is, whether they constitute ‘extreme cruelty,’ or not, within the meaning of the divorce statute. It was formerly thought that to constitute extreme cruelty, such as would authorize the granting of a divorce, physical violence is necessary; but the modern and better-considered cases have repudiated this doctrine as taking too low and sensual a view of the marriage relation, and it is now very generally held that any unjustifiable conduct on the part of either the husband or the wife, which so grievously wounds the mental feelings of the other, or so utterly destroys the peace of mind of the other as to seriously impair the bodily health or endanger the life of the other, or such as in any other manner endangers the life of the other, or such as utterly destroys the legitimate ends and objects of matrimony, constitutes ‘extreme cruelty’ under the statutes, although no physical or personal violence may be inflicted, or even threatened.”

Insistence by a husband, as a condition of the continuance of the marital relations, that his wife should bear no children, in consequence of which she submitted to two abortions, has been held to constitute extreme cruelty warranting a divorce. Dunn v. Dunn, 150 Mich. 476, 114 N. W. 385.

Compelling a wife to expose herself and young children by a former marriage to a demoralized condition in the home because the husband allows his daughters to live in meretricious relations with strangers, is cruelty warranting a divorce. Davis v. Davis, 86 Ky. 32, 4 S. W. 822.

Where it appeared that a wife became a convert to Christian Science, continuing the practice of the science as a doctor, against the opposition of her husband, her insistence causing him to become ill, it was held that the granting of a divorce to the husband for cruelty was warranted. Robinson v. Robinson, 66 N. H. 600, 23 Atl. 362, 49 Am. St. Rep. 632, 15 L.R.A. 121. Compare Kauhimahu v. Kauhimahu, 19 Hawaii 378.

In Kentucky a divorce is authorized by statute for treatment of a wife by her husband showing a settled aversion to her or tending to destroy permanently her peace and happiness. With respect to conduct of that kind it was said in Beall v. Beall, 80 Ky. 675: "It should appear that the habitual behavior of the husband to the wife was such as showed a settled aversion to her. Hatred and bad treatment must be the rule of his conduct towards her, and his exhibition of affection for her the exception, in order to entitle the wife to relief upon that ground; but while the husband may now and then manifest such an affection for the wife as to negative the idea that he has lost all regard for her, still if his cruel and inhuman conduct towards her is such as to destroy permanently her peace and happiness, the wife is entitled to a divorce." To the same effect see Zumbiel v. Zumbiel, 113 Ky. 841, 69 S. W. 718; Burns v. Burns, 173 Ky. 105, 190 S. W. 683; Wilson v. Wilson, 38 S. W. 140, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 741.

FACTS NOT WARRANTING DIVORCE.

The mere fact that a spouse is sulky, petulant, and sometimes uses abusive language does not constitute such cruelty as will warrant the granting of a divorce. Stoner v. Stoner, 134 Ga. 368, 67 S. E. 1030; Trenchard v. Trenchard, 245 Ill. 313, 92 N. E. 243; Downey v. Downey, 135 Mich. 265, 97 N. W. 699; Sheffield v. Sheffield, 3 Tex. 79; Johnson v. Johnson, 107 Wis. 186, 83 N. W. 291, 81 Am. St. Rep. 836.

Slight acts of violence committed by a wife, where there was no reason to suppose that the husband could not protect himself by a proper exercise of his marital authority, has been held not to constitute extreme cruelty. Severns v. Severns, 107 Ill. App. 141.

A husband's propensity for attending horse races and betting, and occasionally gambling and speculating in stocks, losing money thereby which he might have used for the better support of his family, has been held not to be such cruelty as will warrant a divorce. Cadieux v. Cadieux, 180 Mich. 99, 146 N. W. 161.

The fact that a husband is sulky and is frugal even to the extent of being parsimonious and niggardly is not cruelty. Barker v. Barker, 25 Okla. 48, 105 Pac. 347, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 909. And see Duhme v. Duhme, 3 Ohio Dec. 95, 3 Wkly. L. Gaz. 186. Nor does the failure of a husband to supply his wife and daughter with a suitable wardrobe commensurate with their social position and wealth constitute cruelty. Rowley v. Rowley, 19 La. 557.

The failure of a wife to remain at home during her husband's illness, and her frequent visits to theaters and dance places do not constitute cruelty. Bonney v. Bonney, 175 Mass. 7, 55 N. E. 461, 78 Am. St. Rep. 473.

Proof that a wife had the habit of finding fault and nagging the husband for everything he did, that she scolded him for coming home late at night, and objected to the kind of work he did, and the places where he worked, and insisted on having her own way, the effect of which was to render him nervous and deprive him of sleep, etc., has been held to be too trivial in character to justify a decree of divorce for cruelty. Geisseman v. Geisseman, 34 Colo. 481, 83 Pac. 635.

The mere fact that a husband was unreasonably jealous of his wife, and showed it in such ways as to make it very uncomfortable for her and render her unhappy, and that when in a rage of jealousy he wrote an anonymous note in which he indicated that he thought her unfaithful to him, has been held not to be such cruelty as to warrant a divorce. Elliott v. Elliott, 5 Boyce (Del.) 406, 93 Atl. 963.

In Branscheid v. Branscheid, 27 Wash. 368, 67 Pac. 812, a divorce for cruelty was refused on proof that the wife showed no interest in her husband and his affairs, refusing to enter into the mode of life which he desired her to follow socially, and that she was moody, whimsical, exacting and irascible, rendering his life miserable.

It was held in Densmore v. Densmore, 6 Mackey (D. C.) 544, that the following averments did not state a case of cruelty: "And he further says that, notwithstanding his anxious and strenuous efforts to provide and have a home for himself and family, he has no home, because the said Emma A. Densmore takes neither interest or care of, or in any matter concerning him or what concerns their mutual welfare; but, on the contrary, opposes every and all efforts the affiant makes to advance the interest of the family; that when he returns from his daily or nightly vocation, as the case may be, tired and worn, there is neither rest nor sympathy for him; and that often during the past few years he has been compelled, in order to obtain the rest and repose demanded by nature, to sleep and eat away from his home; that she, the said Emma, is a constant growler, a chronic complainer, and seems to be delighted when she can do and say things in the presence of others to wound and mortify his feelings, and is never apparently so happy as when she has an opportunity to humiliate this affiant in the presence of his children or others; and that she is a constant gossip and termagant, and is often guilty of the most indiscreet conduct, so much so as to excite remark, and allows no opportunity to pass where or when she can do an act or say a word to the detriment of his interest, or the degradation of his name in the estimation of the community; that she, the said Emma, is too lavish in her household expenditures, and has often declared she did not know what goods cost, and that it was of no interest or difference to her. And this petitioner says, that the said Emma is a constant smoker of cigars, and that the use of tobacco in all forms, either smoking, chewing or snuffing is very objectionable and nauseating to him as he does not use the weed in any form or shape, and he regards this as a very dangerous example for a mother to set before her daughters. And this affiant further says, that because of the foregoing reasons and because of the violent temper and jealous disposition and extravagant expenditures of his means and all want of sympathy with or in what relates to or concerns this petitioner, an estrangement of all affection, sympathy and esteem has been engendered, and that a hopeless and irreconcilable trouble exists between this affiant and the respondent because of the foregoing facts and allegations. And he further says, that during a recent severe illness, because of the said Emma's words and suspicious actions in declaring that she wished this affiant was dead, etc., those who called, especially his physician, became alarmed, but at no time during his said illness did she offer in any manner to minister to his wants, or even at any hour during his helplessness offer any assistance, nor even answer the bell calls; and that because of her turbulence this affiant was urged by his physician to take refuge in a hospital, this he did not do, but he did leave his bed and room long before he ought to have and was thereby caused a great and unnecessary bodily pain. Because of the foregoing he feels that his health and life are endangered by living with said Emma." The court said: "There is no aggression set forth on the part of the wife, no act of violence, no attempt upon his life in any way, nothing but the mere expression of a wish that he was dead, which it appears she made in her ill temper; at most it appears that she is ill tempered and disagreeable, and neglects her duty. If gross neglect of duty was one of the causes for divorce in this district this bill would probably be sufficient. We are not prepared to say that in no case can a divorce be granted unless there be actual physical violence or some attempted injury by violence to the health and life of the complainant. There may be cases where the husband, by threatening violence, threatened acts, without committing any actual violence, might so put his wife in fear as to not only materially injure her health but endanger her life. And it is possible that the reverse might be true, that this might occur under some circumstances by the wife obtaining this sort of control by threats over her husband with equally injurious consequences, but we think such cases would be very rare. The facts here stated, even if all true, do not amount to such cruelty, and the complainant is not entitled by the averments of his bill to any relief."

In Walsh v. Walsh, 20 British Columbia 482, the facts and conclusion of the court were stated as follows: "It is contended, however, that the evidence is sufficient to prove that the conduct of the respondent was such that the petitioner might reasonably apprehend bodily injury, and her mental health was affected. The evidence in support of this contention is that the petitioner found beneath the pillow of the respondent, in the bed they both occupied, a razor and a sharp knife, and on asking him what it was for, he said to protect himself. She then inquired: 'What do you want to protect yourself for?' and his reply was: 'I thought you might do me some harm while I was sleeping.' She was then asked by her counsel what effect this discovery had upon her, and her answer was: 'Well, it made me very nervous. I made him take another room after that.' This seems to have ended the matter. The petitioner frankly admitted that her husband had 'never laid hands on her' in any way in a violent manner. She does not even state that she apprehended that he would do so or that the weapons referred to were kept by him for that purpose. Accepting her statement that she became nervous through his actions, this would not be sufficient. I do not think the petitioner's safety was compromised, nor any fears for it entertained by her. There is no evidence, in my opinion, to support the allegation of legal cruelty."

The fact that a husband on returning from work preferred to read or go to bed and refused to go to places of amusement with his wife has been held not to constitute cruelty. Bowen v. Bowen, 179 Mich. 574, 146 N. W. 271, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 460.

That a husband frequently absented himself from home and that he ridiculed the church of which the wife was a member and constantly professed in her hearing affection for his first wife from whom he was divorced was held in Ryan v. Ryan (Tex.) 114 S. W. 484, not to constitute cruelty.

Lewd and indecent conduct of a husband towards a young daughter of his wife by a former marriage has been held not to be cruelty. Cline v. Cline, 10 Ore. 474.

In the reported case, untidy habits of a husband and occasional gambling for small stakes are held not to constitute cruelty.

Offensive Language.

IN GENERAL.

It is generally held that the mere use of offensive language and occasional paroxysms of rage on the part of a spouse without any fixed purpose of injuring the other spouse does not constitute cruelty warranting a divorce.

The acts of extreme cruelty charged in Bennett v. Bennett, 24 Mich. 482, consisting of the wife's leaving the house without cause, remaining absent for considerable lengths of time, using indecent, profane and obscene language, and neglecting her household affairs, were held to fall far short of extreme cruelty to the husband, the court saying: "It is extremely doubtful whether any of them, on the part of the wife, could, in any case, constitute that extreme cruelty which the statute contemplates as a ground of divorce; but in the present case, at least, the slight degree of negligence about household affairs, and the very short periods of absence proved (which seem to have been mostly brief visits of a few hours to some of her children who resided in the neighborhood), fall so far short of such extreme cruelty as to render it merely ludicrous to consider them as amounting to cruelty in any form. As to the second ground of extreme cruelty: profane, obscene and insulting language, habitually indulged in towards a person of a sensitive nature and refined feelings, may, doubtless, in some cases, amount to extreme cruelty, as intimated in Briggs v. Briggs, 20 Mich. 34. But this, as a general rule, would be more readily recognized, when used by the husband to the wife, than by the wife to the husband. In the present case we see no evidence that complainant was a person of such sensitive nature and refined feelings as would be likely to be affected to the degree of extreme cruelty by any such language as the wife is shown to have used. A man who habitually locks up his pork and his flour in his granary in the barn, and hides even his tea from his wife, who is expected to do his cooking and prepare his table, on suspicion that she might use them too freely or give them away to her children by a former marriage, and charges those children with stealing his blankets (when no evidence is shown warranting such charge or suspicions), as the complainant is shown by one of his own witnesses to have done in this case, cannot lay claim to a very high degree of susceptibility or refinement of feeling, and ought to expect an occasional tempest, and to make up his mind and prepare his nerves for a pretty large share of abusive language; and though this consideration will not justify some of the profane and indecent language claimed to have been used by the wife, it shows that his own feelings were proof against anything of extreme cruelty to be inflicted by mere words. . . . The real and the whole difficulty, as we infer from the evidence, grew up from the jealousy or suspicion he seems to have indulged (so far as the evidence shows, without justifiable cause), against her children by a former marriage, and her attachment to them, and his morbid apprehension lest they might, in some way, by her aid, get hold of some of his pork or tea, or blankets. In any view we have been able to take of the evidence, we think it fails to establish any ground upon which a decree of divorce could safely be granted."

While offensive language habitually used may constitute cruelty if it grievously affects or wounds the feelings, and thus destroy the peace of mind of the other spouse resulting in the impairment of his health, where the testimony shows that both parties are addicted to the use of profane language towards each other, the court will refuse to grant a divorce. Gleason v. Gleason, 16 Neb. 15, 19 N. W. 784; Shuster v. Shuster, 3 Neb. (unofficial) Rep. 610, 92 N. W. 203.

In Rader v. Rader, 136 Ia. 223, 113 N. W. 817, the court stated the facts and its conclusion as follows: "The sole question in the case is one of fact, and that is: Was defendant guilty of such inhuman treatment of plaintiff as endangered her life? We shall not, of course, attempt to set out the entire record. It is enough for the purpose of the case to state our conclusions. Whilst the case is not a strong one, we think there is enough to show that defendant used profane, obscene, insulting, and abusive language toward his wife, complained of her cooking, and generally treated her in such a manner as to endanger her life and health. He never, it is true, used physical violence, but he did that which to an ordinary woman is more cruel. After the first few weeks of married life, he seems to have lost all affection for his wife. He was profane and abusive, criticised her cooking, failed to provide her with clothing, and in other ways made life miserable. True, most of the charge defendant denies; but the witnesses were all before the trial court, and plaintiff's condition of health as autoptically disclosed, and her manner and demeanor, should all be considered and given due weight. And in such cases as this the finding of the trial court should be given due consideration in view of the conflicting testimony adduced. Plaintiff was comparatively a well woman when she married the defendant, and when she left him she was much broken both in health and spirits, and for this defendant seems to have been responsible. It is not necessary, of course, to show physical assaults in order to make out a case of cruelty. The general treatment accorded the wife by the husband should be considered, and if, upon the whole record, it appears that the life and health of the wife has been endangered by ill treatment, be that nothing more than abusive, insulting, profane, and vulgar language, lack of affection, or failure to furnish the necessities of life, a divorce should be granted."

In Banks v. Banks, 162 Wis. 87, 155 N. W. 916, a divorce for cruelty was granted where the evidence showed that the defendant, without cause or provocation, applied to her husband insulting epithets, and almost daily interfered with his professional duties as a physician, by calling him up at his office and showering abuse on him, all of which destroyed his peace of mind and affected his mental and bodily health to a degree which rendered it impracticable to discharge properly the duties imposed by the marriage relation.

A continued use of vile language by a wife accusing her husband of illegal acts of which he was innocent, and constant uncontrollable paroxysms of rage and violence, by which she harassed the husband, making his life unbearable and tending to destroy permanently his peace and happiness, have been held to constitute legal cruelty and ground for divorce. Sylvis v. Sylvis, 11 Colo. 319, 17 Pac. 912, wherein it was said: "The natural effect of such conduct upon an ordinarily sensitive person would be to destroy his peace and happiness, and from the destruction of peace and happiness the impairment of health is a natural consequence; and the presumption is that the conduct of the defendant produced the natural and usual result of such conduct. To authorize a divorce on the ground of cruelty the evidence should show that the acts complained of are such as that danger to life, limb or health will naturally arise from the continued commission of such acts, but it is not necessary that the evidence should show that actual physical violence has been used. Extreme cruelty may be as effectually caused by conduct which produces mental suffering, and robs complainant of his or her peace of mind, as by blows inflicted; and to many persons the burden of the mental suffering will be much harder to bear than the burden of any ordinary physical suffering. These views are sustained by many recent and well-reasoned decisions."

In Morehouse v. Morehouse, 70 Conn. 420, 39 Atl. 516, it appeared that the husband knowing that his wife was affected with heart trouble, and that his conduct aggravated it, would frequently appear before her in a drunken condition and humiliate her by his vulgar and profane abuse. It was held that cruelty was established.

In Wolff v. Wolff, 102 Cal. 433, 36 Pac. 767, the facts and the court's conclusion were stated as follows: "That since said marriage the defendant has treated the plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner, and in particular as follows: That almost ever since the commencement of the married life of said parties the defendant has been in the habit of grossly abusing the plaintiff, and of applying to her, and to members of her family and relatives, vile, profane, and obscene language, the particulars whereof are stated at length in the complaint on file in this action; and the court finds as facts that such language was used by the defendant as, and when, and in the manner alleged by the plaintiff; that almost immediately after said marriage the plaintiff became and was pregnant, and that during the term of her pregnancy she was highly nervous and in a delicate state of health, and defendant used toward her during said period vile, abusive, and indecent language, and which language and treatment of defendant caused the plaintiff physical pain, and greatly aggravated the physical sufferings undergone by her during said period, and that the harsh and abusive treatment and language of defendant toward plaintiff caused her physical suffering, affected her health, and also inflicted upon her grievous mental suffering, and that plaintiff has not condoned said offenses. . . . The testimony of plaintiff as to the facts thus found, having been sufficiently corroborated, and these being sufficient to constitute extreme cruelty, even according to the case of Waldron v. Waldron, 85 Cal. 251, and surely so according to the decision in Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, it was not material nor necessary that her testimony should have been corroborated as to all other distinct acts of cruelty alleged in her complaint."

Evidence showing that a wife became abusive, applying various abusive and opprobrious epithets to her husband, refusing to do any of the house work, though she was a healthy woman, and persistently acting in an abusive and insulting manner, has been held to be sufficient to entitle the husband to a divorce on the ground of cruelty. McGee v. McGee, 72 Ark. 355, 80 S. W. 579.

In Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625, it was held that the persistent commission of acts which outraged the feelings of modesty and decency of the wife, such as threatening to commit adultery and cursing and abusing her and using insulting and opprobrious language, constituted cruel treatment.

The habitual use of indecent and obscene language by a husband to his wife in the presence of others has been held to constitute extreme cruelty. Goodman v. Goodman, 26 Mich. 416. And so where a wife was shown to be extremely profane in her conversation in the presence of the husband, and at times before others, and repeatedly told obscene stories in his presence and in the presence of his children of a former marriage it was held that he was entitled to a divorce. Mosher v. Mosher, 16 N. D. 269, 113 N. W. 99, 125 Am. St. Rep. 654, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 820.

In Fay v. Fay, 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 328, a divorce was allowed, it appearing that the wife neglected her children and household duties, and frequently in the presence of their children, neighbors and visitors addressed her husband in profane, obscene and abusive language, and often threatened to poison him, the court saying that such conduct persisted in for a long period of time, is well calculated to render the condition of the aggrieved party intolerable, and cause him a reasonable apprehension of physical violence.

The use of offensive language towards a wife, and circulating among her friends reports to the effect that she was of unsound mind, and other stories reflecting on her good name and moral character, and frequent threats by the husband that he would resort to legal proceedings to test her sanity and thus deprive her of her liberty have been held to be sufficient to constitute cruelty warranting a divorce. Russell v. Russell, 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 348.

That the husband was a man of hasty and violent temper, that he frequently cursed and called his wife vile names, and denounced and reviled her parents and friends, by reason of which she was made ill and nervous, has been held to constitute cruelty warranting a divorce. Berry v. Berry, 115 Ia. 543, 88 N. W. 1075, wherein the court said: "It is to be admitted that the showing of cruel and inhuman treatment is not as overwhelming as is sometimes made in cases of this kind, but, after due deliberation, we think it sufficient. Some women may be so constituted that loud-mouthed curses upon themselves, their parents and friends, and course insinuations against their wifely virtue, will be received with perfect equanimity; and as to them, while it is cruel and inhuman treatment, it does not endanger life. But women who thrive upon such treatment are rare. With the husband a strong man of violent temper and profane and abusive tongue, and the wife a woman in frail health and of weak and sensitive nerves, it does not require murderous blows or the display of firearms to endanger life, within the meaning of the statute. Upon such a woman every curse and foul epithet falls with as killing effect as a stroke from the clenched fist. Cruelty of this kind is good grounds for divorce."

In Sackrider v. Sackrider, 60 Iowa 397, 14 N. W. 736, a divorce for cruelty was granted on proof that the husband was addicted to violent outbreaks of temper during which he threatened his wife with weapons.

INTENT TO INJURE.

Where it appears that a spouse has deliberately adopted as a course of conduct the use of offensive language toward the other.

spouse, continually calling him or her vile and opprobrious names, with the intent and fixed purpose of causing unhappiness, the courts usually consider such conduct to be legal cruelty. Sneed v. Sneed, 14 Ariz. 17, 123 Pac. 312, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 99; Haley v. Haley, 44 Ark. 429; McGee v. McGee, 72 Ark. 355, 80 S. W. 579; Kientz v. Kientz, 104 Ark. 381, 149 S. W. 86; Wolff v. Wolff, 102 Cal. 433, 36 Pac. 767, 1037; Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625; Glass v. Wynn, 76 Ga. 319; Berry v. Berry, 115 Ia. 543, 98 N. W. 1075; Luetjohann v. Luetjohann, 147 Ia. 286, 126 N. W. 172; Dunlap v. Dunlap, 49 La. Ann. 1696, 22 So. 929; Goodman v. Goodman, 26 Mich. 417; Begrow v. Begrow, 162 Mich. 349, 127 N. W. 256, 17 Detroit Leg. N. 602, 139 Am. St. Rep. 562; Kapp v. District Ct. 31 Nev. 444, 103 Pac. 235; Mosher v. Mosher, 16 N. D. 269, 113 N. W. 99, 125 Am. St. Rep. 654, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 820; Melvin v. Melvin, 130 Pa. St. 6, 18 Atl. 920; Russell v. Russell, 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 348; Dawson v. Dawson, 63 Tex. Civ. App. 168, 132 S. W. 379; Cherrington v. Cherrington, 9 Alberta L. Rep. 181, 9 West. W. Rep. 146, 32 West. L. Rep. 438.

Emphasizing the importance of wilfulness in connection with the use of abusive language, it was said in Kientz v. Kientz, 104 Ark. 381, 149 S. W. 86: "In order to constitute cruel treatment, which our law recognizes as ground for divorce, there must be proof of wilfulness or malice on the part of the offending spouse, and the effect of that treatment must be to impair or threaten the impairment of the complaining party's health or such as to cause mental suffering sufficient to make the condition of the complaining party intolerable. Mere incompatibility of temperament or want of congeniality and the consequent quarrels causing unhappiness are not sufficient to constitute that cruelty which, under our statute, will justify divorce."

So in Sneed v. Sneed, 14 Ariz. 17, 123 Pac. 312, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 99, it was said: "No single act operating mentally is sufficient to constitute cruelty justifying divorce. There must be continuity of such conduct, and many, if not the great majority of, authorities hold that such conduct must be shown to have been induced by malevolence, hatred, or spite."

The ill treatment of a child in the mother's presence by the husband solely for the purpose of grieving her, and the use of offensive language to her, resulting in aggravating her illness, constitute cruelty. Dunlap v. Dunlap, 49 La. Ann. 1696, 22 So. 929.

Indignities need not consist of personal violence. They may consist of unmerited reproach, rudeness, contempt, studied neglect, open insult, and many other things habitually and systematically pursued, to an extent which would render life intolerable. Nor is it necessary that the complainant should be wholly blameless. Haley v. Haley, 44 Ark. 429.

A series of vexatious and deliberate insults by a wife against her husband was held to justify a divorce for cruelty in Dawson v. Dawson, 63 Tex. Civ. App. 168, 132 S. W. 379, the court saying: "What are wounds to the person as compared with those that affect the mind? The former may be healed, the latter endure for a lifetime. It is now generally held, even in jurisdictions where the common-law rule obtains, unaided by statutes such as ours, regarding causes for divorce, that 'any unjustifiable conduct on the part of either the husband or wife, which so grievously wounds the feelings of the other, or so utterly destroys the peace of mind of the other as to seriously impair the health, or such as to utterly destroy the legitimate purpose and object of matrimony, constitutes extreme cruelty,' constituting a cause for the dissolution of matrimony. . . . May not the husband's living with a wife who without provocation hates and abuses his daughter in her affliction, defames the memory of his dead wife, wantonly assails his character, publishes him as lazy, indolent, and good for nothing, demands his expulsion from a benevolent society as unworthy of its membership, assaults him, constantly abuses him, applies to him in the hearing of others opprobrious epithets, hates him, excludes him from his dwelling, and ceases to perform towards him the duties of a wife, be insupportable? If so, then, under the law of this state, as declared by its legislature, the sovereign authority of the state, no court has the authority to hold him to such a miserable existence by refusing to entertain a petition setting up such excesses as grounds for the dissolution of the marriage."

COUPLD WITH CHARGE OF UNCHASTITY.

Habitual and persistent use of offensive language together with unfounded accusations of unchastity made by a husband or a wife constitute cruelty warranting a divorce. Moss v. Moss, 114 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 1147, 85 L. J. P. 182, 32 Times L. Rep. 468; Powelson v. Powelson, 22 Cal. 358; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 Pac. 298; Friend v. Friend, 53 Mich. 543, 19 N. W. 176, 51 Am. Rep. 161; Whitacre v. Whitacre, 64 Mich. 232, 31 N. W. 327; Thompson v. Thompson, 79 Mich. 124, 44 N. W. 424; Delor v. Delor, 159 Mich. 624, 124 N. W. 544; Rose v. Rose, 129 Mo. App. 175, 107 S. W. 1089; Griffith v. Griffith, 77 Neb. 180, 108 N. W. 981; Cook v. Cook, 11 N. J. Eq. 196; Dietrick v. Dietrick, 14 Phila. (Pa.) 649, 36 Leg. Int. 413. See also Potter v. Potter, 75 Ia. 211, 39 N. W. 270; Mathewson v. Mathewson, 81 Vt. 173, 69 Atl. 646, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 300.

The use of vile and abusive language towards a wife, falsely and habitually accusing her of adulterous intercourse, etc., may amount to legal cruelty, where the conduct of the husband causes her much mental suffering, producing fits of illness and threatening permanent injury to her health. Powelson v. Powelson, 22 Cal. 358.

Charging a wife with infidelity in the presence of the children, constantly applying to her the vilest and most opprobrious epithets which a "vulgar mind could invent or a foul tongue utter," threatening her with bodily harm, and on one occasion daubing her face with paint, have been held to constitute cruelty. Dietrick v. Dietrick, 14 Phila. (Pa.) 649, 36 Leg. Int. 413.

Habitual and persistent accusations against a husband by his wife, both in public and private, of infamous conduct in violation of his marriage obligations, and calling him by the vilest epithets, constitute extreme cruelty. Whitmore v. Whitmore, 49 Mich. 417, 13 N. W. 800. And so continuous abusive language showing a fixed purpose to hurt him and repeated accusations of incest with his own daughter may amount to cruelty. Pedersen v. Pedersen, 88 Neb. 55, 128 N. W. 649.

Repeated charges of infidelity made by the wife against the husband which were unfounded, and which were published by her for many years to his acquaintances and business associates tending to humiliate him and seriously injuring his reputation and business standing, have been deemed to be sufficient ground to warrant a divorce for cruelty. Williams v. Williams, 101 Minn. 400, 112 N. W. 528. See also Carpenter v. Carpenter, 30 Kan. 712, 2 Pac. 122, 4 Am. Rep. 108; Holyoke v. Holyoke, 78 Me. 404, 6 Atl. 827.

Continually calling a husband opprobrious names, unjustly accusing him of improperly associating with other women, and refusing to cohabit with him for a number of years have been held to constitute cruelty. Waldhorn v. Waldhorn, 165 Mich. 130, 130 N. W. 199, 18 Detroit Leg. N. 15. See also Menzer v. Menzer, 83 Mich. 319, 47 N. W. 219, 21 Am. St. Rep. 605.

In Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick, 21 Misc. 378, 47 N. Y. S. 737, a charge of cruelty was sustained on facts stated as follows: "By a preponderance of credible testimony it is established that repeatedly and in wrath the defendant addressed profane and opprobrious language to the plaintiff—denouncing her as a 'cur,' a 'worm' and a 'devil' whom he consigned to 'hell,' and that under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, he maliciously and unjustifiably impugned her conjugal fidelity. On the trial, indeed, he denied that he ever accused her of unchastity, and professed confidence in her virtue: but with cynical insincerity, in face of an answer plainly imputing to her habitual wantonness and systematic immorality. Holmes v. Jones, 121 N. Y. 461, 466; Cornwall v. Cornwall, 30 Hun 573, 574. Were the instances of misbehavior casual and exceptional they might claim some indulgence on the score of infirmity of temper; but being persistent and characteristic, they stamp the conduct of the defendant toward the plaintiff with a uniform tenor of deliberate cruelty and inhumanity, and appear, as by implication he confesses, to have been directed to the end of driving her to a separation. Indeed, his vindictiveness did not cease with her departure; but after her escape he subjected her to the infamy of a public advertisement as a recreant to marital duty, to whom no tradesman might safely supply the necessities of life. All these indignities the defendant inflicted upon a woman he knew to be in delicate health—upon a wife who requited his cruelties with angelic gentleness, and to whose spotless purity he is constrained to bear reluctant testimony. Were bodily harm, as the effect of defendant's maltreatment, requisite to the plaintiff's case, it is abundantly apparent in the evidence."

ACCOMPANIED BY ACTUAL OR THREATENED VIOLENCE

It is generally held that where occasional acts of physical violence are resorted to by a spouse in connection with the continued use of vile and offensive language the entire course of conduct will constitute cruelty though the physical violence is not sufficient standing alone to warrant a divorce.

Thus proof that a husband habitually addressed the wife in profane and obscene language, applied to her opprobrious epithets, and on several occasions treated her with physical violence has been held to be sufficient to warrant a divorce. Doolittle v. Doolittle, 78 Ia. 691, 43 N. W. 616, 6 L.R.A. 187.

In Johns v. Johns, 57 Miss. 530 it was said: "Cruel and inhuman treatment practiced by one of the married parties towards the other, with such persistency as to have become the accustomed conduct of the party, and which is characterized by personal violence, entitles its victim to a divorce. This treatment must be habitual. A single act of violence ordinarily would not suffice. It might never be repeated. It need not have been frequent. It is not necessary for personal violence to attend the daily intercourse of the parties. If the treatment is persistently cruel and inhuman, and it is occasionally characterized by personal violence, so as to beget the apprehension that it is liable to occur again at any time when the fury of passion may impel the offender, it is sufficient."

Where it appeared that shortly after a marriage the husband became cool and unkind towards his wife, later offered her direct insults both in words and actions and struck her once a finding of cruelty was sustained. Taylor v. Taylor, 18 Tex. 574.

Cursing and abusing a wife and adopting a course of tyrannical conduct towards her which continued for several years, threatening bodily injury, attempting to do her bodily injury, and falsely and maliciously accusing her of unchastity, have been held to be cruelty. Shook v. Shook (Tex.) 125 S. W. 638.

In discussing this phase of the question and adopting the decision of Lord Stowell in Evans v. Evans, 1 Hag. Cons. (Eng.) 35, it was said in Freeman v. Freeman, 31 Wis. 235: "The causes must be grave and weighty, and such as to show an absolute impossibility that the duties of the married life can be discharged. In a state of personal danger no duties can be discharged; for the duty of self-preservation must take place before the duties of marriage, which are secondary both in commencement and in obligation; but what falls short of this is with great caution to be admitted. . . . What merely wounds the feelings is in few cases to be admitted, where they are not accompanied with bodily injury, either actual or menaced. Mere austerity of temper, petulance of manners, rudeness of language, want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty; they are high moral offenses in the marriage state undoubtedly, not innocent, surely, in any state of life, but still they are not that cruelty against which the law can relieve. It would seem from these remarks by one whose words ought to be law upon this subject, that there may be cases where what merely wounds the mental feelings, though unaccompanied with bodily injury either actual or menaced, will constitute that cruelty for which the law will afford relief. It would seem from the same remarks, also, that proof of actual bodily injury is not required, but that such injury threatened or menaced will under some circumstances suffice. And it appears to me, in reason and justice, that both propositions ought to be accepted as correct. Everybody knows that there may be a refinement of cruelty practiced on the part of one of the parties towards the other, unconnected with gross and abusive language or epithets or with anything personally violent or threatening, which may render the marriage state absolutely intolerable, and the discharge of the duties of married life an impossibility. Everybody knows that the conduct of the husband towards the wife may be such even without personal violence, actual or threatened, as to render her marriage state intolerable, and, from mere mental suffering and physical debility so produced, to make it utterly impossible for her to perform the duties which are expected of a wife, and which otherwise she would be able and anxious to perform. The language of the above quotation would seem to leave cases of this nature within the rule or definition of legal cruelty, as I must say I think they ought to be; and it is for this reason I have always doubted the correctness of the decision in the early case in this court of Johnson v. Johnson, 4 Wis. 135. With all due respect, I must confess I regard the rule as laid down there, or as applied to the facts of that case, which in my judgment were most aggravating and cruel, as unreasonably narrow and stringent; and I much prefer that indicated in the above language of Lord Stowell. And this view would seem to be most in harmony with the true exposition and obvious intent of the statute, which declares that a divorce from the bond of matrimony may be adjudged 'when the treatment of the wife by the husband had been cruel and inhuman, whether practiced by using personal violence or by any other means.' R. S. ch. 111, § 9, subd. 5; 2 Tay. Stats. 1271, § 9, subd. 5. In the case now before us there is abundant proof, not only of course and abusive language and epithets, often repeated, but of actual personal violence and ~~bodily harm, accompanied by threats~~ at the time the plaintiff left his house, that he, the defendant, would take her life. The facts thus proved are fully as strong, if not stronger, to sustain the charge of cruel and inhuman treatment, than those shown in the case of Pillar v. Pillar, 22 Wis. 658, where this court sustained a judgment for divorce on the same ground. It is the opinion of this court, therefore, that judgment should have been rendered for the plaintiff, granting the divorce upon the ground of cruelty set forth in her complaint, and proved at the trial." See also Hacker v. Hacker, 90 Wis. 325, 63 N. W. 278. Compare Johnson v. Johnson, 4 Wis. 135.

While the courts will not usually regard the husband's status in respect to abusive language accompanied by occasional violence in the same light as that of the wife, yet in some cases conduct of that kind by a wife has been held to be sufficient to warrant the granting of a divorce to the husband. Thus calling the husband vile names and accusing him of being intimate with other women, and on one occasion assaulting him and driving him from the house have been held to be cruelty. Cevene v. Cevene, 143 Wis. 393, 127 N. W. 942. So a divorce has been allowed where the wife continually used offensive language towards her husband, tore his clothes, and on one occasion spit in his face. Stevens v. Stevens, 170 Mo. App. 322, 156 S. W. 68.

Evidence that a wife had a violent temper and would frequently fly into a rage using most vile language towards the husband and his relatives, that she made several attacks on him once with a razor and another time with a hatchet has been held to warrant a divorce for cruelty. Johnsen v. Johnsen, 78 Wash. 423, 139 Pac. 189, 1200.

The continuous taunting of the husband for his ignorance in the presence of others, using vile language towards him, frequently threatening to poison him, and on one occasion actually putting poison in his food have been held to constitute cruelty. Motley v. Motley, 93 Mo. App. 473, 67 S. W. 741. But see Sturgis v. Sturgis, 173 Mich. 597, 139 N. W. 866.

It was held in Fizette v. Fizette, 146 Ill. 328, 34 N. E. 799, that even though a single act of violence was committed after a long period of abusive language it did not constitute legal cruelty. To the same effect see De Coito v. De Coito, 21 Hawaii 339; Richards v. Richards, 1 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 389; Cutler v. Cutler, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 511; Hagood v. Hagood (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 122; Bingham v. Bingham (Tex.) 149 S. W. 214; Pillar v. Pillar, 22 Wis. 658. "It is quite possible that a single act of cruelty, on a single occasion, may be so severe, and attended with such corresponding circumstances, as might under a fair and liberal construction of this act justify a divorce. But it is not every single touching of the wife's person in anger, at a moment of sudden excitement or of passion, that should bring down on the husband a sentence of separation more cruel than the act that induced it." Richards v. Richards, supra, wherein it was held that the fact that a husband pulled his wife's nose on an occasion in which she was quarrelling with his sister, the former holding a knife in her hands in a threatening manner, was not cruelty.

Where it appeared that a wife was struck by her husband as a result of a quarrel between them, and again several years thereafter while he was intoxicated, it was held that cruelty was not established. Buckland v. Buckland, 22 Pa. Dist. 965.

Habitual Intemperance or Use of Drugs.

While an action for divorce on the charge of cruelty cannot be grounded on or established by intemperance only, yet habitual intemperance when coupled with other acts which make it dangerous for the other spouse to continue the marital relation is uniformly held to constitute cruelty.

Thus it was said in Hall v. Hall, 172 Mich. 210, 137 N. W. 536: "While the occasional or temperate use of alcoholic stimulants, or even occasional drunkenness, do not, under the statute, constitute valid grounds for divorce, we are of opinion that even occasional intoxication accompanied by cruel conduct and abusive language, may be held to be extreme cruelty under the statute. 'Extreme cruelty' is an exceedingly elastic term. Those acts, or that conduct and language, which in some walks of life, would pass as the ordinary incidents of the marital relation might constitute, in other social phases, the very refinement of cruelty."

So it was held in Lee v. Lee, 3 Wash. 236, 28 Pac. 355, that frequent intoxication of a husband, in which condition he abused his wife and without cause accused her of infidelity, often threatening her with violence, through fear of which she was driven from home, constituted cruelty, the court saying: "While it is not the policy of the law, or the practice of the courts, to sever the marriage relation for any but grave causes satisfactorily proven, we nevertheless think that the testimony presented in the record in this case, standing as it does uncontradicted, clearly justifies a decree of divorce on the ground of cruelty. To say nothing of the alleged personal violence inflicted by respondent upon appellant, it is hard to conceive how a husband could be more cruel to a wife not entirely devoid of all sensibility and womanly instincts, than to persistently and falsely, and without just cause, accuse her of unchastity, especially to or before other persons. And the fact that he does so in the frenzy of intoxication is no mitigation of the offense, for habitual drunkenness is itself a sufficient ground for divorce under our statute."

It has been held that the fact that the wife was not of the most refined character and was at times guilty of profanity, or that she did not remonstrate with the husband as she ought, or rebuke him for using liquor to excess, furnished no adequate excuse for his habitual intoxication leading to abuse of the wife, nor did good conduct during periods of sobriety avoid the charge of cruelty. Berryman v. Berryman, 59 Mich. 605, 26 N. W. 789.

Frequent intoxication of a husband, by reason of which he abuses his wife, treating her harshly and cruelly, applying to her vile epithets, etc., is sufficient to make her apprehensive of her personal safety, and is of a nature calculated to affect her mind and undermine her health, and hence is sufficient cruelty on which to grant a divorce. Ryan v. Ryan, 30 Ore. 226, 47 Pac. 101.

Occasional intoxication, while not a ground of divorce under the statute, is no excuse for cruelty. Cruelty resulting from drunkenness is a cause for divorce. Maxwell v. Maxwell, 69 W. Va. 414, 71 S. E. 571.

On the question of intoxication it was said in Page v. Page, 43 Wash. 293, 86 Pac. 582, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1054, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 914: "To be an habitual drunkard a person does not have to be drunk all the time, nor necessarily incapacitated from pursuing during the working hours of the day ordinary unskilled manual labor. One is an habitual drunkard, in the meaning of the divorce laws, who has a fixed habit of frequently getting drunk. It is not necessary that he be constantly or universally drunk, nor that he have more drunken than sober hours; it is enough that he have the habit so firmly fixed upon him that he is unable to resist when the opportunity and temptation is presented."

But in Waskam v. Waskam, 31 Miss. 154, it was held that habitual intemperance and such manners and conduct as would necessarily be produced by such habits were not sufficient to warrant a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty.

In New York cruel conduct cannot be made the basis of a divorce a vinculo but will warrant a separation or a divorce a mensa et thoro. Frequent drunkenness of a husband and compelling his wife to associate with a woman of ill repute and withdrawing his society and companionship at long intervals from her constitute cruel and inhuman treatment authorizing a limited divorce. Tower v. Tower, 134 App. Div. 670, 119 N. Y. S. 506. And see McBride v. McBride, 5 N. Y. S. 388. But intemperance alone does not entitle a wife to a limited divorce for cruel and inhuman treatment. Anonymous, 17 Abb. N. Cas. 231.

The mere fact that a husband drinks whiskey in moderation at his home because he thinks it is good for him, as his work exposes him to all sorts of weather, does not constitute cruelty. Bowen v. Bowen, 179 Mich. 574, 146 N. W. 271, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 460.

Evidence of harsh treatment and acts of violence occurring when the husband was under the influence of morphine and usually in resisting the efforts of his wife to take the drug from him, has been said by way of dictum to be sufficient to warrant a divorce. Youngs v. Youngs, 33 Ill. App. 223, wherein a divorce was refused because of condonation.

Occasional intoxication by a wife, peevishness, fault finding, and neglect of her household duties and the cleanliness of the children have been held not to be cruelty. Schulze v. Schulze, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 325.

In the case of Shutt v. Shutt, 71 Md. 193, 17 Atl. 1024, 17 Am. St. Rep. 519, it was held that acts of violence and outbreaks of passion on the part of a wife in consequence of her habitual intemperance did not constitute such cruelty as to justify a divorce, the court saying: "The evidence in this case exhibits a domestic state well calculated to excite sympathy for the husband. The broils in his family made by the wife with his mother, the gross and revolting language of the wife upon these occasions, and the very reprehensible methods resorted to by the wife to procure liquor to gratify her thirst, were all facts well calculated to produce disgust and extreme mortification in a husband possessed of any degree of refinement. But all this conduct was that of an unfortunate woman who had become addicted to the habit of occasional intoxication, and the proof shows that it was only when she was under the influence of strong drink that she was guilty of the gross improprieties referred to in the evidence. And however deplorable this state of things may be, it is quite certain that the courts cannot interfere to furnish relief against all the troubles and distresses that may exist in the matrimonial relation. By far the greater number of these must be left to the good sense and judicious management of the parties themselves. The husband must exert his influence and authority over the wife for the correction of her bad habits. As has been said by a great authority (Lord Stowell), it is, the law of religion, and the law of the country, that the husband is intrusted with authority over his wife. He is to practice tenderness and affection, and obedience is her duty. Within and by a proper observance of this principle it may be hoped that the husband will be able effectually to restrain the unfortunate habit in his wife of which he complains, and to restore the happy relation between the wife and himself that formerly existed." See also McDaniel v. McDaniel, 100 Ark. 629 mem. 140 S. W. 980.

In Holland v. Holland, 4 Leg. Gaz. (Pa.) 372, the fact that a wife became a confirmed opium eater, to the neglect of her domestic duties, was held not to be cruelty.

So in Ring v. Ring, 118 Ga. 183, 44 S. E. 861, 62 L.R.A. 878, the continued use of morphine by a wife who became an addict of the drug was held not to be cruelty within the statute.

In Smith v. Smith, 119 Ga. 239, 46 S. E. 106, it was held to be proper for the court to exclude evidence that the wife was a habitual user of morphine.

Refusal of Marital Rights.

The refusal by either spouse to allow the other to have marital intercourse is not such conduct as the law will generally recognize as cruelty. Paterson v. Paterson, 3 H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 308; Cousen v. Cousen, 11 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 656, 4 Sw. & Tr. 164, 12 L. T. N. S. 712; D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hag. Ecc. (Eng.) 773; Stewart v. Stewart, 78 Me. 548, 7 Atl. 473, 57 Am. Rep. 822; Cowles v. Cowles, 112 Mass. 298; Disborough v. Disborough (N. J.) 26 Atl. 852; McKinney v. McKinney, 9 Ohio Dec. 656; Magill v. Magill, 3 Pittsb. (Pa.) 25; Eshbach v. Eshbach, 23 Pa. St. 343; Platt v. Platt, 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 551; Scott v. Scott, 61 Tex. 119; Varner v. Varner, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 381, 80 S. W. 386; Lohmuller v. Lohmuller (Tex.) 135 S. W. 751; Wills v. Wills, 74 W. Va. 709, 82 S. E. 1092, L.R.A. 1915B 770; Schoessow v. Schoessow, 83 Wis. 553, 53 N. W. 856. See also Burton v. Burton, 52 N. J. Eq. 215, 27 Atl. 825; Hexamer v. Hexamer, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 226.

In Magill v. Magill, 3 Pittsb. (Pa.) 25, the court said: "In what respect the refusal by the wife to allow the husband access to her bed can be termed cruel and barbarous I cannot conceive; nor, having a reference to the proper meaning of terms, can I see how such treatment will render his life burdensome or condition intolerable. If nonaccess to a man or woman's bed has such startling effects, a great portion of our race must be in a pitiable condition."

So it was said in Wills v. Wills, 74 W. Va. 709, 82 S. E. 1092, L.R.A. 1915B 770: "The policy of the law opposes and denies the allowance of divorces except for weighty and very substantial reasons. To make this a cause for divorce would render the procurement of divorces easy and afford a means of separation to all who desire it, whatever the motive might be. The law may well deem the natural passion of the parties, accompanied by legal and rightful opportunity of gratification, a sufficient inducement to the performance of marital duty in this respect. And ordinarily it is, for the complaint made here by one spouse against the other is seldom heard. The rules of law are made to conform to and answer the purposes of ordinary situations, not extraordinary or exceptional cases. In other words, the trouble here complained of will ordinarily arise in but few cases, say one in a thousand. To make it a ground for divorce would likely bring forth divorces in hundreds of instances in which they would not otherwise occur. Some of the authorities relied upon liken the wife's refusal to a case of impotency of one of the parties to the marriage, but the two cases are not analogous. Pre-existing incurable impotency of one of the parties to a marriage renders impossible the procreation of children, and thus defeats one of the chief purposes of marriage. Mere aversion to the performance of the act of intercourse is not a physical obstacle to the accomplishment of this high and sacred purpose. Impotency is. In cases of normal persons, the aversion may be overcome, and generally is. The parties to this cause are not exceptions from the general rule. The wife's hope of posterity has induced her to bear seven children. Procreative power of both parties to the marriage relation is essential to the achievement of one of its chief purposes, wherefore the law deems it a matter of the highest importance. But, when the act by which procreation is effected is regarded as mere indulgence, no known principle of law dignifies one form of indulgence or pleasure above another. Moreover, impotency is not a ground of divorce, unless it existed at the time of the marriage. The aversion complained of here is subsequent."

The rule heretofore stated is particularly applicable where the husband is old and feeble. Varner v. Varner, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 381, 80 S. W. 386, wherein the court said: "The persistent and unjustifiable refusal of marital rights may constitute cruelty, if sufficient to injure the health, but in no case has such injury been established. The refusal of either party to occupy the same bed is not cruelty under any definition of that term. But if it be conceded that a case might be presented in which refusal to grant sexual intercourse would constitute such cruel treatment as would authorize a divorce under our statute, we do not think the record before us discloses such a case. In our opinion, the effect that such refusal would have upon a husband would depend in a large degree upon his physical condition, as well as upon the condition of the wife. The finding of the court that the defendant refused to accede to the plaintiff's requests carries with it the inference that plaintiff solicited sexual intercourse, and the fact that he made such solicitation is all there is in the record indicating the plaintiff's physical condition. The rule is that in the absence of a statement of facts, or a finding of the court or jury to the contrary, it will be presumed that proof was made of all facts necessary to sustain the judgment. So, in this case, it may have been shown, concerning the plaintiff, that his way of life has fallen into the sear, the yellow leaf.' Old age and infirmity may be upon him; his virility may be greatly diminished; his amorous desires may be few and feeble, and the failure to have them gratified a matter of no great importance. And if such be his condition, whatever might be held as to a husband differently situated, we are of opinion that the trial court did not err in holding in this case that the wife's conduct, though wrongful, was not such an excess, cruel treatment or outrage as to render their living together insupportable."

It was held in Schoessow v. Schoessow, 83 Wis. 553, 53 N. W. 856, that in the absence of any proof by a wife that she suffered any injury either mental or physical therefrom, her husband's refusal to have sexual intercourse with her did not warrant a court in granting her a divorce for cruelty. See also Holyoke v. Holyoke, 78 Me. 404, 6 Atl. 827.

In Michigan it has been held that it is extreme cruelty for a wife to refuse to maintain sexual relations with her husband for a period of three years. Campbell v. Campbell, 149 Mich. 147, 112 N. W. 481, 119 Am. St. Rep. 660. To the same effect see Case v. Case, 159 Mich. 491, 122 N. W. 538, 124 N. W. 565; Waldhorn v. Waldhorn, 165 Mich. 130, 130 N. W. 199, 18 Detroit Leg. N. 15.

Sexual Excesses.

A divorce for cruelty will generally be granted to a woman where the proof shows that her husband compelled her against her wishes and remonstrances to submit to excessive sexual intercourse, the effect of which was to impair her health. Moss v. Moss, 114 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 1147, 85 L. J. P. 182, 32 Times L. Rep. 468; Mayhew v. Mayhew, 61 Conn. 233, 23 Atl. 966, 29 Am. St. Rep. 195; Youngs v. Youngs, 33 Ill. App. 223, 130 Ill. 230, 22 N. E. 806, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313, 6 L.R.A. 548; Ridley v. Ridley (Ia.) 100 N. W. 1122; Maget v. Maget, 85 Mo. App. 6; Gardner v. Gardner, 104 Tenn. 410, 58 S. W. 342, 78 Am. St. Rep. 924; McAllister v. McAllister, 28 Wash. 613, 69 Pac. 119.

It was held in Ridley v. Ridley, supra; that it was not necessary to show that the complainant resisted her husband's demands or engaged in angry controversies to repel his advances.

The subjecting of a wife by her husband to excessive sexual intercourse in a rough and unreasonable manner, when he knows that her physical condition is such that it will be likely to inflict injury on her, is such intolerable cruelty as to entitle her to a divorce. Mayhew v. Mayhew, 61 Conn. 233, 23 Atl. 966, 29 Am. St. Rep. 195, wherein it was said: "What may or may not constitute intolerable cruelty by a husband towards his wife in the exercise of his marital rights is a difficult and delicate question. Such acts as are usually meant by that term are not ordinarily dangerous or cruel. But sometimes they may be both dangerous and cruel. Marital rights exist on the part of the wife as distinctly as on the part of the husband. . . . Correlative to marital rights are marital duties. The term implies a two sided obligation. In respect to such acts as are here in question, it includes the duty of forbearance on the part of the husband at the reasonable request of the wife, as well as the duty of submission on the part of the wife at the reasonable request of the husband. Any decision of what constitutes intolerable cruelty in these matters that should leave out of consideration the duty of the husband and look only to the duty of the wife, would be manifestly erroneous." Compare Shaw v. Shaw, 17 Conn. 189.

In English v. English, 27 N. J. Eq. 71, a divorce was granted for extreme cruelty, on proof showing that the husband insisted on having excessive intercourse with his wife against her will and her remonstrance, despite the fact of her delicate and diseased condition; and with knowledge that the intercourse inflicted great and distressing pain on her. The case was reversed on appeal in 27 N. J. Eq. 579, on the ground that there was no reasonable apprehension of a continuance of the cruelty.

Acts of Bestiality.

Unnatural and abnormal practices by either spouse which tend to make the marriage relation so revolting as to defeat the purposes of the relation, constitute cruelty warranting a divorce. Crutcher v. Crutcher, 86 Miss. 231, 38 So. 337; Anonymous, 3 Ohio Dec. 450, 2 Ohio N. P. 342. See also N. v. N. 9 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 1203, 3 Sw. & Tr 234, 9 L. T. N. S. 265. Thus the practice of "sodomy" or "pederasty" by a spouse is cruelty within the meaning of the statute warranting a divorce. Crutcher v. Crutcher, supra, wherein it was said: "'Cruelty, in the sense of the statutes on this subject, is such conduct in one of the married parties as renders his continuance of cohabitation either so dangerous to the other party in fact, or attended with such reasonable apprehension in the mind of the other, to the physical distress or discomfort of the other, as to demand his separation on the ground of the real physical safety of the other, or of mental or physical capacity of the other to discharge well the duties of husband or wife.' 1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce (4th ed.) 716, 717. Tested by these principles and these definitions, the act of sodomy charged is legal cruelty, within the terms of our statute. Unnatural practices of the kind charged here are an infamous indignity to the wife, and which would make the marriage relation so revolting to her that it would become impossible for her to discharge the duties of wife, and would defeat the whole purpose of the relation. In the natural course of things, they would cause mental suffering to the extent of affecting her health, and would give rise to serious apprehension of communication to her of disease in case of the continuance of cohabitation. Such conduct constitutes extreme cruelty, as explained by the courts. All that is here said of sodomy is equally applicable to pederasty, as defined by the bill in this case. Whether restricted to sodomy, as commonly understood, or whether pederasty means what is here alleged in this case, or what it is defined to be in the larger dictionaries, it is cruel and inhuman treatment, within the meaning of our statute."

An action by a wife will lie for extreme cruelty under the statute where the husband commits an act of sodomy with a beast. Anonymous, 3 Ohio Dec. 450, 2 Ohio N. P. 342.

The practice of masturbation by the husband in the presence of his wife, but without compelling her to remain present, though it disturbs her nerves and thus affects her health, is not "cruel and abusive treatment" within the statute. Wood v. Wood, 141 Mass. 495, 6 N. E. 541, 55 Am. Rep. 491, wherein it was said: "The words 'cruel and abusive treatment' seem to import on their face conduct directed towards the other party, and with a malevolent motive. Without deciding that a case could not be imagined which would fall within the meaning of the words without such a motive, it is enough to say that purely self-regarding conduct, not forced upon even the knowledge of the wife otherwise than by the usual intimacy of matrimony, does not constitute the offense, merely because its folly, its disgusting character, or its wickedness disturbs her nerves or conscience, and thus affects her health."

Refusal to Speak.

Refusal of a spouse to speak to the other for a long period of time has been held in connection with other circumstances to constitute cruelty. Sharp v. Sharp, 116 Ill. 509, 6 N. E. 15; Zweig v. Zweig, 46 Ind. App. 594, 93 N. E. 234; Downey v. Downey, 135 Mich. 265, 97 N. W. 699; Preuit v. Preuit, 88 Neb. 124, 129 N. W. 175; Hiecke v. Hiecke, reported in full post, this volume, at page 497. Compare Duhme v. Duhme, 3 Ohio Dec. 95; Harris's Appeal, 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 331.

In Reinhard v. Reinhard, 96 Wis. 555, 71 N. W. 803, 65 Am. St. Rep. 66, it was said: "Marriage implies companionship, and is supposed to be based upon mutual regard and affection. For a husband and wife to live and sleep in the same house, and eat at the same table food prepared by the wife, without the husband speaking to the wife, except in anger, for a period of three months at a time, must have been, at least, very disagreeable, if not unbearable. That such was the fact does not seem to be very seriously disputed. It certainly evinced abnormal affections, persistent wantonness, and deliberate perversity. The effect of such conduct upon a nervous, sensitive woman can better be imagined than described, and may have seriously impaired the plaintiff's health, as found by the court. This court has repeatedly held that personal violence, whether actual or threatened, or even gross and abusive language, is not absolutely essential to constitute cruel and inhuman treatment."

Effect of Complainant's Provocation.

The complaining party is not entitled to a divorce where the cruel conduct relied on is provoked and brought on by the complainant, unless the conduct complained of is excessive and out of proportion to the provocation. Reed v. Reed, 4 Nev. 395; Davis v. Davis, 19 N. J. Eq. 180; Coles v. Coles, 32 N. J. Eq. 547; Biddle v. Biddle, 50 Pa. Super. Ct. 30.

Thus it was said in the case last cited: "If it be conceded that the respondent called the complainant the bad names referred to, the fact is to be noted that she had strong provocation to such conduct by reason of the admitted actions of the complainant. He states that their troubles started in 1897 some time during the fall, about which time he noticed her doing on a number of occasions that which did not appear to be a correct thing for a married woman to do. He then says: 'From the time I commenced to accuse her of things then she commenced to retaliate by many acts and particularly at the table. . . . She would for instance talk disparagingly of me, and tell me I was not a business man, and if I had more business tact I would make more money, and we could all have a better time, and speak of me in a slurring manner about the operating work I was doing, surgical work. Constantly telling me to go to the board of trustees so I would get more salary, so we could have more money, and always telling me things that the trustees were doing, and what they ought to do, and what they did not do, and I ought to do this, and do that, and, of course, in that way got me in trouble with my board of trustees.' On cross-examination he says: 'I accused her first because I knew she was guilty,' and that he continued accusing her of unfaithfulness; that her unfaithfulness was the original cause of their troubles; that time and again in the presence of his children and others he had said that she was untrue to him; that he announced many times to his children that their mother was a 'whore' and that he repeatedly made this accusation in the presence of strangers. In reply to the question, in this connection, 'The fact is you accused her hundreds of times,' the complainant replied, 'Probably in the thirteen years, yes, I did.' No other accusation as degrading could be made against a married woman as that which the complainant frankly admits he made against his wife very many times and which he persisted in up to the time of the taking of the testimony, although he had withdrawn the charge of adultery on an application to the court in which he stated under oath that he had been misinformed and did not believe it to be true. In view of the gravity of this accusation and its persistent repetition it would not be surprising to learn that the respondent retaliated and if she did not, as she claims, she exhibited a remarkable forbearance. A complainant is not entitled to a divorce where the indignities relied on are provoked by the complaining party unless the retaliation is excessive: Richards v. Richards, 37 Pa. St. 225; and it can hardly be contended here that the respondent equaled the complainant in the enormity of the accusations."

So in Coles v. Coles, 32 N. J. Eq. 547, it was said: "Had her own conduct been different from what it was, had she herself been free from blame, I would not hesitate to pronounce the desired decree for divorce. But I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that her conduct has been unforgiving and unbearingly, calculated to exasperate rather than conciliate; that she seems to have been unwilling to conform to her husband's wishes in regard to his household affairs, and to discharge her duties under the circumstances in which she was placed."

v.

HIECKE.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—May 2, 1916.

163 Wis. 171; 157 N. W. 747.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Milwaukee county: TURNER, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Hiecke, plaintiff, against Hiecke, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[171] Action for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment.

Defendant answered, denying all allegations upon which the claim of cruel and inhuman treatment was based, and [172] pleading misconduct of plaintiff, palliating, if not justifying, any improper treatment of her.

As the trial court viewed the evidence it established the following situation:

(1) The parties intermarried at the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, May 25, 1898. (2) Since that time they have resided there. (3) They have four children, a son fifteen years old, a daughter twelve years old, a daughter ten years old, and a daughter seven years old,—all of whom have resided with plaintiff since June 29, 1914. (4) On many occasions defendant slighted plaintiff and did not speak to her, causing her much mental anguish. Upon her kindly protesting against such treatment, she was told by defendant that it was none of her business and if she did not like it she could go. In July, 1898, she was compelled to leave defendant and to reside with her parents. Following their advice and that of her brother, she returned, but defendant refused to speak to or forgive her. (5) On each occasion of the birth of a child, defendant neglected plaintiff by purposely remaining away from home. On one such occasion, though he was only four blocks away and knew that she was alone and in need of her nurse and physician, he refused to answer her urgent call for his presence. (6) He has been accustomed, for days, weeks, and months at a time, to refuse to speak to her. (7) June 25, 1914, he was out till 2:30 the following morning; then returned home intoxicated, took a valuable new blanket she had purchased, made it into a ball and threw it at her, stating that it was a cheap lodging-house blanket; at the same time, in the presence of the oldest son and a servant, using very vile and abusive language toward her, and he was accustomed to do that. (8) About six years prior to the commencement of the action, he returned home under the influence of liquor and, with his clothing offensive from tobacco and cigarette smoke, entered plaintiff's apartments, whereupon she spoke to him as to his condition and he left the room, since which time they have not cohabited as man and [173] wife. (9) On social occasions he customarily neglected her. (10) Usually she and the children have spent the summer months at her mother's at Cedar Lake, Wis.

Appeal and Error — Review of Findings of Fact.

Findings of fact by the trial court are presumed correct, unless against the clear preponderance of the evidence.

Divorce — Recrimination.

The doctrine of "recrimination" in divorce cases, whereby one spouse, guilty of offenses against the married status, will be denied divorce notwithstanding an offense of the other, does not necessitate that the spouses be guilty of the same offenses, but a wife, seeking a divorce on account of the inhuman and cruel treatment of her husband, will not be denied a divorce where she was guilty of no offense against the married status, though her conduct was not, in all respects, what it should have been.

[See 6 Ann. Cas. 171.]

Cruelty — What Conduct Constitutes.

That a husband was guilty of neglect and abuse which ultimately would affect his wife's health, leaving her without medical attention when in a delicate condition, and refusing to speak to her for long periods of time, constitutes cruel and inhuman treatment within the statute, although the wife's health had not at the time she sought a divorce become impaired.

[See note at end of this case.]

Costs — Expenses of Proceeding before Commissioner.

In a divorce case, where defendant was examined before a commissioner, expenses actually incurred by the commissioner in such proceeding may be properly taxed against defendant as costs.

Alimony — Amount of Allowance.

Where a wife was granted a divorce and custody of minor children of the marriage, an award of $80 a month for the support of such children, four in number, while large, cannot be held excessive; the defendant husband having in the past paid the house rent and allowed the wife $30 a week for expenses.

Same.

While the amount awarded a wife on divorce should not exceed from one-third to one-half of the husband's property, it is not improper, where the husband is practically the owner of an apothecary shop, to award the wife an insurance policy on which the husband had paid fourteen premiums averaging $100, and to require him to continue payment of the premiums, and also to pay the wife three separate sums of money amounting to $1,200; the stock of drugs and some other property being awarded the husband.

consin, defendant, as a rule, visiting her Saturday nights and remaining until Sunday night; but spending very little time with the family. He would, customarily, go fishing and then to a neighboring hotel and stay most all night drinking. In 1913 and 1914 he did not visit plaintiff and the family at all during their sojourn with her mother of some three months each season. (11) On Christmas, 1912, he refused to accept a Christmas present from her, or to dine with her and the family. He spent the day with his sister and there distributed presents to his children. (12) She possesses improved, income-yielding real estate for which she paid $5,800. On account of necessary outlays for repairs, the net income therefrom has been less than two per cent. (13) She has household furniture in her possession worth about $500 which was a gift from her parents. (14) He is a strong man of fair business capacity, a pharmacist by occupation, and has conducted a drug store, under an arrangement with his father, for years. The assets of the business are worth $9,000 and he has some contingent interest therein. (15) He owns one-third of the $60,000 par value of the stock of the Turbine Sewer Machine Renovating Company, the value of which is nominal. The stock has not all been paid for. (16) He owns a city lot worth $100. (17) He owns a policy of life insurance on which he has paid, as the annual premium, $100 per year for fourteen years. (18) For six years he has given her $30 per week for household expenses, paid $20 per month for rent of the home, and paid about $15 per month for fuel bills, besides clothing the children. (19) She is a suitable person to have the custody of the children and it is for their interests that she should have such custody.

On such facts the court concluded as follows: Plaintiff is entitled to judgment of absolute divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, and to be awarded custody of [174] the children. The policy of insurance should be assigned to her, defendant to pay the annual premium until maturity. He should pay her $400 in six months, the same in twelve months, and the same in eighteen months. He should be divested of all interest in the household furniture. He should pay her attorneys' $100 for attorneys' fees and pay the taxable disbursements of the action. He should pay, until further order of the court, $80 on the first day of each month for the support of the minor children. He should have the corporate stock mentioned, and the contingent interest in the drug-store assets. Such distribution shall be a final division of property subject thereto.

Judgment was entered according to such conclusions except the provision for support of the children was made payable in weekly instalments.

There was a retaxation of costs as to $120 claimed by a court commissioner for service in the action for expenses incurred in listing and numbering checks. That was reduced to $25.

Adolph G. Schwefel for appellant.

Lorenz & Lorenz for respondent.

MARSHALL, J.—It is considered that,—in the light of the rules governing the matter, particularly, that the findings are to be presumed correct unless against the clear preponderance of the evidence, giving due weight to the fact that the trial judge saw the witnesses and had a far better opportunity than is afforded by reading the printed history of the trial for weighing their testimony,—the conclusions of fact here cannot properly be disturbed.

It is contended that, though the facts found stand as verities, the divorce should not have been granted because of proof that the respondent was guilty of much matrimonial misconduct. That misconduct of one party to a marriage contract [175] would justify or require, under some circumstances, denial of judicial assistance to such party to nullify such contract, is well established by the decisions of this court. That rule, so far as it relates to an absolute bar to a guilty party successfully prosecuting an action for a divorce, is limited, in general, to cases where both parties have been guilty of a legal cause therefor (Pease v. Pease, 72 Wis. 136, 39 N. W. 133; Hubbard v. Hubbard, 74 Wis. 650, 43 N. W. 655, 6 L.R.A. 58; Voss v. Voss, 157 Wis. 430, 147 N. W. 634); though it has been sometimes extended by judicial discretion to situations where the wrongful conduct of the complainant did not constitute a ground for a divorce, but induced such conduct on the part of the defendant.

The doctrine of recrimination, in relation to divorce actions, is quite ancient, as indicated in 2 Bishop on Marriage, Divorce and Separation, secs. 372 to 376, inclusive. It was a question, as will be seen, for a time, whether fault of the plaintiff should bar a divorce unless of the same grade as the fault charged against the defendant, as for instance, whether, in case of the latter charge being adultery, cruel and inhuman treatment on the part of the complainant would bar a recovery. The negative has been held in some state courts (Dillon v. Dillon, 32 La. Ann. 643), but, in general, it has been held in this country that conduct of the plaintiff constituting any cause for a divorce is a bar to an action for a divorce by such party on any ground. 2 Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 377, 378. Such is the rule, as stated in Pease v. Pease, supra. The prevailing doctrine is thus stated in 2 Bishop, § 340: "Recrimination in divorce law is the defense that the applicant has himself done what is ground for divorce. . . . It bars the suit founded on whatever cause, whether the defendant is guilty or not." On the same subject, §§ 349, 365, and 368. This court went no further in Pease v. Pease, supra. The gist of the decision is correctly stated in the syllabus thus: "Where it is shown that each party has been [176] guilty of an offense which the statute has made a ground for divorce in favor of the other, the court will not grant relief to either." It is said in the opinion that such is the law in jurisdictions having written laws similar to our own, citing many authorities.

In the cases here subsequent to Pease v. Pease, the doctrine of the latter was not extended, as will be seen when the facts of the later cases are understood, though this language quoted in Hubbard v. Hubbard, 74 Wis. 650, 43 N. W. 655, 6 L.R.A. 58, from the opinion in Otway v. Otway, L. R. 13 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 141, is otherwise suggestive: "A judicial separation can only be granted when the petitioner comes to the court with a pure character, and is free from all matrimonial misconduct;" but the case shows the court was dealing with a situation of mutual misconduct, each party being guilty of conduct constituting ground for a divorce. It was conduct of that character that the quoted language was addressed to and not to cases, in general, of want of "pure character" or of "matrimonial misconduct." In Voss v. Voss, 157 Wis. 430, 147 N. W. 634, there was mutual misconduct of the nature required by the rule stated in Pease v. Pease, supra. It is very certain that this court did not intend to otherwise state the law in Hubbard v. Hubbard, supra.

The result of the foregoing is that, unless respondent was guilty of matrimonial misconduct constituting good ground for an action for a divorce, there is nothing in the evidence barring her from maintaining her action, even if it does disclose conduct on her part which might, properly, have been, and probably was, considered on the question whether it so far provoked appellant to his misconduct as to justify or require a conclusion that it fails to satisfy the call of the statute for cruel and inhuman treatment. There are no findings on the subject of matrimonial misconduct of plaintiff. None seem to have been requested. We must assume the trial court was of the opinion that the evidence did not warrant any which would bar her from obtaining relief, in case she established [177] her charge of cruel and inhuman treatment against appellant, or excusing his wrongful conduct. We are unable to see our way clear to disturb such conclusion.

The question is raised on behalf of appellant as to whether, in any event, the circumstances mentioned in the findings warranted the conclusion that appellant was guilty of cruel and inhuman treatment of respondent. There is no specific finding of fact on the subject, but we take the conclusion of law as inferentially finding that the long continued course of ill-treatment of respondent, mentioned, imperiled her health, made her marriage state intolerable, and rendered her incapable of performing the duties of a wife. This court has often held that treatment which does, or is well calculated to, produce such results, satisfied the "cruel and inhuman treatment" of the statute. Freeman v. Freeman, 31 Wis. 235, 248; Reinhard v. Reinhard, 96 Wis. 555, 71 N. W. 803, 65 Am. St. Rep. 66; Kohl v. Kohl, 143 Wis. 214, 125 N. W. 921; Banks v. Banks, 162 Wis. 87, 155 N. W. 916.

It does not seem, by the later authorities, that actual impairment of health, caused by ill-treatment without violence, actual, threatened, or probable, is essential to cruel and inhuman treatment. If the conduct of the guilty party is such as to naturally cause great mental suffering to the other, and render impairment of health probable, so that further efforts to perform the duties of the marriage state would be dangerous, that is sufficient. That is the effect of Kohl v. Kohl, supra. The wife need not submit to such treatment until actually broken down in health before being competent to successfully claim a judicial separation on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. This court has departed from the doctrine, which obtains in some jurisdictions, that personal violence, actual or so threatened as to reasonably produce a belief of its being probable, is essential to cruel and inhuman treatment, and adopted the more humane construction of the statute above indicated.

Our conclusion is that the decision of the trial court on the [178] subject above discussed should not be disturbed, though the findings would be much more satisfactory if they contained a specific decision that the wrongful conduct referred to imperiled the health of respondent and rendered continuance of living together by the parties as man and wife intolerable and dangerous to her. Ill-treatment of the character mentioned in the findings might or might not have that effect, according to the temperament of the wife and her surroundings. The court saw respondent and, doubtless, concluded that she could not be subjected to such treatment and be expected to preserve her health or be able to perform her duties as a wife. That, as before stated, can well be read out of the conclusion as to appellant's guilt, presuming that the circuit judge was, as he must have been, familiar with the long established law here.

In the cost bill an item of $25 was allowed as expenses incurred by a court commissioner before whom there was an examination of appellant under the statute. Complaint is made of such allowance, also of the amount appellant was required to pay respondent for support of the minor children and of the amount which was awarded as her share on a division of property.

We do not perceive any efficient merit in the complaint of the $25 item. The expense seems to have been actually incurred by the court commissioner, and necessarily, in his judgment. We are unable to conclude that it was not so under the circumstances.

The allowance for support of the minor children, though quite liberal, does not appear to be so clearly excessive as to warrant overruling the trial court's judgment.

After a careful consideration of the disposition of the subject of division of property, it is considered that it should not be disturbed. The well established rule is that, in general, a liberal amount to be allowed to the divorced wife is one-third in money value of the husband's property. That may be increased to one-half or more for special circumstances. [179] Edleman v. Edleman, 125 Wis. 270, 104 N. W. 56; Von Trott v. Von Trott, 118 Wis. 29, 94 N. W. 798; Lindenmann v. Lindenmann, 118 Wis. 175, 95 N. W. 96. It does not clearly appear that there was a departure here from that rule. The court, doubtless, considered that the value of appellant's interest in the $9,000 drug business was sufficient to warrant the award to respondent which was made and it is considered that the evidence does not clearly preponderate against that view. He had been allowed for a long time to deal with the property very much as if he were the owner and, evidently, the trial court came to the conclusion that he, substantially, was such.

By THE COURT.—The judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a long continued course of neglect and petty indignities practiced by a husband on his wife constitutes cruel and inhuman treatment entitling her to a divorce though there is no physical violence and no finding of actual impairment of the wife's health. For a discussion of the habits or course of conduct by a spouse which will constitute cruelty warranting a divorce, see the note to Cunningham v. Cunningham, reported ante, this volume, at page 478.

ANDERSON

SHOCKLEY.

Missouri Supreme Court—January 6, 1916

266 Mo. 543; 181 S. W. 1151.

Libel and Slander — Variance between Complaint and Proof — Time and Place.

Where the petition, in an action for slander, charges that the defamatory words were spoken at a certain place, on a certain date, in the presence and hearing of a certain witness, plaintiff cannot recover, unless the evidence shows that the words were spoken as charged, though it appears that the same words were spoken to other parties at different times and places.

Same.

The plaintiff, in an action for slander, should not be held to strict accuracy in his proof of the time of publication, so long as the variance between his proof and the allegation does not bring the case within the statute of limitations, or mislead defendant to his injury, or amount to a palpable fraud on the court.

Proof of Other Publications — Admissibility.

Where, in an action for slander, the court instructed that, to entitle plaintiff to recover, the evidence must show that the defamatory words stated in the petition were spoken by defendant of and concerning plaintiff at the time and place and in the presence of the witness alleged, the refusal of an instruction that evidence of defendant's having spoken concerning plaintiff, at a different time and place and in the presence of others, defamatory words similar to those charged, could be considered as tending to prove express malice, required reversal of a judgment for defendant.

Same.

Where the petition, in an action for slander, charges that the defamatory words were spoken at a particular time and place in the presence of a particular person, evidence that defendant, in the presence of persons other than this person, at a different time and place, spoke of and concerning plaintiff defamatory words of like import to those charged, is competent as tending to show express malice in augmentation of damages.

Sufficiency of Complaint — Allegation of Time and Place of Slander.

Rev. St. 1909, § 1837, providing that the petition in an action for slander need not state any extrinsic facts to show the application to the plaintiff of the defamatory matter, but it shall be sufficient to state generally that the same was spoken of or published concerning plaintiff, does not so change the common-law rule as to relieve plaintiff from the necessity of alleging when and definitely stating where the publication was made; and, where the petition is defective in this respect, plaintiff may be required, on motion to make more definite and certain, to set forth when and where and to whom the alleged defamatory words were published.

[See note at end of this case.]

Suit in Several Publications — Necessity of Separate Counts.

Where plaintiff, in an action for slander, desires to rely on separate publications of defamatory words, he must separately plead every such publication in separate counts of the petition.

[See generally, Ann. Cas. 1917A 250.]

Same.

In an action for slander, there can be no recovery for a publication which is not pleaded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Maries county: WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by R. S. Anderson, plaintiff, against O. W. Shockley, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

C. C. Bland, J. J. Crites and L. B. Hutchison for appellant.

Frank H. Farris and W. D. Johnson for respondent.

[546] FARIS, P. J.—Plaintiff sued defendant in Pulaski County for slander. The venue was changed on the application of defendant to Maries County, where the case was tried, a verdict rendered for defendant and plaintiff appealed. The sum claimed as damages was ten thousand dollars; hence our jurisdiction. We may say in passing that this case has been tried before, wherein defendant mulcted in damages in the sum of $1,250, appealed and obtained a reversal and a new trial. [Anderson v. Shockley, 159 Mo. App. 334, 140 S. W. 765.] To the latter case reference is made for such of the facts as we may not deem it necessary to set out herein.

Since upon the instant appeal no points are made except as to the action of the court in giving three instructions, [547] which we set out in our opinion, we need not here go very extensively into the facts. The petition upon which the trial below was had, contains but one count, the charging part of which and which alone is pertinent here, runs thus: "Plaintiff for his second amended petition herein states that the defendant on or about the 30th day of July, A. D. 1908, at the county of Pulaski, in the State of Missouri, wilfully, wantonly and maliciously spoke of and concerning the plaintiff, R. S. Anderson, certain false, defamatory and slanderous words, to wit: 'R. S. Anderson (meaning the above-named plaintiff) is a thief; that he (meaning plaintiff) stole a set of harrow teeth from me and I can prove it by John Ormsby.'" Thereafter followed prayer for judgment in the ordinary form.

The evidence on the part of plaintiff tended to prove that about the latter part of July, 1908, at the railroad depot in the town of Crocker, in Pulaski County, defendant spoke to plaintiff in the presence of one Albert Manes sufficient of the words complained of to form substantially the statement set out in the petition. Testimony was also offered on the part of plaintiff that defendant at divers other times and places, particularly to one James F. Vaughan and to a certain J. M. Carmack, made statements of similar import, in which he charged plaintiff with having stolen his harrow teeth. The first instruction asked by plaintiff and given by the court made specific reference to the alleged defamatory words spoken in the presence of the witness Albert Manes.

The answer of defendant was, among other things not pertinent, a specific denial of the fact that he spoke the words charged. The proof of defendant tended to show that he had not spoken to plaintiff in the presence of witness Albert Manes the defamatory words alleged and shown by the testimony of said Manes, or in the presence of anyone else. The defense made a [548] very serious attack upon the general reputation of the witness Albert Manes for truth and veracity. In addition, the defense sought to impeach Manes by showing by other witnesses (who said they were present at the railroad station in Crocker at the time defendant is said by this witness to have uttered the words charged), that no such conversation was in fact had between defendant and plaintiff.

The three instructions complained of, the giving of one of which for defendant and the refusal of two of which for plaintiff constitute the only assignments of error, will be found set out in the opinion, together with such other facts as we may find to be necessary to make clear the discussion.

I. But three points are made by appellant, each of which as stated, has to do with instructions, either given or refused. At the request of defendant the learned trial court gave this instruction, to wit:

"No. 4. Unless you find from the evidence that the defendant spoke of and concerning plaintiff at Crocker, Missouri, on or about the 30th day of July, 1908, in the presence and hearing of witness Manes the alleged defamatory words stated in plaintiff's petition, you cannot find the issues for plaintiff, even though you may believe from the evidence that defendant spoke such words to other parties at different times and places."

Appellant contends that in this the learned judge visi erred. We disallow this point and hold the instruction correct in principle. If it was adventitiously wrong, the fact was due to another error, which we hereafter discuss. It was the duty of plaintiff to confine himself to one publication as a basis of recovery; or else to have charged each separate and distinct publication upon which he sought recovery in a separate count. [Christal v. Craig, 80 Mo. 367.]

[549] II. Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give at his request instructions numbered eight and nine, which are as follows:

"No. 8. The court instructs the jury that if you believe and find from the evidence that the defendant in the presence and hearing of J. M. Carmack, or others, spoke of and concerning plaintiff slanderous and defamatory words similar and of like import to those charged in the petition, they may consider such evidence as tending to prove express malice on the part of the defendant.

"No. 9. The court instructs the jury that if you believe and find from the evidence that at any time within two years of the time of filing this suit, to wit, the 19th day of August, 1908, the defendant maliciously spoke of and concerning the plaintiff, R. S. Anderson, in the presence and hearing of James F. Vaughan the words alleged in the petition, to wit: 'R. S. Anderson (meaning the plaintiff) is a thief. That he (meaning plaintiff) stole a set of harrow teeth from me and I can prove it by John Ormsby,' you will find the issues for the plaintiff and assess his damages at such sum as you may believe and find he is entitled to recover, not to exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars."

We are of the opinion that instruction eight should have been given and that the refusal of the court to give it constituted error for which this case must be reversed and remanded. We are, however, of the opinion that the court did not err in refusing to give instruction nine. The reasons for all three of these rulings are germane to each other and are such that all points raised can for brevity and clarity well be considered together. This is so, for the reason that if appellant's contentions are each the law, divers publications to divers persons at different times and [550] places could be pleaded in one count, proved upon trial, and plaintiff could pick and choose the one on which he would stand; or even, stand upon all and failing and refusing to elect, leave the jury to pick from among them some one or more publications on which to bottom a verdict. We have said that this is not the law; the contrary is well settled. On the other hand if it is the law as respondent contends that said instruction four was properly given and instruction eight properly refused, then a plaintiff in a slander suit is bound to the one publication specifically counted on and may not prove for any purpose whatever the fact of the publication, to others than those (if any) set out in his petition, of slanderous words of like or similar import to those charged in the petition. We think neither position is throughout correct; but since the rules of pleading and practice upon which a solution of these contentions turns, seem to have drifted away somewhat from both common law and the statute, we will examine them again briefly.

At common law it seems the pleader in a slander suit was required to allege when and where, and might if necessary to the defense be required to aver to whom, the publication was made. This is yet the law in England. [Odgers on Libel & Slander, 625.] Touching this rule the above learned writer says: "In cases of slander he [the plaintiff] must give the date of each slander, the names of the persons to whom, and the places where, each slander was uttered."

If such a bill of particulars could be required at common law in slander suits, or whatever the rule as regards definiteness and certainty in these behalfs was at common law, it is the law yet in this State unless we have changed it by statute. But it is said that our statute (Sec. 1837, R. S. 1909) has changed the rule at common law requiring certainty of allegation [551] as to time and place of publication. [Atwinger v. Feller, 46 Mo. 276; Johnson v. Bush, 186 Mo. App. 107, 171 S. W. 636.] Let us see if this is correct. The applicable part of our statute reads thus: "In an action for libel or slander, it shall not be necessary to state in the petition any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to the plaintiff of the defamatory matter . . . but it shall be sufficient to state generally that the same was published or spoken concerning the plaintiff," etc. (Italics ours.) [Sec. 1837, supra.] The query which arises in construing this statute is: Wherein and to what extrinsic facts does it apply and what facts does it obviate the necessity of alleging? Manifestly, to such extrinsic facts as this term was technically used in a common-law declaration for slander, to designate, viz.: Such extrinsic facts as serve to show the "application to plaintiff of the defamatory matter," and touching this purpose and this only, "it shall be sufficient (i. e., to show the application of the defamatory matter to plaintiff) to state generally that the same was published or spoken concerning the plaintiff." [Newell, Slander & Libel, 728, 838; Dias v. Short, 16 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 322; Pike v. Van Wormer, 5 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 171; Culver v. Van Anden, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 375.] In the case of Pike v. Van Wormer, supra, discussing the effect of the New York statute on pleading in actions for slander and libel, which statute we have carried bodily into our Code as section 1837, supra, Willard, J., said:

"The Code merely dispensed with the allegation of extrinsic facts, showing the application of the words to the plaintiff, in order to obviate the difficulty which was supposed to have been occasioned by the decision of the Supreme Court in Miller v. Maxwell, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 9. It does not dispense with the necessity of an averment or innuendo when they become essential to show the meaning of the words themselves. In [552] these respects the rules of pleading remain unaltered."

Persuasive toward the correctness of this view is the fact that at common law a declaration for slander ordinarily contained, what was designated in the books on pleading as, an "averment of extrinsic matters," wherein it was set forth with much of sonorous phrase pending, or lately pending, matters in which plaintiff took part and likewise the part he took, which matters and acts were deemed to make clear, wherein and why the slanderous words applied to him. [Newell on Slander & Libel 838; Yates, Pleadings 388.]

We think it is obviously a strained construction to interpret this statute as so far changing the common-law rule as to relieve plaintiff from the necessity of averring when publication was made, or from stating definitely where it was made. It is easy to see the non-necessity of the rule of definiteness and certainty as regards libel. Because it is difficult to imagine a case wherein the defense to a libel suit would be that no such writing existed, and cases are reasonably rare wherein the question of publication vel non, would become an issue. There might be questions mooted in defense as to whether the matter was libelous, or, as to whether defendant had part in the publication, and rarely, but not ordinarily, as to the fact of publication. But touching defamatory words spoken, or alleged so to be, so crying a necessity to hold to the common law exists that it ought not to be lightly cast aside at the behest of a statute which, if it means what it has been said to mean, is so glaringly ambiguous. If the defense be that the words spoken were true, in short, justification, then obviously it makes no difference when, where or to whom these words were spoken, barring such objection as might arise from the Statute of Limitations. But if the defense be as here that defendant did not speak the words charged, it is apparent [553] that every rule of fairness demands that defendant be informed specifically if he desires the information for his defense, as to the time and place, at least, where the alleged defamatory words were spoken. Otherwise it is difficult to see how a defendant, being innocent of the publication, could defend himself adequately in the action, or protect himself against conspiracy and perjury. Any other view smacks of the ambuscade and of lying in wait, privileges which we have long prided ourselves upon having abdicated when we abandoned common-law pleading.

It is obviously unthinkable that plaintiff under all circumstances may merely aver "that to wit: On or about one year from the date hereof, defendant at the city of St. Louis, wilfully, wantonly and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff," etc., without averring definitely when or where, or to whom of the six hundred and eighty-seven thousand inhabitants of that city the alleged defamatory words were spoken, and that he may, whatever the defense is, refuse on motion to that end, to make his petition more definite and certain. It is to be conceded of course that in practically every case of libel, from the very nature of the case, no necessity would exist for a so-called bill of particulars, and that in many actions for slander it would suffice to aver publication generally, as to persons and to aver time and place under a videlicet, but for the reasons stated it would not fairly or reasonably suffice, at least as against a motion to make more definite and certain, in a case of alleged slander wherein the defense is not guilty.

The case of Atwinger v. Fellner, supra, was correctly ruled upon the concrete facts up for judgment. While the petition under discussion in that case contained "no allegation that the words were uttered in [554] the presence of anyone," yet no attack was made upon that petition till after verdict. Clearly, a petition which merely averred the fact of publication generally, without descending into a bill of particulars, would not be fatally defective, or liable to successful assault after verdict, but would be cured by the Statute of Jeofails. [State v. Arkansas Lumber Co. 260 Mo. 283, 169 S. W. 145; 31 Cyc. 761, and cases cited; Sec. 19, p. 671, G. S. 1865.] No other cases have been found in this State which deal with this matter of sufficiency of pleading, except the Atwinger and Johnson cases, supra. In other American jurisdictions the rule as to definiteness of allegation as to the time and place at which, and the person or persons to whom, the slander was published, is thus stated by Cyc.:

"It is generally held sufficient in an action for slander to allege that the words were spoken or uttered by defendant in the presence of some third person or persons and the names of such person or persons need not be given. So it has been held that an averment that defendant 'published' the defamatory matter is good, as the word 'published' imports that the words were spoken in the presence of some third person. The petition should allege with exactness the time when and the place where the publication was made, and it has been held that any indefiniteness in these respects will render the petition insufficient as against a demurrer." [25 Cyc. 446.]

Touching the right of defendant, who may be otherwise wholly unable to prepare his adequate defense, to have the petition made more definite and certain, the rule in other jurisdictions is thus stated by Cyc.: "It is generally held that defendant is entitled to know definitely the time and place of the publication of the alleged slander or libel and the name of a party to whom publication was made, and if complaint [555] fails to show these particulars, a bill [of particulars] will be ordered." [25 Cyc. 467.]

From these authorities and reasons we think it should be ruled (a) that the plaintiff in an action for slander (and in libel as well where need arise) on motion to make more definite and certain, may be required to set forth when and where and to whom the alleged defamatory words were published; (b) that since each publication of defamatory words constitutes a separate cause of action, every such publication must be separately pleaded in separate counts of the petition, and (c) that no recovery can be had for the publication of a slander which is not pleaded, but (d) other publications of defamatory words of similar import to those pleaded may be shown by the evidence for the purpose of showing express malice in augmentation of damages, either actual or punitive. Of course, plaintiff ought not in his proof to be held always to strict accuracy as to time, so long as the variance may not bring him foul of the Statute of Limitations, or mislead defendant to his hurt, or amount to a palpable fraud upon the court.

From these conclusions it results that instruction four given for defendant, while stating correct principles of law, did not go far enough when standing alone and without the aid of instruction eight, offered by plaintiff and erroneously refused by the court. Both of these instructions were proper if given together, but the learned trial court having refused the instruction requested by plaintiff which correctly set out the office and effect of evidence of other publications, should then have modified instructions four by an apt statement of the purpose for which the jury could consider other publications of defamatory statements of like or similar import, or else refused it. For in the last analysis the concrete result of giving this instruction under the circumstances and in the [556] form as given was to let this testimony of other publications into the case and then at the end to remove it wholly from the jury's consideration; to tell them in effect, that they need not consider it for any purpose. Arguendo we may say (though we would not and do not now write such a reason into the law) that the jury being more or less subject to the suspicions and frailties of other humans, might, but for this instruction, have argued the probability of defendant's having spoken the words complained of to the witness Manes from the fact that he had spoken them to so many other persons.

It follows that for the failure of the trial court to give instruction eight, supra, this case must be reversed and remanded for a new trial in a manner not inconsistent with the views herein set down. Let this be done.

All concur.

NOTE.

Sufficiency of Complaint in Action for Slander with Respect to Averments of Publication and of Time and Place.

Publication.

The declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for slander must show a publication of the slander, and is not sufficient unless it contains an allegation of the speaking of the words of and concerning the plaintiff, in the presence or hearing of some person or persons other than the plaintiff and the defendant. Penry v. Dozier, 161 Ala. 292, 49 So. 909; Wiese v. Meissner, 171 Ill. App. 597; Hanning v. Bassett, 12 Bush (Ky.) 361; Chapin v. White, 102 Mass. 139; Downs v. Hawley, 112 Mass. 237; Loranger v. Loranger, 115 Mich. 681, 74 N. W. 228, 4 Detroit Leg. N. 1042; Atwinger v. Fellner, 46 Mo. 276; Dedrick v. Mallry, 143 App. Div. 819, 127 N. Y. S. 1023; Anonymus, 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 406; Hurd v. Moore, 2 Ore. 85.

In Hanning v. Bassett, supra, the court said: "The appellee in his petition fails to aver that the slanderous words were published, or that they were spoken in the presence and hearing of anybody, and if the words were uttered in nobody's presence, the appellee could not have been injured. In order to make out a case of verbal slander, two things are indispensable—malice in the utterance of actionable words, and their publication. Indeed the gist of the action is the supposed injury to the plaintiff's character and feelings, by actionable words, maliciously published and set afloat among his acquaintances; and as the petition fails to aver a malicious publication of the words charged to have been spoken, it is too defective to support the judgment."

In Penry v. Dozier, 161 Ala. 292, 49 So. 909, it was said: "Allegation and proof of the publication of the alleged defamatory words are essential to the maintenance of the action for libel or slander. There must be a communication to some person other than the plaintiff and defendant. It is not necessary that it be made known to the public generally. . . . It is sufficient if the complaint shows that the defamatory matter was communicated to others than the plaintiff or defendant by or through the agency of the defendant, and it is not necessary that the particular circumstances of the publication should be alleged."

The name of the person or persons to whom the slanderous communication or publication was made need not be given. Ware v. Cartledge, 24 Ala. 622, 60 Am. Dec. 489; Penry v. Dozier, 161 Ala. 292, 49 So. 909; Warner v. Lockerby, 28 Minn. 28, 8 N. W. 879; Fitzgerald v. Young, 89 Neb. 693, 132 N. W. 127; Thacher v. Schaeffer, 19 W. N. C. (Pa.) 566. See also McCullum v. Langdon, 165 Ky. 244, 176 S. W. 990. Compare Shannon v. Spaid, 39 Pa. Co. Ct. 567; Weidman v. Kunsman, 23 Pa. Dist. 336.

In Warner v. Lockerby, supra, the complaint was that, at a certain time and place, the "defendant, in the presence and hearing of Clement Schroeder and a number of other persons, maliciously spoke, of and concerning the plaintiff herein, the false and defamatory words following: 'You had better go and pay for that overcoat you stole;' whereby the plaintiff was injured," etc. In holding the complaint to be sufficient, the court said: "The material allegations in a complaint for slander, where the words are on their face slanderous per se, as in this case, and in the English language, are (1) that defendant, with malice or wrongfully, (2) spoke, in the presence and hearing of others, (3) of and concerning the plaintiff, (4) these false words (setting out the words spoken). We fail to see why this complaint does not come up to this standard, and, if it does, we think it good. We see no ground for the assumption, that the complaint alleges words spoken in the third person, when they are expressly stated in the second person. Neither do we know of any rule which requires the pleader to allege to whom the slanderous words were addressed. He is required to allege that they were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff, and in the presence and hearing of others. If the words were addressed to a third party, the pleader would not be required to state to what person they were addressed and we fail to see why a different rule of pleading should obtain, where the words are addressed to the plaintiff in the presence of third persons. But, if it be necessary to allege to whom the words were addressed, it would seem that the fact that the words are in the second person, coupled with the allegation that they were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff, necessarily implies that the words were addressed to the plaintiff. Any layman, on reading this complaint, would so understand it, and, judging from his answer, the defendant himself so understood it."

It has been held that a complaint which did not allege the slanderous words to have been spoken "in the presence or hearing of any person" was clearly defective as not stating "facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Wood v. Gilchrist, 1 Code Rep. (N. Y.) 117.

So, a complaint for slander has been held to be bad on demurrer which did not state that the slanderous words were uttered, spoken or published by the defendant of the plaintiff. Watts v. Morgan, 50 Ind. 318.

In Bradshaw v. Perdue, 12 Ga. 510, it was held that a declaration in an action of slander was good which charged the defendant with having spoken certain slanderous words on a specified date, in one count alleging them to have been spoken in the presence and hearing of a named person and divers other good citizens of the state, and in the other count, alleging that they were spoken in a conversation with a named person, in the presence and hearing of divers good citizens of the state, without naming them.

In Loranger v. Loranger, 115 Mich. 681, 74 N. W. 228, 4 Detroit Leg. N. 1042, an allegation in a declaration that the slanderous words were used in the presence and hearing of divers persons besides the plaintiff was held to be sufficient.

In Harris v. Zanone, 93 Cal. 59, 28 Pac. 845, it was held that an allegation that the defendant had spoken the slanderous words "in the presence and hearing of divers good and worthy persons" was the formal averment of a publication, and was sufficient.

In Valley Dry Goods Co. v. Buford, 114 Miss. 414, 75 So. 252, it was held that a statement in the declaration that the defendant unlawfully and maliciously charged the plaintiff with stealing a sum of money in a store, and that the plaintiff was working as a partner in the theft with another saleswoman in the store, and that she was charged with being a "liar," "thick head," and "thief" by the manager and agents of the company, and that these statements were published to a named person, was a sufficient allegation as to the publication.

In Burbank v. Horn, 39 Me. 233, it was contended that the declaration in slander therein was defective, in alleging that the words were spoken in the presence and hearing of "divers persons," or of persons specifically named, where it should have been in the presence and hearing of "divers good and worthy citizens." The court held that this distinction was immaterial under a general demurrer.

In Townsend v. O'Keefe, 18 Ont. Pr. 147, it was held that a statement of claim which, besides alleging that the slanders had been spoken and published to certain persons whose names were mentioned, added the words "and to others at present unknown to the plaintiff," was sufficient. But in the same case it was held that other paragraphs in the statement of claim in which the slanderous declarations were alleged to have been made to a number of different persons at different times, during a period of some five months, and in which the plaintiff had not stated which of the persons mentioned were present when the different statements were made and at what times and places they were made, were insufficient.

An averment in a complaint for slander that the words were spoken "in the presence of" divers persons, or of a named person, without stating that they were also spoken "in the hearing" of such persons, is good as against a general demurrer. 1 Chitty on Pleading 421; Burbank v. Horn, 39 Me. 233; Brown v. Brashier, 2 Pen. & W. (Pa.) 114. See also Curtis v. Moore, 15 Wis. 134. Especially is this true after the rendition of a verdict. Smart v. Easdale, Cro. Car. 199, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 775; Hall v. Hennesley, Cro. Eliz. 486, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 738, Noy 57, 74 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1025; Kellan v. Manesby, Cro. Jac. 39, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 32. So, it has been held that a statement of claim in an action in the municipal court "for damages on account of certain false and slanderous words uttered by the defendant, in the presence of divers persons," etc., was not insufficient, against the objection that the words were not alleged to have been spoken in the hearing of a third person, since that fact need not be shown in order to constitute a publication. Wiese v. Meissner, 171 Ill. App. 597.

It has been held that the word "publish" or "published," as used in a declaration or complaint, imports ex vi termini that the words were spoken in the presence and hearing of some third person. Taylor v. How, Cro. Eliz. 861, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1087; Ware v. Cartledge, 24 Ala. 622, 60 Am. Dec. 489; Penry v. Dozier, 161 Ala. 292, 49 So. 909; Shinloub v. Ammerman, 7 Ind. 347; Burton v. Burton, 3 G. Greene (Ia.) 316; Duel v. Agan, 1 Code Rep. 134; Watts v. Greenlee, 13 N. C. 115; Hurd v. Moore, 2 Ore. 85. See also McLaughlin v. Schnellbacher, 65 Ill. App. 50; Emmerson v. Marvel, 55 Ind. 265. In Burton v. Burton, supra, the court said: "The defendant might have uttered the defamatory words in secret, but we are at a loss to know how he could have published them unless he did so to or in the presence of some one or more persons. Publishing is defined, by an able lexicographer, to be, 'making known, divulging, proclaiming.' The very charge of publishing presupposes public utterance, and the additional allegation that the words were published in the presence of divers persons would have been surplusage. The count is good, and the demurrer should have been overruled."

In Watts v. Greenlee, 13 N. C. 115, the court said: "It is objected by the defendant, that it is not stated that he gave publicity to the charge; that the word 'publish' does not sufficiently convey that idea. But for my part, I can scarcely conceive a word in our language, which more definitely conveys the idea requisite in law, to support an action for speaking slanderous words. Publish is to proclaim, to make known generally."

In Hurd v. Moore, 2 Ore. 85, it was held that the terms "conversations," "discourses," and "publish," as used by the pleader in a complaint for slander, implied the presence of hearers, and sufficiently indicated that the declarations were public and notorious.

In Ware v. Cartledge, 24 Ala. 622, 60 Am. Dec. 489, an action for slander in imputing a want of chastity to the plaintiff, the only objection taken to the declaration was that in the portion of it in which the speaking and publishing of the slanderous words were averred, they were averred to have been spoken in the presence of a person whose name was left blank. The court held that as the words spoken were actionable in themselves, it was sufficient to have averred that they were spoken and published of and concerning the plaintiff, saying: "This averment necessarily implies the presence of some one, to whom, or in whose presence, publicity was given to the charge. The name of such person, if set forth in the declaration, would not render it necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the words were spoken to him, or in his presence, before she would be entitled to recover; but if the testimony showed that they were spoken to another and a different individual, it would suffice. The injury complained of is, not that the defamatory words were spoken to this or that individual, but that publicity had been maliciously given by the defendant to a false charge against the plaintiff."

In Kyzer v. Grubbs, 2 McCord L. (S. C.) 305, it was held that a count in a declaration for slander which stated that the defendant on a certain day, in a conversation which he had with divers citizens of and concerning the plaintiff, did falsely publish and declare, etc., was not open to the objection that it was not stated that the particular slanderous words were spoken or published of or concerning the plaintiff.

In McKinney v. Roberts (Cal.) 8 Pac. 3, an action for slander, it appeared that the allegation of the complaint was that on a certain date, "as the plaintiffs are informed and believe," at a place specified, the defendant, in the presence of certain named persons, spoke the slanderous words. In holding that the language "the plaintiffs are informed and believe" that the defendant spoke certain words was not a sufficient averment of the speaking, the court said: "Plaintiffs might have been informed, and might have believed, the defendant to have spoken the words as charged, and yet it may not have been true. Would proof that they were so informed, and that they thus believed, be sufficient to sustain an action? We think not. If denied, the proofs should show the words to have been spoken by the defendant, or the action must fail. No amount of proofs that plaintiffs were informed defendant had thus spoken, and that they believed it, would suffice to establish the fact. The allegata and probata should concur. The averments of the complaint should be as precise and specific as the proofs are required to be. The language used does not exclude the hypothesis that defendant did not speak the words. It may all be true, and the defendant be entirely innocent. Had plaintiffs stated that, upon information and belief, they averred defendant spoke the words in question, quite a different proposition would be presented. Suppose defendant had failed to answer, what would have been the effect of admitting the allegations of the complaint? Why, simply that plaintiffs were so informed, and not that it was true, but that they believed it to be true. We think the defect goes to the sufficiency of the facts stated, and not to the mode of stating them, and therefore that it can be reached by a general demurrer, and that for this reason the demurrer was properly sustained."

In Roberts v. Lovell, 38 Wis. 211, it was held that a complaint in an action for slander which did not aver that the defendant spoke the slanderous words failed to state a cause of action. The court said: "This complaint alleges that the plaintiffs were husband and wife on a certain day, 'when the slanderous words hereinafter mentioned were spoken by the defendant,' and then proceeds to charge that certain slanderous words were spoken on that day of and concerning the plaintiff wife; but it fails to state, directly and positively, by whom they were spoken. The words above quoted are a mere recital, not an averment of fact. They show that the pleader had it in his mind, when he inserted them in the complaint, to aver in a subsequent portion of the pleading that on the day mentioned the defendant spoke certain slanderous words of and concerning the plaintiff Mrs. Roberts. Having failed so to aver, there is nothing in the pleading to which the recital can be referred. It is therefore inoperative, and necessarily goes for naught. Suppose this complaint was verified by some person, and suppose it could be proved that the person who verified it knew that the defendant never uttered or spoke the slanderous words set out in the complaint. Could such person be convicted of perjury assigned on such verification? Clearly not. And the reason why he could not be so convicted is, that he has not sworn that the defendant spoke the words in question, but only that such words had been spoken. This is a very fair test of the sufficiency of the complaint, although perhaps it is not absolutely conclusive. We see no way of escape from the conclusion that the complaint is fatally defective, and that the circuit court properly excluded the evidence, and, on the refusal of the plaintiffs to amend, properly dismissed the action. We regret that we are forced to this conclusion, because, as we are informed, the omission to charge that the defendant spoke the words was a clerical mistake, not discovered until the action had been dismissed. But the omission is vital, and we cannot lawfully supply the averment by inference or presumption."

It is not sufficient merely to aver that the words were spoken, omitting the words "and published." 1 Chitty on Pleading 421; Hanning v. Bassett, 12 Bush (Ky.) 361.

The insufficiency of the averment as to publication in a complaint or declaration for slander is not available to the defendant after the rendition of a verdict in the cause. Smart v. Easdale, Cro. Cas. 199, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 775; Hall v. Hennesley, Cro. Eliz. 486, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 738, Noy 57, 74 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1025; Kellan v. Manesby, Cro. Jac. 39, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 32; Allen v. Fincher, 187 Ala. 599, 65 So. 946; Schoepflin v. Coffey, 162 N. Y. 12, 56 N. E. 502, reversing 25 App. Div. 438, 49 N. Y. S. 627; Bedtkey v. Bedtkey, 15 S. D. 310, 89 N. W. 479.

Where a count in a complaint for slander did not, with the technical accuracy required by good pleading, allege a publication of the slander, but it was not demurred to on that particular ground, it was held that, as it was plainly sufficient after plea and verdict, to support a judgment, the trial court could not be put in error for overruling the defendant's demurrer. Allen v. Fincher, 187 Ala. 599, 65 So. 946.

In an action for both slander and libel, where the complaint obviously contained no sufficient allegation that the defendant caused the printing or the publication of the words spoken, to constitute a cause of action against him for libel, the defendant could not avail himself of the insufficiency of the complaint on appeal. Schoepflin v. Coffey, 162 N. Y. 12, 56 N. E. 502, reversing 25 App. Div. 438, 49 N. Y. S. 627.

Likewise, it was held in Bedtkey v. Bedtkey, 15 S. D. 310, 89 N. W. 479, that the failure of the complaint to disclose the exact place where the slanderous words were uttered, thereby misleading the defendant, not having been objected to at the trial, was without merit on appeal.

Though a count in a complaint for slander does not, with the technical accuracy required by good pleading, allege a publication of the slander, in the event of a demurrer on that ground being sustained, the plaintiff may amend the count by setting up that the alleged slander was uttered in the presence of divers persons, or in the presence of certain named persons. Allen v. Fincher, 187 Ala. 599, 65 So. 946. See also Hanning v. Bassett, 12 Bush (Ky.) 361.

In Wolfe v. Israel, 102 Ga. 772, 29 S. E. 935, it was held that a declaration which alleged a time and place and the slanderous words spoken, but failed to allege that they were spoken in the presence of a third party, could be amended by adding thereto the name of the person to whom the slanderous words were spoken. See also Weidman v. Kunsman, 23 Pa. Dist. 336.

Under the Indiana statute (2 R. S. 45, § 86; 2 G. & H. 110, § 86) enacting that in an action for libel it shall be sufficient to state, generally, that the defamatory matter was published or spoken by the plaintiff, and if the allegation is denied, the plaintiff must prove, on the trial, the facts showing that the defamatory matter was published or spoken of him, the plaintiff in a complaint for slander may allege, generally, that the slanderous words were spoken of himself, without any averment as to their publication, and objection may not be made to the complaint on the ground that it does not allege that the words were spoken in the presence and hearing of any person. Guard v. Risk, 11 Ind. 156; Hutts v. Hutts, 51 Ind. 581; Emmerson v. Marvel, 55 Ind. 265; Marks v. Jacobs, 76 Ind. 216. In Emmerson v. Marvel, supra, the court said: "As the point in regard to publication of the slanderous words is made on the motion in arrest, we may observe that where the words charged in the complaint are actionable per se, it is not necessary to its sufficiency, as has been shown above, that it should contain an allegation that the words were spoken in the presence of some third person, though such fact would have to be proved on the trial; yet where the words are not actionable per se, and a colloquium, etc., is required to appear in the complaint, such colloquium will necessarily disclose the fact of the publication of the words to third persons."

The Missouri statute (2 Wagn. Stat. 1020, § 43; R. S. 1909, § 1837) provides that "in an action for . . . slander, it shall not be necessary to state in the petition any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to the plaintiff of the defamatory matter . . . but it shall be sufficient to state generally that the same was published or spoken of and concerning the plaintiff," etc. Thereunder it has been held that a petition in an action for slander which contained no allegation that the slanderous words were uttered in the presence of anyone, or that they were understood by those present, was sufficient, these averments being dispensed with under this statute. Atwinger v. Fellner, 46 Mo. 276; Johnson v. Bush, 186 Mo. App. 107, 171 S. W. 636. Both of the foregoing cases, however, are apparently overruled by the decision in the reported case.

Time and Place.

The complaint in an action for slander should allege with exactness the time when and the place where the publication of the alleged slanderous words was made, in the absence of a statute dispensing with such an averment. Shannon v. Spaid, 39 Pa. Co. Ct. 567; Weidman v. Kunsman, 23 Pa. Dist. 336; Mainville v. Belair, 6 Quebec Super. Ct. 331. And see the reported case.

In Weidman v. Kunsman, 23 Pa. Dist. 336, it was held that a statement in a suit for slander which averred that the slanderous words were spoken at a church entertainment held in the county, without mentioning the place, was defective in that respect.

In Mainville v. Belair, 6 Quebec Super. Ct. 331, the declaration stated the name of a person present, but neither the place nor the date where and when the slander charged was published. The court dismissed the action on exception à la forme as being "insuffisamment libellées."

In Dubois v. Robbins, 115 Ill. App. 372, a declaration which did not state fully the time and place of the speaking of the slanderous words, but expressed the time and place by the abbreviation, "on, etc., in, etc.," was held to be good after verdict.

The foregoing rule has apparently been changed in the state of Alabama because of the form prescribed by the code, and hence a count which substantially conforms to the code requirements in that state is sufficient. Penry v. Dozier, 161 Ala. 292, 49 So. 909. In Allen v. Fincher, 187 Ala. 599, 65 So. 946, it was held that the time of the slander alleged in the complaint was sufficiently stated in the counts thereof to meet the requirements of the law, where the counts showed under a videlicet the month in which the slanderous words were spoken, but the blanks in these counts referring to the day of the month in which the alleged slanderous language was used, had not been filled out.

With respect to the Missouri statute (2 Wagn. Stat. 1020, § 43; R. S. 1909, § 1837) set out in the last paragraph of the preceding subdivision it is held in the reported case that this statute does not so far change the common-law rule as to relieve the plaintiff in an action for slander from the necessity of averring when publication was made, or from stating definitely where it was made. In Johnson v. Bush, 186 Mo. App. 107, 171 S. W. 636, it was held that, with respect to a motion to require the petition in an action of slander to be made more definite and certain by stating the place where the slanderous words were spoken, the averment seemed to be sufficient, for it was expressly alleged that the slander was uttered "at the city of St. Louis, Mo.," and the date was given as "on January 6, 1911."

It has been held that a complaint in an action for slander was sufficient though the time of the speaking of the words was in each count laid under a videlicet. Thacher v. Schaeffer, 19 W. N. C. (Pa.) 566. See also Lee v. Crump, 146 Ala. 655, 40 So. 609. Hence the omission of the day, when the time is immaterial, is only a fault in form, and is not a ground for a general demurrer. Burbank v. Horn, 39 Me. 233. Compare, however, Cole v. Babcock, 78 Me. 41, 2 Atl. 545, wherein it was held that the word "about" in a declaration for slander for words alleged to have been uttered "about the first of April, 1884," rendered the allegation of time indefinite and uncertain.

Likewise, where, in the counts of a declaration for slander, the place is stated with a videlicet, it indicates that the party does not undertake to prove the precise place, and its omission is only a fault in form, which is aided on general demurrer. Burbank v. Horn, 39 Me. 233. In that case it was further held that an allegation in all the counts of a declaration for slander that the words were spoken on days named, with a continuo, is not open to the objection that the time is too indefinite to enable the defendant to prepare his defense, the statement of the time being immaterial in actions ex delicto. The court said on that point: "The statement of the time of committing the injuries, ex delicto, is seldom material. It may be proved to have been committed either on a day anterior or subsequent to that stated in the declaration. When, however, the act complained of is single in its nature, as an assault, it would be bad on special demurrer, to state that it was committed on divers days and times."

In Cummins v. Butler, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 190, the declaration alleged that on a certain date, "and at divers other days and times, to wit," etc., the defendant spoke scandalous words of the plaintiff; that mode of declaring was objected to, because the act charged was laid under a continuo. But it was held that the objection could not be sustained as the words were not within the technical meaning of a continuo, but should be treated as surplusage. The court said: "In slander, to show the existence of malice, the plaintiff is permitted, after giving evidence of the words charged in the declaration, to prove the speaking of other distinct actionable words, both before and after the institution of the suit; and from analogy to assault, and on general principle, each of the acts being single in their nature, we should think that the mode of thus declaring, admissible in the one, should not be rejected in the other. We think, however, that the words objected to, as they do not amount to the substituted mode of declaring, much less to a continuo, must be regarded as surplusage."

In Swinney v. Nave, 22 Ind. 178, the court said: "Slandorous words spoken at a given time, including all such spoken at one time, constitute one cause of action. The same or other slanderous words, spoken at another time, constitute another cause of action; . . . and though in a suit for slander, the plaintiff should, according to the spirit of the code, include all causes of action for slander, against the defendant up to the commencement of the suit, yet each cause should be set forth in a separate paragraph, to avoid the vice of duplicity."

PEOPLE

v.

GIBSON.

New York Court of Appeals—April 25, 1916.

218 N. Y. 70; 112 N. E. 730.

Embezzlement — By Executor — Indictment.

An indictment charging that defendant, acting as an executor of a person named, and having in his possession certain moneys belonging to the estate, feloniously withheld and appropriated them to his own use, is sufficient.

Criminal Law — Harmless Error — Admission of Evidence.

Errors in admission of evidence, if technical and not affecting defendant's substantial rights, must be disregarded, under Code Cr. Proc. § 542, requiring judgment on appeal without regard to such errors.

Embezzlement — By Executor — Evidence — Revocation of Letters.

In a prosecution for larceny of estate moneys by the executor, the papers on which his letters were revoked should not have been received over his objection.

Same.

Although in a prosecution for larceny of estate moneys by the executor the papers on which his letters were revoked should not have been received over his objection, the error is harmless, when the judge rules that they shall not be read to the jury without defendant's consent.

Witnesses — Privilege — Demand on Accused for Production of Papers.

There is no error in permitting counsel to demand of defendant, accused of larceny, that he produce papers alleged to be incriminating, where the judge instructed the jury to disregard it and the discussion of its propriety. [See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Since the defendant in a criminal case cannot be compelled to produce incriminating documents, counsel should not demand such production; the failure to produce giving rise to unfavorable inferences.

[See note at end of this case.]

Evidence — Secondary Evidence — Necessity of Demand for Document.

Since the defendant in a criminal prosecution cannot be compelled to testify against himself, or produce incriminating documents, the state may introduce secondary evidence as to the contents of such documents without previous notice to produce the original.

People v. Gibson, 169 N. Y. App. Div. 934, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, First Judicial Department.

Criminal action. Burton W. Gibson convicted in Court of General Sessions of the Peace, New York county, of grand larceny in first degree. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Burton W. Gibson and Charles Goldzier for appellant.

Edward Swann and Robert O. Taylor for respondent.

[72] WILLARD BARTLETT, Ch. J.—The indictment is good. It charges that the defendant, acting as executor of the last will and testament of Ruzena Menschik Szabo, deceased, and having in his possession certain moneys belonging to her estate, feloniously withheld the same, and appropriated the same to his own use. (Penal Law, § 1290, subd. 2.) This is sufficient.

Some errors in the admission of evidence were committed upon the trial, but as they were technical, and did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant, they must be disregarded. (Code Crim. Pro. § 542.) The papers upon which the Surrogate's Court made the order revoking the defendant's letters testamentary should not have been received over the objection of the defendant, but the ruling of the learned trial judge that they should not be read to the jury except with the defendant's consent rendered their admission harmless.

The only question which we deem it necessary to discuss relates to the demand by the district attorney upon the defendant that he should produce a document alleged to have been served upon him. This document was a paper signed by the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Ruzena Menschik Szabo authorizing the bearer to make a demand upon the defendant for all the money and property belonging to the decedent which came into his hands while acting as her executor. When the administrator was on the stand as a witness for the People the assistant district attorney who tried the case called for the production of this paper "under a notice to produce which was served upon counsel for the defendant on the 16th of March, 1914," and asked counsel for the defendant whether he had that paper. The defendant's counsel objected to the question and protested [73] against it, and when asked why, responded: "Because counsel has absolutely no right to address that question either to me or to the defendant; that he is attempting to transgress, and has transgressed, the constitutional rights of the defendant, and I ask in the light of that, that a juror be withdrawn. I protest against the question and I protest further against even its repetition." The court overruled the protest of counsel and said that if he denied the receipt of the notice to produce then the district attorney would have to prove service of it. Counsel for the defendant responded: "I neither deny nor affirm it and I deny the right either of counsel or court even to question in respect to it, and say that it is an infringement of the constitutional rights of this defendant, and upon that ground I protest and object." The assistant district attorney then said that he had the notice to produce with proof of service; whereupon counsel for defendant again objected as follows: "I object to that statement of the district attorney. I ask the court to direct the jury absolutely to disregard it. Will your Honor direct the jury to disregard it?" The court then remarked that the jury had nothing to do with this matter, saying to them: "Gentlemen of the jury, this has nothing to do with the merits of the case at all and you will disregard it."

In view of this direction by the learned trial judge and in view of the fact that there was uncontradicted proof of the service on the defendant of the demand for any property of the estate still in his possession, we think there was no error in this matter which requires a reversal of the judgment. Assuming that the demand upon the defendant for the production of the paper was improper, the only manner in which the court could deal with the impropriety without ending the trial was to instruct the jury to pay no attention to the demand; and this was done. In other words, the error was cured in this particular instance. The practice, however, of calling [74] upon defendants in criminal cases to produce incriminating papers alleged to be in their possession is so frequently adopted by zealous prosecutors and is so objectionable that we take this occasion to express our disapproval thereof.

In McKnight v. U. S. 115 Fed. 972, 54 C. C. A. 358, the defendant was indicted for embezzling the funds of a national bank by causing the bank's money to be paid to persons known by him to be insolvent to be used for purposes of bribery. The government proposed to introduce in evidence a copy of a certain paper whereby the defendant and other aldermen of the city of Louisville agreed to caucus together in order to control legislation and municipal appointments. In the course of the trial, after evidence had been introduced to show that the original paper was last seen in the defendant's possession, the district attorney offered in evidence what purported to be a copy thereof. The trial judge then suggested that if the district attorney chose he could demand the production of the paper, whereupon the district attorney proceeded to demand it. Counsel for the defendant denied the right of the district attorney to make the demand, and furthermore declared that there was no such paper in the defendant's possession. There was a conviction which was reviewed by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit consisting of Circuit Judges Lurton, Day and Severens; and the court in a carefully considered opinion by Day, J., held that it was a violation of the immunity guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution to permit the demand to be made upon a defendant in a criminal case in the presence of the jury to produce a paper containing incriminating evidence against him. This was one of the grounds upon which the judgment of conviction was reversed.

Referring to the leading case of Boyd v. U. S. 116 U. S. 616, 6 S. Ct. 524, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 746, in which it was held that the compulsory production of books and papers in a case seeking a forfeiture [75] of estate was within the reasoning of criminal proceedings, Circuit Judge Day declared that this decision left no room for doubt that the compulsory production of a criminating document by the accused when on trial for crime was compelling him to testify against himself within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. "Nor is it essential to the needs of justice," he added, "that the accused may be thus called upon to produce evidence of a documentary character. The authorities seem very clear that in such a case where a criminating document directly bearing upon the issue to be proven is in the possession of the accused the prosecution may be permitted to show the contents thereof without notice to the defendant to produce it. As it would be beyond the power of the court to require the accused to criminate himself by the production of the paper as evidence against himself, secondary evidence is admissible to show its contents."

To allow a demand for the production of a document to be made upon an accused person in the presence of the jury is to require him to produce it or deny his possession thereof, or by reason of his silence to warrant injurious inferences against him. For this reason the practice is properly forbidden. Where an incriminating document appears prima facie to be in the possession of the accused the prosecution may give secondary evidence of its contents without previous notice calling upon the defendant to produce the original; and this rule is not restricted to papers which are the immediate subject of the indictment. See U. S. v. Doeblir, Baldw. 519, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,977.

We are asked not to follow the decision in the McKnight case because Professor Wigmore in his elaborate work on the Law of Evidence has pronounced the ruling to be "purely fallacious and wholly unsound." 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2273, n. The decision was rendered by a court two members of which subsequently [76] became associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. This court has frequently manifested the high respect which it entertains for the ability and learning of Professor Wigmore: but in the present case we are compelled to differ from him. We approve the rule laid down in McKnight v. U. S. supra, because it seems to us the only effective method of preventing a practice which virtually deprives the defendant in a criminal case of a right guaranteed him by the Constitution. The rule which we thus approve is not available to the defendant in the case at bar because, as has already been pointed out, the learned trial judge directed the jury to disregard the demand which had been made in their presence. This was equivalent to an instruction that the nonproduction of the paper demanded furnished no ground for an inference of guilt. In the McKnight case, however, no such instruction was given.

In the brief for the People the case of Holt v. U. S. 218 U. S. 245, 252, 20 Ann. Cas. 1138, 31 S. Ct. 2, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 1021, is cited as expressive of views inconsistent with the decision in the McKnight case. We find no inconsistency. A question arose as to whether a blouse belonged to the prisoner and testimony was given to the effect that the prisoner put it on and it fitted him. It was objected that he did this under duress and was thus compelled to give evidence against himself; but the court held that "the prohibition of compelling a man in a criminal court to be a witness against himself is a prohibition of the use of physical or moral compulsion to extort communications from him, not an exclusion of his body as evidence when it may be material." It can hardly have been supposed that this language of Mr. Justice Holmes was regarded as at variance with any of the views expressed in the McKnight case; inasmuch as the opinion was concurred in by Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lurton, both of whom had then become members of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is because we deem the demand upon a defendant to produce [77] alleged incriminating evidence in his possession to be precisely such moral compulsion as Mr. Justice Holmes mentions in the Holt case that we condemn the practice.

The judgment of conviction should be affirmed.

Hiscock, Collin, Cuddeback, Hogan and Pound, JJ., concur; Seabury, J., concurs in result.

Judgment of conviction affirmed.

Motion for reargument denied June 13, 1916.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that it is improper on the trial of a criminal case for the prosecuting attorney to call on the accused to produce a document in his possession. Such a demand, the court holds, amounts to a violation of the privilege against self-incrimination, since an inference adverse to the accused may be drawn by the jury from a refusal to produce the document. If a document is in the possession of the accused the prosecution may, it is said, prove its contents by secondary evidence without giving notice to produce it. The cases passing on the question whether a demand on the accused in the presence of the jury to produce incriminating evidence is a violation of his constitutional privilege are reviewed in the note to Gillespie v. State, Ann. Cas. 1912D 259.

v.

VILLAGE OF CHESANING.

Michigan Supreme Court—September 28, 1915.

188 Mich. 17; 154 N. W. 34.

Payment — Payment to Secure License — Right to Recover Back.

Where a village council refused to issue licenses until the applicants had paid a certain sum to the village treasury under an invalid ordinance, and the applicant, without seeking redress in the courts, made the payment to protect the value of his property, there was no duress, and the payments cannot be recovered.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Circuit Court, Saginaw county: GAGE, Judge.

Action by Thad D. Baldwin, plaintiff, against Village of Chesaning, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

A. Elwood Snow for plaintiff in error.

Charles W. Cheeney and R. L. Crane for defendant in error.

[18] MOORE, J.—The plaintiff is a resident of the village of Chesaning, and has been for 34 years. He was engaged as a saloon keeper in partnership with one Sutter. Their license expired May 1, 1912.

On November 10, 1911, the plaintiff bought the Hotel Central property in the village, consisting of a hotel, barber shop, barroom, and livery, on contract, and agreed to pay therefor the sum of $12,000. On March 6, 1912, the defendant village adopted an ordinance requiring all saloon keepers in said village to pay a license fee of $500. We quote from the brief of appellant:

"In April, 1912, the plaintiff made application for a license to conduct a saloon in his said hotel, and filed his application and bond therefor with the village council. On the evening of April 8, 1912, and before the village council met to pass upon the liquor applications, said meeting night being fixed by statute, the plaintiff was approached by a Mr. Thompson, one of the members of the defendant village council, who said to the plaintiff: 'You had better get busy and pay in your money. If you don't get your money up to the council meeting tonight, you won't get any application; they won't accept your application at all.' The plaintiff was further told at that time by Mr. Thompson that if he waited until May 1st to pay he would not get a license. Mr. Thompson said he had been authorized to say those things by the council and the village attorney. . . .

[19] "After the above conversation the plaintiff paid the sum of $500 into the village treasury to obtain such village license in accordance with the village ordinance. The village council met that same night and approved of the plaintiff's application and bond. . . .

"In April, 1913, the plaintiff again made application to said defendant village for a license to conduct a saloon in his said hotel, and filed his application and bond therefor with the village council.

"On the night before the village council met to pass upon liquor applications the president of said defendant village called upon the plaintiff and said: 'Boys, there is no question of a doubt but what you have got to put up your money. The way I feel in regard to it, I am opposed to it. I don't want to see you put up your money, but the council has instructed me to come and tell you you have got to put it up or you won't have any application for license due this next year.'

"At about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of the day the council met the village treasurer called upon the plaintiff and said: 'Baldwin, this is your last chance. You have either got to put up your money or the boys won't act upon your application. I have been authorized by them to come down and tell you.' . . .

"After the above conversations the plaintiff paid the sum of $500 into the village treasury to obtain such village license in accordance with the village ordinance. The village council met that same night and approved of the plaintiff's application and bond."

It is the claim of the plaintiff that the hotel property was worth the sum of $12,000, and that, if the liquor license was refused the hotel, the property would not be worth to exceed the sum of $5,000, and that to avoid this depreciation in the value of the property the money was paid, and that the action of the council amounted to duress. The circuit judge thought otherwise, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The case is brought here by writ of error.

It was conceded in the court below and is conceded here that the village ordinance was void, so that the only question is: Were the payments of $500 each [20] of the two years made voluntarily? The defendant insists they were, while plaintiff insists that under the situation disclosed by the record the village subjected him to duress. Whether valid or not, the village had an ordinance requiring the fees which plaintiff paid as a condition of doing business. It is fair to assume that counsel for appellant in their statement of facts will call attention to the strongest proof in favor of their clients, and an examination of the record shows they have done so. There is nothing in the record to indicate that the tax was paid under protest, and it may safely be assumed that, if the council failed to approve of the bond and application of the plaintiff for a license when he was legally entitled to it, the courts would grant him relief upon proper application. He did not appeal to the court. As before stated, he paid the fee without protest, and it was not until after he had sold the property that he brings this suit.

The question of duress has been before this court in Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569 (8 N. W. 511), and Knight v. Brown, 137 Mich. 396 (100 N. W. 602), and is there defined. The instant case does not come within the definition. We think the case is governed by Betts v. Village of Reading, 93 Mich. 77 (62 N. W. 940), and the cases cited therein. See also Eslow v. City of Albion, 153 Mich. 720 (117 N. W. 328, 22 L.R.A.[N.S.] 872.)

Judgment is affirmed.

Stone, Ostrander, and Steere, JJ., concurred with Moore, J.

This case was assigned to the late Justice McAlvay.

McAlvay, J. (dissenting).—Plaintiff brought suit against defendant in an action of assumpsit to recover the sum of $1,000 claimed to have been paid by him to [21] the said defendant involuntarily and under duress. A trial had before the court with a jury resulted in a verdict directed by the court in favor of the defendant and against plaintiff. Upon this verdict a judgment was duly entered. Plaintiff has removed the case to this court for review, assigning errors upon the action of the court in directing a verdict against him.

Plaintiff had been a resident of defendant village for over 30 years, and from May, 1911, up to May 1, 1912, was engaged in business in said village as a retail liquor dealer, in partnership with a man named Sutter. In November, 1911, he purchased upon contract, for the sum of $12,000, "the Hotel Central property," in said village, consisting of the hotel, barber shop, barroom, and livery. Defendant village is incorporated under the laws of this State, and as such exercises all the rights and privileges of incorporated villages and the power and authority to grant applications and approve the bonds of those intending to enter into the business of selling intoxicating liquors at retail within said village, as provided by the statutes of this State.

On March 6, 1912, defendant village adopted an ordinance entitled "An ordinance relative to saloons and saloon keepers," requiring every person desiring to keep a saloon within the village before entering upon such business to apply for and procure a license and to pay the sum of $500 into the village treasury.

Plaintiff, intending to enter into the business of retail dealer in said village from and after May 1, 1912, in April of that year filed his application and bond therefor, as provided by the statute, with the village council for its approval, to conduct a saloon in his said hotel. On the evening of April 8, 1912, the date fixed by law for the village council to meet and pass upon liquor dealers' applications and bonds, and before such meeting, plaintiff was approached by Mr. Thompson, [22] one of the members of the village council, who said he had been authorized by said council to say to him that he could not get out of it; that it would be $500 more this year than last; that if he did not get his money up to the council meeting that night his application would not be granted; that if he waited until May 1st he would not get a license. Plaintiff, on this threat, paid $500 into the village treasury, and received the treasurer's certificate therefor, which was submitted to the council, with his application and bond for a State license, at the council meeting that evening.

The record of the council proceedings shows that all applications and bonds accompanied by the village treasurer's certificate of $500 were approved unanimously by the council, and the application and bond of one person which were not accompanied by the treasurer's certificate for $500 were rejected for that reason. Afterwards plaintiff paid to the county treasurer $500, as required, to carry on the business of a retail liquor dealer for the ensuing year, and received his tax receipt therefor, and entered upon and conducted such business during that year at his hotel.

In April, 1913, plaintiff, desiring to continue such business at the same place, again made application to defendant village council, and filed his application and bond to carry on business as a retail liquor dealer in said village for granting and approval. At this time Dr. Elliot was president of the village. Plaintiff had several conversations with him, the last one on the day fixed by law for the approval of applications and bonds of liquor dealers by the village council, in which the president said to him that he must put up the $500; that the council had instructed him to come and tell plaintiff that he must pay the money or he would not have any application for a license approved that year. Later, on the same day, plaintiff having delayed until 5 o'clock in the evening without making this payment, [23] Mr. Slack, village treasurer, came to him and told him that he must put up the money or the council would not act on his application; also that he was authorized by them to come and tell him. Plaintiff then paid the money. Other witnesses testified as to these demands made upon the plaintiff by members of the council and officers of the defendant village both in 1912 and 1913. Plaintiff at this time owed a large amount upon this hotel property, for which he had agreed to pay $12,000, and further testified that the action of the village in demanding this extra license money crippled him in his business.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff is undisputed. Defendant village offered no testimony in the case; the verdict in favor of defendant having been directed on motion made in its behalf at the close of plaintiff's case. Upon the trial of the case it was conceded by the defendant village that the ordinance was invalid, and that it had no authority or power to pass it. The contention on the part of the defendant upon the trial was that these payments by plaintiff were voluntary, and therefore he was not entitled to recover.

The only question for the court to consider in this case is whether these payments so admitted to have been made by the plaintiff to the defendant village were voluntary or involuntary. In considering this question we are required to apply the rule so often invoked, in cases where a verdict has been directed, to give the evidence in the case on the part of the appellant its strongest probative force in his favor.

The court and counsel for defendant have relied upon the case of Betts v. Reading, 93 Mich. 77, 52 N. W. 940, and it is insisted that this case is controlling of the case at bar. If the instant case cannot be distinguished from the Betts Case, such contention must be conceded.

In the case we are considering the situation was [24] somewhat peculiar. The common council of defendant village, by the provisions of the general liquor law of this State, was the only body with authority and power to pass upon and approve the applications and bonds of all persons who desired to enter into the business of selling intoxicating liquors at retail within the village of Chesaning. They had passed this ordinance for the purpose of obtaining from every such applicant the sum of $500 to be covered into its treasury for municipal uses, and they have succeeded. Upon each of the instances when these payments were made by plaintiff to defendant upon the day fixed by law when the council was required to act upon saloon applications and liquor bonds, members of the council authorized by it came to plaintiff and made these demands for $500 to be paid to the village, coupled with the threat that, if such sum was not paid forthwith, plaintiff's application and bond would not be approved. On the last of these occasions the performance of this duty was delegated to the president and treasurer of the village. The authority of these members of the council and officers of the village government to make these demands and threats is not only undisputed, but the ratification of their acts and threats and the adoption of what they did in the premises clearly appears from the records of the respective meetings of the common council read into the record in this case. It cannot be said in this case that this was not the act of the village council. When these applications and dealer's bonds were before the council for consideration, it appeared that the application and bond of plaintiff were accompanied by the receipt and certificate of the village treasurer and were approved, because it appeared that the $500 extra had been paid. It further appeared that the application of another person was rejected because it was not accompanied by the treasurer's receipt and certificate for $500. In this [25] respect it is apparent that the instant case is distinguishable from the Betts Case, where the court said that none of the officers of the village made any threats of prosecution, and there was only random talk by the village attorney; nor in the Betts Case does it appear that threats were made by village officers and their acts ratified by the village council, which was in a position to cripple a man in his business by refusing to approve his application and bond as a retail liquor dealer.

On examination of all of the cases which have been before this court relative to payments of this character to municipal officers, there is no one of them where the facts are similar to those in the instant case. The only thing in common between these cases and the case at bar is that a municipality has unlawfully taken money from a saloon keeper and been allowed to retain it.

It is apparent from the record that the only alternative plaintiff had when this illegal demand was made by members of the council of defendant village was to make the payment, or discontinue business. Such being the case, can it be said that the payments were made voluntarily? These payments made by plaintiff are admittedly illegal exactions, and it is apparent that they were made under apprehension of not being allowed to go on in his business if they were not paid. This being so, the case would come within that class where payments made to prevent apprehended injury to business are held to be involuntary and made under duress. This principle has been recognized by the Federal and several of our best State Supreme Courts.

The case of Swift, etc. Co. v. U. S. 111 U. S. 22, 4 S. Ct. 244, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 341, is cited in American Brewing Co. v. St. Louis, 187

Mo. 367, 86 S. W. 129, 2 Ann. Cas. 821, and note, in support of the proposition that payments coerced under duress or compulsion, [26] though not made in ignorance of the facts, may be recovered. Within this rule are payments of illegal charges or exactions under apprehension on the part of the payers of being injured in their business if the money is not paid. In the reported case cited supra, the supreme court of Missouri said:

"It is . . . well settled that payments coerced under duress or compulsion may be recovered. What constitutes duress has been the subject of much discussion. The general rule was first laid down that: 'A payment is not to be regarded as compulsory unless made to emancipate the person or property from an actual and existing duress imposed upon it by the party to whom the money is paid, or to prevent a seizure by a party armed with apparent authority to seize the property. The courts, however, have shown a tendency in the later decisions to extend the doctrine of the earlier common law with regard to compulsory payment, and at the present time, beyond a few . . . principles, they do not attempt to lay down any definite and exact rule of universal application by which to determine whether a payment is voluntary or compulsory.' 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) p. 613, and cases cited.

"Among the instances of the relaxation of the strictness of the original rule is the case of payments constrained by business exigencies; that is, payments of illegal charges or exactions under apprehension on the part of the payers of being stopped in their business if the money is not paid."

This view of the case was recognized by the trial court, when it said:

"There are courts in this country that hold that a payment made in the manner in which this one was made by the plaintiff in this case is a payment by compulsion."

We find that the supreme courts of the States of Massachusetts, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri, and other States, have so held. The learned trial judge gave as a reason for not so holding that, in his opinion, there was no evidence to show that the council, as a council, [27] did act. As we have already stated, the record shows without dispute that this was the action of the defendant village of Chesaning. It further shows that it received the money into its treasury without consideration. In our opinion, these payments made under these circumstances were not voluntary payments, and assumpsit will lie to recover the amounts unlawfully paid. Plaintiff was not, as is intimated in the brief of defendant, seeking to recover for damage to his business. He asks simply the return of his money, which defendant village has received unlawfully and without consideration.

The court was in error in directing a verdict against him.

The facts in this case are undisputed. We hold that these payments were involuntary payments. There is no defense which can be interposed to defeat plaintiff's claim.

Therefore the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Brooke, C. J., and Kuhn and Bird, JJ. The foregoing opinion was prepared by the late Justice McAlvay. We are satisfied with his conclusions.

NOTE.

Payment to Prevent Apprehended Injury to Business as Payment under Duress.

Introductory, 516.

Payment Exacted by Private Person, 516.

Payment Exacted by Public Official:

In General, 519.

Introductory.

This note reviews the recent cases passing on the question whether a payment made to prevent an apprehended injury to business, constitutes a payment under duress. For a discussion of the earlier cases see the note to American Brewing Co. v. St. Louis, 2 Ann. Cas. 821, and also the note to New Orleans, etc. R. Co. v. Louisiana Constr. etc. Co. 94 Am. St. Rep. 395, wherein the subject of recovery of payments is discussed generally.

Payment Exacted by Private Person.

The actual or threatened exercise of power possessed or believed to be possessed by a private person, over the person or property of another who is thereby rendered apprehensive of injury to his business interests, and has no other means of immediate relief than by making a demanded payment, will ordinarily render the payment involuntary. Rowland v. Watson, 4 Cal. App. 476, 88 Pac. 495; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Matthews v. Williams Brewing Co. 26 Misc. 46, 25 N. Y. S. 241; Kamenitsky v. Corcoran, 97 Misc. 384, 161 N. Y. S. 756; Newland v. Buncombe Turnpike Co. 26 N. C. 372; Redford v. Weller, 27 S. D. 334, 131 N. W. 296. See also Rees v. Schmits, 164 Ill. App. 250; Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569, 8 N. W. 511.

Where such duress is exerted under circumstances sufficient to influence the apprehensions and conduct of a prudent business man, payment of money wrongfully induced thereby ought not to be regarded as voluntary. Burke v. Gould, 105 Cal. 277, 38 Pac. 733.

"Moral duress consists in imposition, oppression, undue influence, or the taking of undue advantage of the business or financial stress or extreme necessities or weakness of another; the theory under which relief is granted being that the party profiting thereby has received money, property or other advantage, which in equity and good conscience he ought not to be permitted to retain." Rees v. Schmits, 164 Ill. App. 250.

In Kamenitsky v. Corcoran, 97 Misc. 384, 161 N. Y. S. 756, the complainant alleged that he was duly licensed by the city to maintain a news stand on the corner where the defendant's saloon was situated, but wholly on the property of the city. Thereafter the defendant unlawfully demanded rent for the place, threatening to have his license taken away and oust the plaintiff, with which demand the latter complied in order to prevent apprehended injury to his business. The plaintiff continued to pay rent for a period of about six years and then sued to recover the money paid as having been paid under duress. The court in reversing a judgment on the pleading for the defendant said: "The defendant contends that if we strip the complaint of its conclusions of law, there are no allegations of fact which show that the plaintiff has paid any money under the compulsion of threats of any unlawful acts on the part of the defendant. The complaint does, however, contain the following allegations: 1. That the defendant demanded of plaintiff the sum of fifteen dollars a month for the privilege of maintaining a news stand outside of his place of business. 2. The news stand was not situated on defendant's land, but was situated on the property of the city and the plaintiff was duly licensed by the city to maintain the news stand. From these allegations it seems a necessary conclusion that the plaintiff already had the privilege of maintaining his news stand and the defendant could not grant or withhold such a privilege and of course could not properly demand or receive money for a privilege he could neither grant nor withhold. Nevertheless, even though the defendant could not properly demand payment for a privilege he could not confer, yet if the plaintiff complied voluntarily with this demand he cannot recover the money paid in this action. The plaintiff is not complaining that he made a foolish bargain but is urging, in effect, that he made no bargain at all but that the defendant put him, by threats, in such fear that he felt compelled to make these payments in order to keep the defendant from wrongfully doing his property even greater harm. Upon this element the claimant alleges: 1. That the defendant threatened that if the said sum was not paid he would cause the license of the plaintiff herein to be taken away and would cause him to be ousted from the said location. 2. That under duress of the aforesaid threat and in apprehension of injury to the plaintiff's business, the plaintiff regularly paid the sum of fifteen dollars per month. The allegation of the threat is of course an allegation of fact and not a conclusion of law and the allegation that the money was paid under duress of this threat is, I think, clearly an allegation of an ultimate fact and also not a conclusion of law. The only real question, therefore, in the case would seem to be, whether money paid under fear of a threat to cause the plaintiff's license to be taken away and to cause his news stand to be ousted from its location is money paid under legal duress. The defendant seems to maintain that, inasmuch as he is not a public officer and has no power to take away the plaintiff's license or to oust him from his location, there could be no duress. Duress, however, may be exercised by threats as well as by force and if the defendant represented that he had the power—legally or illegally—to take away the plaintiff's license and the plaintiff believed that he could make his threat good, then of course it becomes immaterial that defendant did not possess such power. It is true that the complaint does not expressly allege either that the defendant claimed such power or that the plaintiff believed such claim, but I think that such a claim can well be implied from the making of the threat and that the allegation that the plaintiff acted 'in apprehension of injury to his business' shows that he believed that the threat could be made good. It seems to me, therefore, quite clear that the complaint sets forth a good cause of action for money paid under duress if the threat is one which the defendant had no right to make. Our courts have held that a threat to appeal to the courts or to use the process of the courts even for a malicious and wrongful purpose cannot constitute duress and the defendant seems to rely largely on these cases. In the present case, however, the threat was not to appeal to the courts to use their process against the plaintiff. It was not a threat to bring the plaintiff into a tribunal where his legal rights could be tested but on the contrary was a threat to do the plaintiff an injury without any legal right so to do on defendant's part and without opportunity for plaintiff to receive an impartial hearing."

So in Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, wherein it appeared that a labor organization threatened the plaintiff, who was an employer of labor, with taking away a number of his working people and deterring others from entering his employ unless he paid them a sum of money, it was held that the payment when made by the plaintiff, who was reasonably apprehensive of an injury to his business, was made under duress.

In Niland v. Buncombe Turnpike Co. 26 N. C. 372, a payment by the plaintiff, who had contracted to carry the public mail, of tolls illegally exacted by the defendant turnpike company, which threatened to close the gates against the plaintiff unless he paid the tolls, was held to have been made under duress.

To recover money paid under fear of an injury to business it must appear that the money received ought not in equity and good conscience to be retained. If the money was rightfully due, the fact that the elements of protest and duress were present when it was paid gives no right to recover it back. Koenig v. People's Gas Light, etc. Co. 153 Ill. App. 432.

In Matthews v. Williams Brewing Co. 26 Misc. 46, 55 N. Y. S. 241, it appeared that the defendant contracted with the plaintiff to supply the latter all the beer required by him for one year at a stated price per barrel. Prior to the expiration of the time the defendant refused to deliver any more beer unless he was paid a dollar per barrel in addition to the contract price, to cover a revenue tax which had been enacted since the parties entered into the contract. The plaintiff fearing that his business might suffer if he failed to comply with this demand, paid it each time under protest and brought an action to recover the total so paid. In dismissing the complaint, it was held that the business necessities of the plaintiff did not warrant his paying the overcharge and that the fact that he protested did not alter the voluntary character of such payments, the court saying that the plaintiff had the right to insist on the performance of the contract, and on the defendant's refusal to perform, had his action at law to recover damages for the breach, and if he chose to pay the illegal demand the payment was not under duress.

In Rowland v. Watson, 4 Cal. App. 476, 88 Pac. 495, it appeared that the plaintiff paid a sum far in excess of what was due from him to the defendant who knew of plaintiff's distress and who declined to release his lien unless he was paid the excessive amount demanded. A failure to pay would have forced the plaintiff into bankruptcy. It was held that the payment could be recovered back. To the same effect see Redford v. Weller, 27 S. D. 334, 131 N. W. 296. See also Joannin v. Ogilvie, 49 Minn. 564, 52 N. W. 217, 32 Am. St. Rep. 581, 16 L.R.A. 376.

But in Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569, 8 N. W. 511, wherein it appeared that a debtor who had knowledge of his creditor's financial embarrassment refused to pay on demand a debt already due except on condition that the creditor should accept a lesser sum, which the latter believed he must accept in order to avoid his financial ruin, it was held that there was no duress, the court saying: "In what did the alleged duress consist in the present case? Merely in this: that the debtors refused to pay on demand a debt already due, though the plaintiff was in great need of the money and might be financially ruined in case he failed to obtain it. It is not pretended that Hackley & McGordon had done anything to bring Headley to the condition which made this money so important to him at this very time, or that they were in any manner responsible for his pecuniary embarrassment except as they failed to pay this demand. The duress, then, is to be found exclusively in their failure to meet promptly their pecuniary obligation. But this, according to the plaintiff's claim, would have constituted no duress whatever if he had not happened to be in pecuniary straits; and the validity of negotiations, according to this claim, must be determined, not by the defendants' conduct, but by the plaintiff's necessities. The same contract which would be valid if made with a man easy in his circumstances, becomes invalid when the contracting party is pressed with the necessity of immediately meeting his bank paper. But this would be a most dangerous, as well as a most unequal doctrine; and if accepted, no one could well know when he would be safe in dealing on the ordinary terms of negotiation with a party who professed to be in great need."

In Brown v. Worthington, 162 Mo. App. 508, 142 S. W. 1082, it appeared that the plaintiff was given an option to buy a quantity of hogs at a stipulated price. Before the time within which he might exercise the option expired, the plaintiff entered into a contract with a third person for the resale of the hogs in question, after which the plaintiff tendered the amount agreed on, which the defendant declined to accept and demanded $1500 in excess of the agreed price. Owing to the urgent necessities of the situation the plaintiff, in order to be able to fulfil his contract with the third party, paid the excessive demand, and sued for such excess on the ground that he paid same under duress and coercion. The court in deciding that whether he was coerced by business necessity to pay the money was a question for the jury, said: "It is argued plaintiff is not entitled to recover and the court should have directed a verdict for defendant because the $1500 must be regarded as having been voluntarily paid to defendant, but we are not so persuaded. The strictness of the common-law rule touching the matter of duress has been much relaxed in the development of the law. Originally 'duress' meant only duress of the person, and nothing short of such duress, amounting to a reasonable apprehension of imminent danger to life, limb or liberty, was sufficient to enable the party to recover back the money paid. Subsequently, in keeping with the principles of equity and good morals, the doctrine was extended so as to recognize duress of property as a sort of moral duress, which might, equally with the duress of the person, entitle the party to recover back money paid under its influence. While this view prevailed, some of the cases asserted the doctrine that, unless it appeared the money was paid to release the person or property of the payer from detention or to prevent a seizure of either by one having apparent authority in that behalf, a recovery was not to be allowed. But though such were the former rules of decision, the modern authorities go farther and generally declare that such pressure or constraint as compels a man to go against his will virtually takes away his free agency and destroys the power of refusing to comply with the unlawful demand of another constitutes duress, irrespective of the manifestation or apprehension of force. Under this view, it is said the real and ultimate fact to be determined in every case is whether or not the party paying the money really had a choice, that is, whether he had his freedom of exercising his will. Numerous authorities declare that if one is compelled by business necessity to surrender to the constraint involved in the unlawful demand and make the payment, moral duress appears. In other words, in such circumstances, it may be found as a fact that the party paying has not had his freedom of exercising his will and paid the money under moral duress, in which event, if it is against equity and good conscience for the money to be withheld from plaintiff, it may be recovered. Such is the undoubted rule of decision in this state. . . . Here it appears plaintiff was obligated under a written contract to deliver 1000 head of the hogs on Chesley Island to McPherson and that McPherson came from Omaha to St. Louis to receive them on the very day the $1500 was so unlawfully exacted. Plaintiff parleyed with defendant over the matter and the only alternative to paying the money was to breach his contract with McPherson. Certainly such constitutes not only a business necessity but an urgent one, which tends to show that plaintiff did not have the free exercise of his will in the matter. Furthermore, the precepts of equity and good conscience suggest that money so obtained is wrongfully withheld from and should be returned to plaintiff. But though such be true, plaintiff's first instruction is erroneous, in that it omitted to submit the question as to whether or not he had the free exercise of his will or was constrained by the business necessity revealed to pay the money, that is, give the check and execute his note to defendant. This instruction hypothesizes the facts of the case very well, but it seems to assume as a matter of law that if those facts were found to be true, then moral duress appeared. Such is not true unless the jury believed those facts and circumstances cast a restraint upon plaintiff sufficient to overcome the will of a person of ordinary firmness so as to destroy his free moral agency."

Payment Exacted by Public Official.

IN GENERAL.

Payment made to a public official to secure a right essential to the conduct of a business or to prevent an injury to business to which the party paying is entitled without payment but which right is withheld until the payment is made, is generally held to be involuntary and the money may be recovered back. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320, 29 S. Ct. 671, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 1013; Garrison v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 404; Lewis v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. App. 112, 82 Pac. 1106; Seattle Brewing, etc. Co. v. Campbell, 17 Hawaii 364; LaSalle County v. Simmons, 5 Gilman (Ill.) 518; Chase v. Dwinal, 7 Greenl. (Me.) 134, 20 Am. Dec. 352; American Exch. F. Ins. Co. v. Britton, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 148.

Thus the payment of money to the collector of customs of a port which was exacted by that official under an invalid order of the secretary of commerce and labor and was paid under protest, the defendant being coerced by the certainty that if it did not pay, clearance to its vessels would be refused which would entail serious pecuniary loss, is a payment under duress and may be recovered back. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320, 29 S. Ct. 671, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 1013.

Persons dealing with public officers, their deputies and agents do not stand on equal ground with them. American, etc. Co. v. Britton, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 148, wherein it appeared that the defendants who had examined the plaintiffs' books by order of the comptroller, threatened to telegraph to that official asking him to stop the issuing of a certificate requisite to the conduct of the business unless the plaintiffs paid an amount unlawfully demanded. Payment under those circumstances was held to be under duress.

In LaSalle County v. Simmons, 5 Gilman (Ill.) 518, it appeared that the county commissioners were authorized to grant licenses for ferries and to impose an annual tax of one hundred dollars on each ferry. The plaintiff was engaged in the ferry business and was an applicant for a license to continue the same; but the commissioners served notice that no license would be issued except to the person who would donate the largest sum of money to the county, and accordingly put the privilege up at auction. After competitive bidding the plaintiff bid five hundred dollars which he paid to the county. In an action therefor it was held that the payment was under duress and might be recovered back, the court saying that "The illegal conduct of the commissioners put the plaintiff in their power; and taking advantage of his peculiar situation, they obtained money from him to which the county had not the shadow of right. The money was unlawfully and wrongfully obtained, and cannot in equity and good conscience be retained by the county. The fact that the commissioners chose to call it a donation does not change the real character of the transaction. It was merely a device to obtain money which the county had not the slightest right to demand. The money was exacted from the plaintiff under circumstances that strip the transaction of all the features of a voluntary payment. It was in law and fact a compulsory payment, as much so as the payment of usurious interest, which the lender exacts from the borrower; or the payment of illegal charges, which an officer demands as the condition of the performance of official services."

The payment by executors of an estate of illegal fees demanded by the county clerk who refused to file their inventory and appraisal except on such payment has been held to be under duress where a failure to file would have rendered the executors liable to removal from office, though they could have compelled the clerk by a writ of mandate to file the same without paying the fees demanded. Lewis v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. App. 112, 82 Pac. 1106. And so money demanded as a condition for liberating a raft of lumber, detained in order to exact illegal tolls, is a compulsory payment. Chase v. Dwinal, 7 Greenl. (Me.) 134, 20 Am. Dec. 352.

The reported case seems to take issue with the doctrine laid down in the foregoing cases. But see the dissenting opinion. See also in accord with the reported case Betts v. Reading, 93 Mich. 77, 52 N. W. 940; Americus First Nat. Bank v. Americus, 68 Ga. 119, 45 Am. Rep. 476.

Where a contractor employing convict labor under an agreement with the board of prison managers failed to pay for such labor, and was informed that on his further default he could not have the men, a payment thereupon made was held not to have been made under duress. F. H. Mills Co. v. State, 110 App. Div. 843, 97 N. Y. S. 676, affirmed in 187 N. Y. 552, 80 N. E. 1109.

A person who takes out a license on the mere statement of a police officer that the business cannot be conducted without one, cannot recover back the license fee though the licensing ordinance is void. Conley v. Buffalo, 65 Misc. 100, 119 N. Y. S. 87. See also Levy v. Kansas City, 168 Fed. 524, 93 C. C. A. 523, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 862.

EXCESSIVE AMOUNT.

The exaction by a municipal officer of a fee of $750 for a license, when the charter limited the fee to $300, the licensee paying the excessive fee because he had already rented the premises, prepared to do business and paid for a state license, has been held to constitute duress. Bruner v. Clay City, 100 Ky. 567, 38 S. W. 1062.

Where a city exacted from a property owner water rents accruing before he became the owner, under threats that unless paid the water would be shut off, it was held that the excessive payment could be recovered back. Chicago v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 218 Ill. 40, 75 N. E. 803, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 770, wherein it was said: "Appellant and appellee did not stand upon the same footing, as appellant had the power and means to deprive appellee of its water supply, and had threatened to exercise this power, and had in some instances actually shut off the water. The various pieces of property were occupied as residences and stores, which required water, and to shut the water off from them would entail great damage to appellee, as it had no other means of supplying them. The bills were not contracted by appellee, and it was under no more obligation to pay them than it was to pay any other bills of any other person. The back tax was not a lien upon the premises, and appellee had in no way, as required by law, promised to pay the same. It is the well-settled rule of this state that where one is compelled to make payment of money which the party demanding has no legal right to receive, in order to prevent injury to his person, business or property, such payment is, in law, made under duress and may be recovered from the party receiving it; and it makes no difference that the payment was made with full knowledge of all the facts, provided it was made under duress. Appellee, at the time of payment, expressly stated that it was made under protest and to avoid trouble and damage to its property. The payment was illegally exacted and appellee had a right to recover in an action of assumpsit."

In Doolittle v. Luzerne County, 6 Kulp (Pa.) 495, payment of an excessive fee for a license, made in order to avoid a revocation of the license, was held to be involuntary though the licensee could have had relief by mandamus. And to the same effect see Hazleton v. McGroarty, 6 Kulp (Pa.) 533.

In Gentry v. Lincoln, 146 Ill. App. 60, it appeared that the plaintiffs who were the owners of a dog and pony show arranged to hold the show in the defendant city; and consulted the mayor as to the amount of the fee to be paid under an ordinance of the city providing for different fees depending on the nature of the animals and the manner of exhibition. It appeared from the evidence that the mayor advised the plaintiffs to pay the ten-dollar fee as being the fee required by the ordinance for their show, which the plaintiffs paid, but refused to furnish the mayor and city clerk the number of complimentary tickets suggested by them. Afterward the chief of police at the mayor's suggestion refused to allow the plaintiffs to start their parade or hold their show unless they paid a fee of fifty dollars required under the said ordinance for the exhibition of a circus and menagerie combined, which the plaintiffs were compelled to pay in order to prevent further delay and loss. In an action against the city to recover the forty dollars it was held that the payment was compulsory and could be recovered back.

BOLLAND

v.

UNITED STATES.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Fourth Circuit—July 6, 1916.

238 Fed. 520.

Army and Navy — Receiving Public Property in Pledge from Soldier.

On the trial of a defendant for knowingly receiving in pledge from a soldier an automatic pistol, the property of the United States, in violation of Pen. Code, § 35 (Act March 4, 1909, c. 321, 35 Stat. 1095 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 414]), the confession of the defendant that he received the pistol in pledge from a soldier was sufficiently corroborated to justify the submission of the case to the jury by evidence showing that the pistol was issued to a soldier, and that it was found in the possession of defendant, whose place of business was very near the reservation on which such soldier was stationed.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Evidence that the pistol was found in defendant's possession was sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty under Rev. St. §§ 1242 and 3748 (7 Fed. St. Ann. 1017; 6 Fed. St. Ann. 711), which make such possession by one not an officer or soldier of the United States prima facie evidence that it was obtained in violation of the statute.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Evidence offered by defendant to show that the pistol had been charged to the soldier is properly excluded, where the evidence does not show that he was the owner at the time it was pledged, but that the charge was made after its loss was known.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to United States District Court, Eastern District of South Carolina, at Florence: SMITH, Judge.

Criminal action. J. W. Bolland convicted of violation of section 35 of Federal Penal Code of 1910 and brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Geo. F. von Kolnitz, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Francis H. Weston and J. Waties Waring for defendant in error.

Sitting: PRITCHARD and KNAPP, Circuit Judges, and JOHNSON, District Judge.

[529] PRITCHARD, J.—This is a criminal action instituted in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of South Carolina. The defendant was tried for a violation of section 35 of the federal Penal Code of 1910. The portion that relates to this case is in the following language:

" . . . And whoever shall knowingly purchase or receive in pledge for any obligation or indebtedness from any soldier, officer, sailor, or other person [530] called into or employed in the military or naval service, any arms, equipments, ammunition, clothes, military stores, or other public property, whether furnished to the soldier, sailor, officer, or person, under a clothing allowance or otherwise, such soldier, sailor, officer, or other person, not having the lawful right to pledge or sell the same, shall be fined not more than five hundred dollars, and imprisoned for not more than two years." (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 414.)

The indictment charged the defendant with knowingly receiving in pledge from a soldier certain property of the United States, to wit, a certain Colt automatic pistol.

The witness for the government testified that the pistol in question was found in the store of the defendant, which is a small grocery store on Sullivan's Island, S. C., near the government reservation; that the pistol was government property; and that the defendant confessed to receiving the same in pledge from a soldier. It was sought to be proven by one of the witnesses that the pistol, when its loss was discovered, had been charged to and paid for the soldier to whom it was issued. The court excluded this testimony, to which defendant excepted. The defendant offered no further evidence, but moved the court to direct a verdict of not guilty on the ground that the corpus delicti had not been established by evidence independent of the extrajudicial confession of the accused. The court below overruled this motion upon the ground that there were circumstances corroborative of the confession made by defendant, and that therefore the same should be submitted to the jury for its consideration, to which defendant excepted. The jury found the defendant guilty, and upon which judgment was entered. The case comes here on writ of error.

The first assignment of error is to the effect that the presiding judge erred in overruling and refusing a motion of defendant for the direction of a verdict of not guilty at the close of the government's evidence. This motion was based upon the contention that the corpus delicti of the crime had not been established by evidence independent of the confession of the accused. We think that this assignment is without merit for the following reasons: In addition to the defendant's confession, the government established the fact that the pistol in question was issued by the quartermaster sergeant to one Cartlidge, a musician and member of the 145 Company of the United States Coast Artillery. It was further shown that defendant's grocery store was located very near the government reservation on Sullivan's Island, where the company to which we have referred was stationed. It is true that some of these facts were only circumstantial, but, nevertheless, they tended to corroborate the confession of the defendant.

In the case of U. S. v. Williams, 1 Cliff. 28, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,707, the Supreme Court said:

"All that can be required is that there should be corroborative evidence tending to prove the facts embraced in the confession; and, where such evidence is introduced it belongs to the jury, under the instructions of the court, to determine upon its sufficiency."

We think the evidence offered to corroborate the confession of the defendant was such as to warrant the jury in inferring that the defendant knew that Cartlidge was a soldier, and also that the pistol was government property.

[531] This leaves the remaining point as to whether the pistol was actually pledged to the defendant. Section 1242 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

"The clothing, arms, military outfits, and accoutrements furnished by the United States to any soldier shall not be sold, bartered, exchanged, pledged, loaned, or given away; and the possession of any such property by any person not a soldier or officer of the United States shall be prima facie evidence of such sale, barter, exchange, pledge, loan or gift. Such property may be seized and taken from any person, not a soldier or officer of the United States, by any officer, civil or military, of the United States, and shall, thereupon, be delivered to any quartermaster or other officer authorized to receive the same." (7 Fed. St. Ann. 1017.)

Also, section 3748 is as follows:

"The clothes, arms, military outfits, and accoutrements furnished by the United States to any soldier shall not be sold, bartered, exchanged, pledged, loaned, or given away; and no person not a soldier, or duly authorized officer of the United States, who has possession of any such clothes, arms, military outfits, or accoutrements, so furnished, and which have been the subjects of any such sale, barter, exchange, pledge, loan, or gift, shall have any right, title, or interest therein; but the same may be seized and taken wherever found by any officer of the United States, civil or military, and shall thereupon be delivered to any quartermaster, or other officer authorized to receive the same. The possession of any such clothes, arms, military outfits, or accoutrements by any person not a soldier or officer of the United States shall be presumptive evidence of such a sale, barter, exchange, pledge, loan, or gift." (6 Fed. St. Ann. 711.)

In the foregoing it is provided that all clothes, arms, military outfits, etc., furnished by the United States to any soldier or officer is not to be sold, bartered, exchanged, etc., and that the "possession" of any such property by any person not a soldier or officer of the United States shall be prima facie evidence of such sale, barter, exchange, pledge, loan or gift. The fact that the pistol was found in the possession of the defendant, who was not a soldier or officer of the United States, was presumptive evidence that the same had been pledged to the defendant.

By the second assignment of error it is insisted that the court below erred in excluding the testimony sought to be adduced from the witness Green upon cross-examination. The defendant offered to show that the pistol had been charged to and paid for by the musician to whom it was issued. If the defendant had offered testimony tending to show that at the time the pistol was pledged the soldier had purchased the pistol from the government, and was therefore the owner of the same at the time he pledged it to defendant, then such testimony would have been very material to the issue. Indeed, if the defendant had established that fact, it would have been a complete defense, and he would have been entitled to acquittal. The defendant did not offer to show that the musician purchased, and was therefore the actual owner of the pistol at the time the same was pledged. He simply offered to show that the value of the pistol was charged to the musician when its loss was discovered, but this was only in the nature of a penalty upon the soldier for his failure to observe the rules and regulations, and could not have the effect of vesting the title in the soldier, nor could it relieve the party who knowingly received it in [532] pledge from the penalty imposed by the statute. The fact that the title to the pistol was in the government at the time the same was pledged makes the offense complete under the statute, and to show that the value of the pistol had been charged to the soldier by the government could not in any wise affect the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

In the case of Lobosco v. United States, 183 Fed. 742, 106 C. C. A. 476, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in discussing a cause somewhat analogous to this, said:

"It seems entirely clear from these sections that, in supplying the recruit with all equipment suitable and necessary for the discharge of his military duties, the government has been very careful to retain title to the same. It would seem to be public property, whether it remains in depot or is put in the possession of the individual soldier. The circumstance that, when his trust expires, he is allowed to retain such articles of clothing as he has then in use, does not change the character of his holding while he is in the service of the government."

Also, in the case of Ontai v. U. S. 188 Fed. 310, 110 C. C. A. 288, where the defendant was charged with purchasing a shirt from a soldier, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit said:

"Error is assigned to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury to acquit the plaintiff in error on the ground that the property which he purchased of the soldier had been allowed to the latter under a clothing allowance, whereby it became his individual private property, held by him subject only to his contract with the United States not to dispose of the same, but with a tenure which permitted another to purchase the same without incurring any penalty for violation of the statute, and it is contended that the indictment having charged the purchase of public property of the United States, and the proof having shown that the purchase was an article of clothing which had been allowed to a soldier, the variance between the indictment and proof was fatal. The plaintiff in error cites U. S. v. Michael, 153 Fed. 609, a case in which the court, in construing section 5439 of the Revised Statutes (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 414), held that a civilian did not commit a penal offense in purchasing from a soldier clothing issued to the latter during the term of his enlistment, and that clothing when issued to an enlisted soldier under the rules of the War Department was no longer public property, but was the soldier's private property. That decision, however, in our opinion is not sustained by reason or by authority. The contrary was held in U. S. v. Hart 146 Fed. 202; United States v. Koplik (C. C.) 155 Fed. 919; U. S. v. Smith, 156 Fed. 859. It is true that one of the promises held out to the soldier about to enlist is the payment to him of a certain sum of money, and the allowance to him of certain specified clothing. But the clothing which he receives is held by a different tenure from the money. The latter is the soldier's to spend at his will. The clothing is part of his equipment for services which he is to render to the United States. He gets no property right in it other than the right to wear it. It is as much a portion of his equipment as is his gun or his ammunition. It remains public property of the United States. Section 1242 of the Revised Statutes (7 Fed. St. Ann. 1017) declares that the clothing furnished by the United States to any soldier shall not be sold, bartered, or exchanged, pledged, loaned, or given away. Section 3748 (6 Fed. St. Ann. 711) provides for the seizure of such public property which has been sold or bartered, pledged, loaned, or given away. The decisions above cited were all rendered prior to the enactment of the present statute as it is expressed in section 35 of the Penal Code. By that section the intention of Congress is made clear beyond question to declare all property secured by a soldier under his clothing allowance to be public property of the United States. That statute specifies 'any' arms, equipment, [533] ammunition, clothing, etc., 'or other public property,' and then follow the words: 'Whether furnished to the soldier, sailor, officer or person under a clothing allowance or otherwise'—thus expressing the will of Congress that a soldier shall acquire no right in any . . . property, and that one who, knowing him to be a soldier, shall purchase the same, shall incur the penalty denounced by the act."

From what we have already said we do not deem it necessary to discuss the third assignment of error.

It is insisted by the fourth assignment that the court below erred in charging the jury that under the statute in question the same presumption existed that existed by law in the case of stolen goods in the possession of a party, to wit, that one recently found in the possession of stolen goods was presumptively the receiver of stolen goods with knowledge of the fact that they were stolen. The reference by the court below to a case where one is charged with being the receiver of stolen property was obviously made for the purpose of illustrating the meaning of the statute which we have just quoted. The fact that the defendant had the pistol in his possession and that it was government property certainly cast upon him the burden of showing that he purchased it from one who had title to the same.

We have carefully considered the fifth assignment of error and are of opinion that the same is without merit.

The sixth assignment of error is in the nature of an argument which could have, with propriety, been made by counsel for defendant in addressing the jury, except that portion of it which requested the court to charge that in order to find the defendant guilty the jury should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt. The court fully explained this rule to the jury, and therefore its action in refusing to grant this request was eminently proper.

The eighth assignment of error is untenable, and requires no discussion at our hands.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Rehearing denied November 28, 1916.

NOTE.

Liability of Civilian for Purchasing or Receiving in Pledge Public Property from Soldier or Sailor.

The purchase or receiving in pledge of public property from a soldier or sailor has been forbidden by federal statute from an early date. The provision in force prior to 1908 (Rev. St. § 5438) was as follows: "Every person who knowingly purchases or receives in pledge for any obligation or indebtedness from any soldier, officer, sailor, or other person called into or employed in the military or naval service any arms, equipments, ammunition, clothes, military stores, or other public property, such soldier, sailor, officer, or other person not having the lawful right to pledge or sell the same, every person so offending in any of the matters set forth in this section shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than one nor more than five years, or fined not less than $1000 nor more than $5000." The foregoing act was re-enacted in the Penal Code (§ 35, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 414) in the following form: "Whoever shall knowingly purchase or receive in pledge for any obligation or indebtedness from any soldier, officer, sailor, or other person called into or employed in the military or naval service any arms, equipments, ammunition, clothes, military stores, or other public property, whether furnished to the soldier, sailor, officer, or person, under a clothing allowance or otherwise, such soldier, sailor, officer, or other person not having the lawful right to pledge or sell the same, shall be fined not more than $500, and imprisoned for not more than two years."

Under the foregoing statutes a civilian who knowingly purchases or receives public property of a soldier or sailor is liable to fine and imprisonment. U. S. v. Hart, 146 Fed. 202; U. S. v. Koplik, 155 Fed. 919; U. S. v. Smith, 156 Fed. 859; Lobosco v. U. S. 183 Fed. 742, 106 C. C. A. 476; Ontai v. U. S. 188 Fed. 310, 110 C. C. A. 288. And see the reported case.

In U. S. v. Koplik, 155 Fed. 919 (decided under Rev. St. § 5438) it was held that the word "knowingly" as used in the statute did not require actual knowledge, the inquiry being whether when the property was offered for pledge, the person receiving it took the precautions which a prudent and reasonable man would take to ascertain whether the soldiers were in the service. The court said: "The section under which the defendant is charged speaks of this particular matter in the following language: 'Any person who knowingly purchases or receives in pledge for any obligation or indebtedness from any soldier, clothes or other public property [I have left out the other words that do not apply to this particular matter], such soldier not having the lawful right to pledge or sell the same.' As to that last clause, 'not having the lawful right to pledge or sell,' the word 'knowledge' or 'knowing' does not apply. Whether the soldier had a right is a question of fact. If the soldier did not have the right, then the property could not be legally sold, and if a person buys that property he buys it with the prospect of its being seized. He buys it running the chances of being shown to have had knowledge that he was purchasing it from a soldier, or under such circumstances that the word 'knowledge' applies, and he takes his chances as to whether the person had the lawful right to pledge or sell the same. The word 'knowing' applies only to the question as to whether the man who purchased and receives in pledge the property knew that the person offering it was a soldier. You see, a soldier might be sent to sell something that might have been condemned, and having the lawful right to sell that, knowledge as to whether he was a soldier or not, if all the circumstances were understood, would have nothing to do with the case. But if he did not have the lawful right to sell (and I charge you these soldiers did not have, as a matter of law, any right to pledge or sell this clothing until their enlistment had been terminated by either court-martial or honorable discharge), if they did not have the right to sell, then the question comes down to the transaction with the person with whom they were dealing, and the sole question is whether he knew, or whether he acted with such disregard of the circumstances that he did not try to find out, whether the man was a soldier. To convict the defendant, you must be satisfied as to this from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. Of course, there are two ways of looking at the matter to start with. It is possible for you to determine that the soldier's story is true, and that the defendant knew that these men were soldiers. It is possible as well for you to determine that the defendant's story is true, and that he in good faith believed that they were discharged soldiers. Those are the two extremes. Whichever way you make up your mind, if you arrive at either one of those conclusions, that way your verdict will go. But if you should believe, as told by the soldiers, that they went in and offered their clothing to be pawned, that they said nothing as to whether they were discharged soldiers, or whether they said that they were discharged soldiers, and the defendant knew better, or, whatever you find as to the facts of that, if the defendant had reason, as a reasonable man, to know that he was dealing with a soldier, or to make further inquiry, if he had no regard for whether the soldier had been discharged or not, if he disregarded taking the precautions a reasonable man would, so that he could be charged with knowing (if he had attempted to find out) that he was dealing with a soldier, then he is responsible under this statute."

In U. S. v. Smith, 156 Fed. 859, wherein the defendant was found guilty of purchasing or receiving in pledge an army blanket, the court said: "You will observe that the provisions of this statute apply to persons who knowingly purchase or receive in pledge any of the kinds of property described here from a soldier, officer, or sailor in the service of the United States. The elements of the crime are guilty knowledge and the actual purchase of and receiving in pledge the kind of property named and receiving it from a person in the military service of the United States. All those things are necessary to be proven in order to make it a criminal case. The guilty knowledge that is a necessary element of the crime is not knowledge that the act is unlawful. The law does not permit ignorance of the provisions of the law to avail as a defense in any case, but the knowledge must be knowledge of the facts, knowledge that the property offered for sale or pledge is the military stores or property of the United States—that is, arms, clothing, or property that is provided by the United States for use in the military service, and knowledge that the person offering to sell or to pledge it is a person in the military service at the time. It will be necessary, therefore, to warrant a verdict finding this defendant guilty of the crime charged in this indictment in either one of the counts, for the jury to find that the evidence convinces beyond a reasonable doubt that this defendant did knowingly purchase or receive in pledge the blanket specified in the indictment from a person who was then in the service of the United States as a soldier."

In Lobosco v. U. S. 183 Fed. 742, 106 C. C. A. 476, it was held that the equipment of a soldier or sailor in the service is public property, the title remaining in the government, whether it is in the possession of the soldier or in a depot. See to the same effect U. S. v. Hart, 146 Fed. 202. Therefore, the fact that the goods purchased or received in pledge were issued as part of the clothing allowance of a soldier or sailor is no defense to a prosecution under the statute. U. S. v. Hart, 146 Fed. 202; Lobosco v. U. S. 183 Fed. 742, 106 C. C. A. 476; Ontai v. U. S. 188 Fed. 310, 110 C. C. A. 288. Compare U. S. v. Michael, 153 Fed. 609. In Lobosco v. U. S. supra, it was said: "It is assigned as error that the court did not dismiss the indictment on the ground that the goods purchased were not a part of the equipment of the marines, because they were furnished to them under their clothing allowance. There are two conflicting decisions, both in district courts, as to the status of articles issued to the soldier or sailor under his clothing allowance, viz., U. S. v. Michael, 153 Fed. 609, and U. S. v. Hart, 146 Fed. 202. We concur with the conclusion in the Hart case, for reasons which are sufficiently set forth in the earlier part of this opinion. The circumstance that in re-enacting section 5438 or part of the Federal Penal Code (section 35) Congress has added the words, 'whether furnished to the soldier, sailor, officer or person under a clothing allowance or otherwise,' is not important. It was a mere matter of precaution in view of the two conflicting decisions last above cited."

In U. S. v. Brown, 1 Mason 151, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,669, arising under an early act (Act of March 16, 1802 c. 9, § 19), which provided that any person purchasing the arms, uniform, or clothing from a soldier should be liable to fine or imprisonment, it was held that in order to render the purchaser liable it must be shown that the soldier had a special property right in the equipment by reason of his service and that if his possession was unlawful the person purchasing the property would not be held guilty as the property would not be in the lawful possession of the soldier within the meaning of the act.

COMMONWEALTH

v.

FIRST CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF LOUISVILLE.

COMMONWEALTH

v.

STARKS.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—March 24, 1916.

169 Ky. 410; 183 S. W. 943.

Taxation — Exemptions — Property
Used for Religious Purposes.

The trustees of a congregation entered into a contract reciting that, pursuant to a vote of the congregation, they sold and agreed to convey to defendant the property of the church in consideration of the sum of $350,000, $100,000 to be paid in cash upon execution of the agreement, the remainder to be paid as it might be needed to make payments upon the contract for a new church, the congregation to retain possession of the property sold until the new church was completed. It is held that title to the premises passed to defendant, and he became at least the equitable owner, and so under Ky. St. § 4023, declaring that it shall be the duty of the holder of the equitable title to list the property and pay the taxes thereon, whether the property be in possession or not, defendant was liable for taxes on the property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such case, as defendant received compensation for all moneys paid to the church, he cannot escape taxation on the theory that the premises being used for religious worship were exempt under Const. § 170, and Ky. St. § 4026, exempting property used for religious worship from payment of taxes.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where defendant entered into a contract to purchase the property of a church congregation paying about one-third of the consideration in cash and agreeing to pay the remainder on demand, and the congregation retained a lien on the property, possession of which it was to retain until its new building was completed, the contract was valuable "property" subject to taxation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Exemption from taxation is a privilege which does not follow the property. Therefore on disposition of property used for religious worship the exemption from taxation does not follow the property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Const. § 170, exempting from taxation places actually used for religious worship and parsonages occupied as a home for the minister, a church congregation desiring a more suitable place for religious worship will not be taxed on funds to be invested in a new place of worship, which were derived from the sale of its old premises, notwithstanding the contract of sale, which provided for payments by the purchaser as needed, allowed the congregation to retain possession of its original property until the new church should be ready for occupancy; it being within the spirit of the constitution to exempt from taxation moneys intended to be devoted to acquiring a place of religious worship as well as the place itself.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson county, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Consolidated actions by Commonwealth of Kentucky, plaintiff, against First Christian Church of Louisville, Ky., and against John P. Starks, defendants. Judgments for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

[411] HURT, J.—These two causes were, by the parties, agreed to be heard and determined together.

On the 4th day of February, 1909, the appellee, First Christian Church, of Louisville, Kentucky, which is a corporation created by a special act of the General Assembly for religious purposes, by its trustees, entered into a contract with the appellee, John P. Starks. The contract was reduced to writing and subscribed by the parties and delivered. The contract is in words and figures as follows:

This Article of Agreement, made and entered into by and between the First Christian Church of Louisville, Kentucky, by its trustees, Joseph P. Torbitt, Henry L. Stone, William S. Caldwell, Thomas J. Minary, and William E. Grinstead (duly authorized and empowered by a vote of the congregation of said church to sell the property of said church as hereinafter described) and John P. Starks, of the said city and state.

Witnesseth: That the said trustees have this day sold and by these presents do sell and agree to convey to said Starks the property of said church, located in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, on the northeast corner of Fourth and Walnut streets, fronting eighty-two (82) feet on Walnut street, and running back of that front between parallel lines and binding on Fourth street one hundred and sixty (160) feet to an alley, in consideration of which said Starks agrees and promises to pay to said trustees the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand ($350,000.00) dollars, as follows, to wit: He will pay one hundred thousand ($100,000.00) dollars, in cash, upon the execution of this agreement, upon which the church will allow him interest at the rate of 3% per annum from the date of said payment until the delivery to him of the possession of said property, as hereinafter provided; and in addition to said one hundred thousand ($100,000.00) dollars, he will pay upon demand from [412] time to time such sums of money in amounts of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars, or multiples thereof, as shall be needed from time to time by said church to make payments upon the construction of the new church which is to be built, upon which payments, in excess of said one hundred thousand ($100,000.00) dollars, the said Starks shall be credited with interest at the rate of 5% per annum from the date of each such payments until the delivery to him of the possession of said property, as hereinafter provided; and when possession of the property herein provided for is delivered to said Starks he will pay the balance of the purchase price in cash, or in equal payments due in one and two years, respectively, from the date said church is vacated and possession thereof is surrendered and deed made therefor to said Starks by said trustees, with interest thereon from that date at the rate of 6% per annum until paid, for which notes will be given by said Starks to said trustees with a lien retained on said property to secure the payment thereof; said balance of the purchase price to be ascertained by deducting from three hundred and fifty thousand ($350,000.00) dollars the said sum of one hundred thousand ($100,000.00) dollars with interest at the rate of 3% per annum from the date of its payment to the date of ascertaining said balance, and deducting further such additional sums as shall have been paid by said Starks prior to said settlement, with interest on each of them at 5% per annum from the date of its payment to the date of said settlement, and deducting further the amount of the present usual real estate agent's commission for the sale of said property.

It is further agreed between the parties aforesaid, that the said church property shall remain in the possession of said trustees to be actually used for religious worship until the permanent new church, which is to be built by the said First Christian Church, shall be sufficiently completed for religious worship to be held therein, at which time they will vacate the property covered by this contract and deliver possession thereof and a good and sufficient deed therefor to said John P. Starks, and at which time the balance of said purchase price will be ascertained and paid, or notes given for the same, in the manner hereinbefore stated. Should the church building now on said property be wholly or partially destroyed by fire or otherwise before the time possession [413] is to be delivered, as hereinabove provided for, such loss shall be sustained by said Starks, but meantime he shall have the right to insure said building from loss by fire for his own benefit.

It is also agreed that said trustees shall have the right to remove from said property all the stone work in front of the church building thereon, including the stone columns, and to remove all furniture, the organ, seats, carpets, and any other movable articles that may be classed as furniture.

In Testimony Whereof, the said parties hereunto confirm this agreement by subscribing their names hereto in triplicate, this February 4, 1909.

By J. P. Torbitt, Atty.

The property, the sale of which was evidenced and made by this contract, was a church and attached grounds, which had been in use as a place of religious worship, by the congregation of the First Christian Church, for many years. The First Christian Church, under the terms of the contract, remained in possession of the property and used it for a place of religious worship until in October, 1911, when it executed a deed to it to appellee, Starks, and delivered the possession of the property to him, and at that time he paid the remaining balance of the purchase price, which he had agreed to pay for it. Although, according to the terms of the contract, he was to pay $100,000.00 of the agreed purchase price upon the execution of the contract, he paid only $90,000.00 of it between that time and September 1st, 1909. The $90,000.00 was made in two payments, one of which was $85,000.00 and the other $5,000.00. Between September 1st, 1909, and September 1st, 1910, $5,000.00 more was paid, and between the latter date and October 16th, 1911, and on the latter date the balance of the purchase money was paid. On the latter date the First Christian Church, by its trustees, executed and [414] delivered a deed of conveyance to Starks for the property.

The church building and its attached grounds, which had been purchased by Starks, was not listed nor assessed for taxation, in the name of anyone, for the years 1910, 1911, and 1912. The appellant, by one of its revenue agents, instituted a proceeding in the county court for Jefferson county against the appellee, Starks, wherein it was sought to have the property assessed for taxation for state and county purposes for the said years, as the property of appellee, Starks. He resisted the effort and the county court sustained a demurrer to the proceeding and it was dismissed. Thereafter appellant appealed to the circuit court, where the demurrer was again sustained and the statement and proceedings dismissed, and an appeal was had to this court.

The contention made by appellee is, that during the years 1909, 1910, and until October 16th, 1911, the property was owned by the First Christian Church and that he did not become the owner of it until the deed was delivered to him for it, on the last mentioned date, and not having an interest in it, which was taxable, on the dates for the assessment of property for purposes of taxation, on the first day of September of the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, respectively, he cannot be made liable for the taxes upon it. An examination of the terms of the contract between the appellees does not leave much space for this contention to stand upon. When the writing undertakes to state the chief purposes of the parties to it, the following language is used:

"That the said trustees have this day sold and by these presents do sell and agree to convey to said Starks the property of said church, located, etc. . . . in consideration of which said Starks agrees and promises to pay to said trustees the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, etc."

The contract likewise provides, that in the event the building should be wholly or partially destroyed by fire or otherwise, before the possession of it should be delivered to Starks, the loss should fall upon him, and that he might insure it for his benefit, and, further, provided that the trustees should have the right to remove from the property all the stone work in front of the church building thereon, including the stone columns, and all the furniture, including the organ, seats, carpets, [415] and other movable articles, which might be classed as furniture. The purchase price was to be paid as follows: $100,000.00 upon the execution of the contract, and the remainder in sums of $5,000.00 and multiples of that sum, upon demand of the trustees, as it might be needed from time to time to make payments upon the construction of a new church to be built, and upon the execution of the deed and the delivery of the property to him, Starks was to pay any balance of the purchase price remaining unpaid or execute his notes for same, with a lien upon the property to secure their payment. The possession was to be given, when a new church building, to be erected by the trustees, should be ready for use for religious worship, when the property purchased by Starks should be vacated. These provisions negative the contention that it was not a sale of the property, or that the parties had any other thing in contemplation. There was no condition provided for upon which either of the parties could escape the obligations imposed by the contract, and there was no event provided for, upon the happening of which, that either of the appellees could be released from performing the obligations which it imposed upon them. Either of the appellees could enforce the terms of the contract as against the other. The transaction, so far as vesting the equitable title to the property in appellee, Starks, is not distinguishable from the ordinary sale of real estate by the execution and delivery of a title bond. It made Starks the real or equitable owner of the property. The legal title was left to the church, which, under the terms of the contract, it could be compelled to transfer to Starks.

Section 4023, Kentucky Statutes, provides:

"The holder of the legal title, and the holder of the equitable title, and the claimant or bailee in possession of the property on the first day of September of the year the assessment is made shall be liable for taxes thereon, but, as between themselves, it shall be the duty of the holder of the equitable title to list the property and pay the taxes thereon, whether the property be in possession or not at the time of the payment, etc."

Construing this statute, this court held, in the case of Bond v. Brand, 115 Ky. 634, 115 Ky. 632, 74 S. W. 673, that the purchaser of real estate at a decretal sale, made before the period for assessing the property for taxation, and where the report of the sale was not filed until thereafter, and [416] its confirmation did not occur until after the assessing period, and possession was not given until after the period for assessment, nevertheless the purchaser became the equitable owner of the property upon the date of his bid, and the execution of his bond for the purchase money, and the property was properly assessed against him at the assessing period, which intervened between his bid and the confirmation of the sale and delivery of the possession.

In Hughes v. McCreary, 86 S. W. 522, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 666, McCreary sold to Hughes a tract of land in July, 1902, and the transaction was evidenced by a writing, which stated the amount of money to be paid for the land, the time when it was to be paid, and when the deed was to be made and the possession of the land delivered. The first payment of the purchase money was to be made on March 1st, after the making of the contract, and notes were then to be executed for the balance of the purchase price, and the deed was then to be executed and delivered, and possession given of the property. It was held, that being the equitable owner of the land from the date of the contract, it was the duty of Hughes to list the land for taxation at the assessing period following the making of the contract, and to pay the taxes thereon. The court, in that case, said:

"By the terms of the section (section 4023, supra), the holder of the equitable title should list the property and pay the taxes thereon. On the 15th of September (the then assessing period) the legal title to the property was in the appellee, S. C. McCreary, and the equitable title was in Hughes. In equity he had the right to compel the appellee to convey the property to him by a compliance upon his part with the terms of the sale. Hughes did not have the legal title to the property, and the effect of the transaction was to vest him with the equitable title thereto. It is our opinion that Hughes held the equitable title to the property, and he should have listed it for taxation and paid the taxes thereon."

In the light of the plain terms of the statute, and the decisions of this court, supra, it does not seem that there could be any doubt of the liability of the appellee, Starks, for the taxes upon the property for the years sued for, but the contention is made, that at each of the assessing periods for taxation, for the years sued for, Starks was not in the possession of the property, but that it was in [417] the possession of the First Christian Church at said times, and was "a place actually used for religious worship," and hence was exempt from taxation for state and county purposes, under the provisions of section 170, of the constitution, and section 4026, Ky. Statutes. It will be observed, that in accordance with section 4023, supra, and Hughes v. McCreary, &c., supra, and Bond v. Brand, supra, the possession of the property is not a controlling factor in determining the liability of an equitable owner of property for the taxes thereon. The statute, in fact, expressly provides, that the equitable owner shall pay the taxes, whether the property be in possession or not. However, in Louisville v. Werne, 80 S. W. 224, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2196, this court held, that it was the use of the property, and not the ownership, which determined, under section 170, of the constitution, whether or not it was exempt from taxation. By section 170, supra, among other things, the following property is exempt from taxation:

"Places actually used for religious worship with the grounds attached thereto and used and appurtenant to the house of worship, not exceeding one-half acre in cities and towns, and not exceeding two acres in the country."

In Louisville v. Werne, supra, Werne was the owner of a lot, which he had leased to a church for a period of twenty years, free from the payment of rents for its use, to be used as a place for religious worship. The church used it as a "place actually used for religious worship." Werne nor anyone else received anything for its use, in the way of rent or any gain. It was attempted to make him liable for the taxes upon it. It was held, that as its use was for religious worship, alone, it was exempt from taxation. The court, in the case, supra, said:

"It is the use of the property and not the ownership which determines the question of exemption. To hold that the congregation must be the absolute owner of the property used exclusively for religious worship, in order to create the exemption, would be to inject words into the constitution and to narrow the exemption which it expressly makes. . . . It is shown that Werne gets no rent from the property, and it is therefore not held for corporate or private profit nor used nor employed for gain by any person or corporation."

[418] The foregoing opinion is fully concurred in, but in the language of the opinion, if the property had not been used "exclusively" for religious worship, or if Werne had received rent for it, would it have been exempt from taxation, within the letter or spirit of the constitution? If property, which is owned by an individual, and which is "a place actually used for religious worship" one day in the week, and the remaining six days should be used by the owner in a gainful occupation, would it be exempt from taxation? If property is owned by a religious sect, or for that matter owned by anyone, and is actually used for religious worship, and no one receives any rent or compensation for its use, and no one gets any gain or profit for its use, there is no doubt of its being exempt from taxation, but a reference to the provisions of section 170, supra, in which are set out the different properties which are exempt from taxation, it will be found that there runs through it a purpose not to exempt from taxation any property which is employed or used for gain, by any person or corporation, except the household goods of persons with families, and crops produced in the year of the assessment and in the hands of the producer.

No one would seriously insist that the constitutional exemption from taxation would apply to property which the owner uses to let to rent to a religious body, to be used for religious worship, and the mere statement of such a proposition is sufficient to show that the constitutional provision has no application to such a state of case, and that such was not in the contemplation of the makers of the constitution. So, it seems that if appellee, Starks, employed or used the property purchased by him for gain, by entering into such an arrangement with the trustees of the First Christian Church, that he was remunerated by the church for its use of the property for religious worship, the use he made of the property was one by which he received compensation for its use, and the use to which he put it was not for religious worship. When one lets his property for rent the use, which he is making of it, as the owner cannot be said to be a use for religious worship. The contract by which he purchased the property provided, that the church should remain in possession and use it for a place of religious worship until a new church, to be erected by it, should be ready for occupancy, but it, also, provided that the price to [419] be paid for the property should be $350,000.00; that $100,000.00 of this amount should be paid at once, and the remainder was to be paid in sums of $5,000.00 and multiples thereof, upon demand, as it might be needed in the erection of the new church. Upon the first $100,000.00 to be paid, at once, the church was to pay Starks three per centum per annum from the date of its payment until the final settlement, when the new church could be occupied, and the property delivered, and five per centum per annum was to be paid upon all the other sums paid before the final settlement, up to the time of such settlement. At such settlement, Starks, was, also, to be credited by the usual real estate agent's commission for making a sale of real estate. At the settlement made on October 16th, 1911, the three per centum per annum on the $100,000.00, and the five per centum per annum on the other sums paid before that time amounted to the sum of $11,332.31, and the amount credited for the usual real estate agent's commission was $7,125.00, making in all the sum of $18,457.34, by which Starks received credit upon the contract price. He says that he considered that he was only giving $342,875.00 for the property, which was the contract price less $7,125.00, the amount of the usual agent's commission. However, the proof shows that the church was refusing to consider any price for the property less than $350,000.00, and that was the agreed price stated in the contract. It is difficult to conclude that the sum by which he was given credit was for any other purpose than to compensate him for the use of the property while the church remained in possession of it, since the sums paid by him were not loans, but each of them was due and owing by him to the church, at the time they were paid, and his obligation to the church to pay the purchase price did not bear interest. It therefore appears that the circuit and county courts were in error in sustaining the demurrer to the statement of appellant.

The proceedings in the county court against the First Christian Church to assess the value of the contract between the appellees for the sale of the church buildings and grounds, for taxation, as against the church, resulted in a judgment of the county court to the effect, that the contract was property subject to taxation, and that the value of it on September 1st, 1909, was $210,745.98, and on September 1st, 1910, its value was [420] $220,576.04, and adjudged that the church be assessed with said sums for taxation as of those dates, respectively. The circuit court, upon appeal, reversed the judgment of the county court and dismissed the statement of appellant, and it has appealed.

The contention on the part of appellant is, that the contract is property; that all property is taxable, which is not exempt therefrom by reason of section 170, of the constitution; and that the contract is not exempt under the provisions of that instrument.

The contention of appellee, First Christian Church is, that the contract is for the sale of a place actually used for religious worship, and being then used for religious worship, and is, therefore, exempt from taxation; that out of the first $100,000.00 paid upon the contract, it had purchased a site for the new church building, which it mentioned in the contract as being in contemplation, and had, at the time of the filing of its answer, been engaged about one year in erecting the new church building to be used by it as a place of religious worship, but which was then not completed, and that the new place it was preparing for worship had been assessed for taxation as of September 1st, 1909, and September 1st, 1910, and it had fully paid the taxes thereon; that the property covered by the contract was, at the time of the sale, worth only $325,000.00 and that the consideration received by Starks, for execution of the contract being worth only $325,000.00, and he having agreed to pay $350,000.00 therefor, and that the church building and grounds being exempt from taxation, that the contract was worth only $18,000.00 to the church; that the church property, for the sale of which the contract was made, being exempt from taxation, it was as if taxes had been paid thereon, and a taxation of the contract would, therefore, be double taxation; that the contract was really not property subject to taxation. That the contract was valuable property, and that property of such kind is ordinarily subject to taxation, there is no doubt. It was the obligation of a solvent man, secured by a lien upon the property to pay the church the sum of $350,000.00—$100,000.00 of which was immediately due and the remainder was due upon demand. It was an obligation which was capable of enforcement by legal proceedings, if necessary.

In Com. v. Kentucky Distillers, etc. Co. 143 Ky. 323, 136 S. W. 1032, this court said:

[421] "Any existing, enforceable, collectible demand that one person has against another or against property upon which it is a lien, or out of which it can be collected, is property."

The same doctrine was held in Gish v. Shaver, 140 Ky. 647, 131 S. W. 515.

Exemption from taxation is a privilege which does not follow property when it is sold and goes into the hands of persons or is applied to uses, for whom or for which no constitutional provision provides for it an exemption from taxation. The contention that the property being exempt from taxation, that such state would be the same as if the taxes had been paid upon it, and that to tax the obligation given for the sale price of it would therefore be double taxation, does not seem to be meritorious. It is not different from the every-day transactions, where an individual purchases property and gives his note for it, and thereafter the property is liable for taxation in his hands, and his obligation for the price of it is liable for taxation in the hands of the holder.

It can only be inferred from the terms of the contract that the sums of money which Starks paid in settlement of the purchase price of the property sold him was used by the church authorities in the purchase of a lot and the erection thereon of another place to be actually used for religious worship. The answer alleges, only, that out of the first $100,000.00, paid on the contract, that a lot was purchased for the erection of a place of worship, and that the church had been engaged in the erection of the buildings upon it for that purpose during a year before the filing of the answer, and that the building had not yet been completed. The averment that the church had been assessed for taxation with the value of the proposed new place of worship for the years 1910 and 1911, and had paid the taxes thereon, is denied by the reply, and there is no proof in the record to support the averment. This, however, does not seem to be a material question for consideration, as the county court did not assess, as against the church, for taxation, the value of any portion of the obligation which had already been paid to the church, at either of the two assessing periods.

The exemption of property from taxation, which is owned by religious societies, and provided for by section [422] 170, of the constitution, in addition to the exemption heretofore quoted, is the following:

"All parsonages or residences owned by any religious society and occupied as a home, and for no other purpose, by the minister of any religion, not exceeding one-half acre of ground in towns and cities, and two acres of ground in the country, appurtenant thereto."

Thus, it appears that the constitution makes selected the property owned by religious societies, to be exempt from taxation, consists of only two items: (1) Places actually used for religious worship, etc.; and (2) parsonages occupied as a home by the minister, etc. While it is true that the property owned by religious societies, and which is exempt from taxation, must not be confounded with that of institutions of "purely public charity," as it has been held by this court that the property of a church is not included within the exemption allowed for institutions of "purely public charity," and while it had been held by this court, in Com. v. Thomas, 119 Ky. 208, 83 S. W. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 320, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1128; Broadway Christian Church v. Com. 112 Ky. 448, 66 S. W. 32; and Calvary Baptist Church v. Milliken, 148 Ky. 580, 147 S. W. 12, that the only property of a religious society, which is exempt from taxation, are the two kinds mentioned in section 170, supra, yet the precise question in this case has never been determined by this court, and the construction to be placed upon the provision as applied to the facts of this case should be one supported by the light of reason, and not one, which would lead to a defeat of the purpose for which the constitutional provision was adopted.

The contract between the appellees, and the proof shows that the property which was sold to Starks by the First Christian Church had theretofore been exempt from taxation as a place actually used for religious worship." While there is no merit in the contention that the proceeds of the sale of the property, which is exempt from taxation, is, on that account, exempt when it is sold and the proceeds held or applied to other purposes, but it is a matter of common knowledge, that religious bodies, seeking to establish places for religious worship, are obliged to secure funds for the purpose of purchasing the grounds and erecting the necessary buildings thereon, and that the negotiations necessary for the consummation of such a project require time for their doing. The evident purpose of the constitution makers was to exempt [423] "places actually used for religious worship," and it does not appear to be consistent with the letter or spirit of section 170, supra, to impose taxes upon funds, which have been donated or otherwise secured by the members of a religious sect which hold some other obligations to pay same with the present, in good faith, purpose to presently purchase the necessary grounds and erect the necessary buildings thereon for the purposes of religious worship, and in pursuance of such intention are presently applied to such purpose. To hold that such funds are liable for taxation would be to rest the constitutional exemption upon a very narrow and inconsistent basis.

In Louisville v. Werne, 80 S. W. 224, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2196, Werne leased his lot to the Walnut Street Baptist Church to be used for a place of religious worship, on March 31st, 1890. The lot had no building upon it, but the trustees of the church took possession of the lot in May or June, 1891, and moved a house upon it and began holding services in it. An attempt was made to subject it to taxation for the year 1891, the assessing period for the year 1891 being September, 1890, at which time there was no building on the lot, and it was not actually used for religious worship until August, 1891. This was before the adoption of the present constitution, and the statute upon the subject of exemptions from taxation exempted "public schools, churches, and all property of seminaries, asylums, hospitals, infirmaries, colleges, and all other funds devoted to charitable purposes and church parsonages, . . . provided that nothing herein shall be construed as exempting any property which is used or employed for the gain of any person." In that case the court held that the word "funds," as used in the statute, was used in the sense of capital, and held, that, although the lot did not have a church upon it at the assessing period of September 1st, 1890, the lot being at that time in the hands of the trustees of the church and under their control and with no right to use it for any other purpose, except for a church, that it was exempt from taxation under that statute.

In Com. v. Gray, 115 Ky. 665, 74 S. W. 702, this court, in construing that portion of section 170, of the constitution, which exempts "institutions of education not used or employed for gain by any person or corporation, and the income of which is devoted solely to the [424] cause of education," held that the word "institution," as there used, was not simply a building or a plant or a body corporate, but it was that which might be set up, provided, ordained, established, or set apart for a particular end, and that a devise in a will, which set apart sums of money and the income of it to be used exclusively, for the education of four indigent children, was an "institution" within the meaning of the constitutional provision, without regard to the particular form of its investment.

In the instant case, the fact that the contract sought to be taxed was an obligation for the price of exempted property does not seem to be material. The proceeds of the sale of the exempted church property were set apart by the church by the contract, for the present purpose of securing the necessary lot and erecting the necessary buildings thereon to make "a place actually used for religious worship."

In Com. v. Lebanon Water Works, 130 Ky. 61, 112 S. W. 1128, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 224, there was a sinking fund in the hands of the commissioners for the purpose of liquidating bonds which were issued to purchase the water works. The water works, under section 170, of the constitution, were exempt from taxation, as public property. The sinking fund commissioners invested the fund in their hands, which was to be held and used for the purpose of liquidating the bonds, in taxable bonds, and this court held that the fund, nor the bonds in which it was invested, could be lawfully taxed.

Applying the principles of these cases to the facts of the instant case, the spirit and meaning of section 170, supra, would exempt from taxation funds held by a church for the present, in good faith, purpose of securing for itself a place actually to be used for religious worship, and which are presently invested in such property. In the instant case, the obligation of Starks was for the payment to the church of the price of the property, which was exempt from taxation, the sale was made for the purpose at once of securing a more desirable place for religious worship with the proceeds of such sale. When a new place of actual religious worship was secured, and the funds arising from the sale invested therein, it would, without question, be exempt from taxation. To the extent that the proceeds of the obligation of Starks was invested in another place of religious worship, it was [425] simply the changing of the proceeds of the sale from one piece of exempted property to another, and a reasonable construction of the constitutional provisions, supra, would not render such proceeds liable for taxation, because the assessing period should catch the funds designed to provide a place of religious worship between the exempted piece of property, out of which they came, and the one into which they are to be presently invested. Such funds are the representative of a "place actually used for religious worship," and without such funds, the religious body could not acquire a place for worship. To tax such funds would defeat the purpose of the exemption. If the church made use of any of the funds, for which it sold its church building and grounds, for any purpose, other than providing it with another place of religious worship, such funds were liable for taxation for the year, at the assessing period of which the church had such funds on hand or held such obligation for them.

Neither the judgment of the county nor the circuit court is in accord with the views herein expressed. The county court was in error in holding that the entire value of the contract was taxable, at each of the assessing periods at which it was sought to be assessed, and the circuit court in holding that no part of the value of the contract was assessable, without any proof as to whether the proceeds of the obligation were invested in another place for religious worship, or were otherwise used by the church.

For the reasons indicated the judgment in each of the causes is reversed, and they are remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

The whole court sitting, Chief Justice Miller dissenting.

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING.

171 Ky. 62; 186 S. W. 880.

(June 16, 1916.)

[62] HURT, J.—The petition for rehearing calls attention to the fact, that the proceeding by the Commonwealth against the appellee, John P. Starks, was an appeal from a judgment by which a demurrer was sustained to the petition of appellant, and expresses a fear that under [63] the terms of the opinion, upon the return of the case to the court, below, the appellee would be precluded from filing an answer and offering any valid defense, that he may have, based upon the facts of the controversy. This court did not overlook the fact, that the question before it was simply whether or not the petition stated a cause of action. The opinion was written, bearing in mind, the elementary rule, that for the purposes of the demurrer the truth of the allegations of the petition was admitted, and the conclusions of the opinion are based upon that presumption, as in any other case. The opinion expressly holds, simply, that the demurrer should have been overruled. It was in no wise intended to make a final adjudication of the case or to preclude any valid defense, based upon the facts of the controversy. The petition for rehearing is therefore overruled, and if any expressions in the opinion are susceptible of the construction, that the appellee is precluded from offering an answer and presenting any valid defense, based upon the facts of the controversy, the opinion is modified to the extent herein stated.

NOTE.

The reported case involves the application of a constitutional provision exempting from taxation "places actually used for religious worship" to a transaction whereby a church edifice was sold, the price, paid in installments, was devoted to the erection of a new church, and the religious society remained in possession of the property sold and used it for church purposes until the new church was completed. It appearing that the grantee of the church property received some pecuniary return from the transaction during the period after the sale and while the building was occupied for church purposes, it is held that the property was taxable during that period. But with respect to the funds derived from the sale it is held that they were not taxable either during the time when they stood as a legal obligation due to the religious society or after their payment and before they were devoted to the purchase of the new church, it appearing that the design was at all times so to use them. The question what is included in the exemption of a religious institution from taxation is discussed in the note to St. Paul's Church v. Concord, Ann. Cas. 1912A 350. See also the recent case of Cole v. State, Ann. Cas. 1916D 1256, as to the effect of a contract of sale on the exemption of church property from taxation.

BRAEUEL ET AL.

REUTHER ET AL.

Missouri Supreme Court—February 17, 1917.

270 Mo. 603; 193 S. W. 283.

Wills — Contest — Persons Entitled to Contest — Interest.

A will contest as authorized by an interested person under Rev. St. 1909, § 555, can be brought only by one having a direct pecuniary interest in the final determination.

Abatement of Will Contest — Death of Contestant.

If a will contest is no different from an ordinary civil proceeding, it will survive and may be revived under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 1916-1925, in the name of the successor to the parties plaintiff, in view of section 1916, providing that no action shall abate by the death, marriage, or other disability of a party if the cause of action survives.

Same.

A proceeding to contest a will is peculiar, in that, when filed, the proponents have the burden of proving affirmative facts essential to validity of the will, and therefore, after the contest is filed, the court will determine the validity of the will, and no reviver is necessary if the contestants die.

Same.

Rev. St. 1909, § 101, authorizing the administrator to commence and prosecute all actions which may be maintained and are necessary in the course of his administration, and defend all such as are brought against him, does not warrant the administrator's revival of a will contest which is not in any sense a property right, but only a mere right of action.

Right of Administrator of Heir to Contest.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 104, providing that executors and administrators shall prosecute and defend all actions commenced by or against the deceased at the time of his death, and which might have been prosecuted or maintained by or against such executor or administrator, the administrator cannot prosecute or maintain actions unless he might have done so had the action not been brought by the deceased.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 105, authorizing administrators to prosecute actions for torts, there is no authority in the administrator to prosecute a will contest.

[See note at end of this case.]

Statute Authorizing Contest — Strict Construction.

The right of action to contest a will, being purely statutory, is in derogation of common law, and subject to the rule that its provisions must be strictly construed.

Right of Administrator of Heir to Contest.

Conceding that Rev. St. 1909, § 555, in regard to will contests is remedial, and should be liberally construed, it permits contest only by persons interested in the probate; so that the administrator of a deceased contestant is not entitled to revival of the action in his name.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from St. Louis City Circuit Court: FISHER, Judge.

Petition for revocation of will of Anna Zwingmann, deceased. John William Braeuel et al., plaintiffs, and John F. Reuther et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. On motion to revive by administrators of plaintiffs, and on motion to abate. The facts are stated in the opinion. MOTIONS OVERRULED.

Safford & Marsalek for appellants.

Morton Jourdan for respondents.

[604] WALKER, P. J.—Anna Zwingmann died in the city of St. Louis in April, 1912, leaving personal property therein. On April 23, 1912, there was admitted to probate in the probate court of said city a paper purporting to be her last will. In May, 1912, the plaintiffs herein, brothers of the deceased, brought suit in the circuit court of said city to set aside the will on the grounds of fraud, duress and mental incapacity of the testatrix to make a will. At the April term, 1913, of the circuit court of said city a trial was had therein resulting in a finding and a judgment that the paper so admitted to probate was the last will and testament of the said Anna Zwingmann. Thereafter plaintiffs perfected an appeal from said judgment to this court. The case was set for hearing on said appeal on the 19th day of October, 1916, and on that day was taken as submitted. It now appears that both of said plaintiffs are dead, one having died in May, 1915, and the other in July, 1916. On the 7th day of November, 1916, the deaths of the plaintiffs were suggested to this court and a motion was made to revive in the name of their administrator, who, as stated in said motion, had been appointed by the probate court of the city of St. Louis in October, 1916, but was not one of plaintiffs' former counsel in the contest proceedings. A motion to abate the action has been filed by counsel for respondent. These motions will receive consideration in their order.

It is necessary, under the statute (Sec. 555, R. S. 1909) to authorize an action to contest at will, that those who instituted same shall have a direct pecuniary interest in the final determination of the question as to whether the instrument is the last will of the decedent. We said this much in Watson v. Alderson, 146 Mo. l. c. 343, 48 S. W. 478, 69 Am. St. Rep. 615, and expressive of the same conclusion but in different terms, it was said in State v. McQuillin, 246 Mo. l. c. 691, Ann. Cas. 1914B 526, 152 S. W. 341, that the statutory interest referred to must be a financial interest in the estate and one which would be benefited by setting aside the will; also in Teckenbrock v. McLaughlin, 246 Mo. l. c. 719, 152 S. W. 38, it was held that generally a direct pecuniary interest at the time of the probate of the will is a condition precedent [605] to the right to contest; and in Gruender v. Frank, 267 Mo. 713, 186 S. W. 1004, the latest expression of this court on the subject, the language of the preceding cases as to what constitutes an interest within the meaning of the statute is quoted with approval.

The plaintiffs were the sole contestants. So far as the record discloses they were the only persons capable of inheriting from the decedent had she died intestate. The setting aside of the will, therefore, would have injured to their pecuniary benefit and as a consequence they were interested in the devolution of the property of the decedent to such an extent as to authorize them to institute the pending action. Plaintiffs' right to institute the action having been determined, what effect has their death pending the appeal upon this proceeding? If this action is in no wise different in its material features from the ordinary civil proceeding it will survive or continue, and may, upon compliance with our rules of procedure (Art. 10, chap. 21, R. S. 1909) applicable in such cases, be revived in the name of the party entitled to succeed plaintiff in the prosecution of the action. This follows from the language of the statute (Sec. 1916, R. S. 1909), which provides that "no action shall abate by the death, marriage or other disability of a party, if the cause of action survive or continue."

A proceeding to contest a will, however, is possessed of peculiar features; after the will has been probated an action questioning its validity casts upon those who claim under it the burden of proving it. Although the contestants who have brought the action may introduce no evidence and may even abandon the contest, the burden of proving the will still devolves upon those who would maintain it. While they are not required to prove a negative, they must prove the affirmative facts essential to the execution of a valid will. [Bradford v. Blossom, 207 Mo. l. c. 228, 105 S. W. 289.] From this ruling, which is but a reiteration of a like doctrine announced in many preceding cases, it follows that the question as to the survival or continuance of actions of this character in the event of the death of parties thereto is eliminated from [606] the equation. Upon the action being brought the parties thereto become of minor importance, the prime purpose of the proceeding being to determine whether there is a will or not. The importance of this concrete question being paramount, we might well content ourselves with the course that having regularly acquired jurisdiction we will, regardless of the parties and with indifference to the motions filed herein, review the record and render judgment thereon; but it is meet and proper that other questions submitted pro and con in regard to these motions be determined.

The appointment of the administrator of the estates of plaintiffs made below, and the motion filed here to revive in his name, was evidently upon the assumption or theory that in the absence of this course the action would abate. This result would not have followed, as we have shown, on account of the nature of the action and the purpose it seeks to effect. There being no abatement, the motion to revive was therefore without merit.

But viewed from another vantage than that which presents itself on account of the nature of the action, are there other reasons existent for the nominal substitution of the administrator for the plaintiffs?

The purpose of the appointment of an administrator is that he may manage and settle the estate of the intestate. The limit of his power is to be found in the statutes which authorize his appointment. An analysis of these statutes is pertinent. Under section 101, Revised Statutes 1909, the administrator is authorized "to commence and prosecute all actions which may be maintained and are necessary in the course of his administration, and defend all such as are brought against him." A will contest is clearly not within this class. It is in no sense a property right and is therefore not such an action as is authorized to be maintained by the administrator in the course of his administration within the meaning of the section quoted. Being a mere right of action a judgment in the administrator's favor would result in the recovery of nothing more than the establishment of the right. Such is the character of this right [607] that it is neither assignable nor descendible (Storrs v. St. Luke's Hospital, 180 Ill. 368, 54 N. E. 185, 72 Am. St. Rep. 211), and as the administrator, if successful in maintaining it, would recover nothing tangible, it was not contemplated by the statute that he bring suit to establish it. As was aptly said by the Supreme Court of Ohio in discussing a correlative question: "An executor or administrator is not a necessary party where there are no debts and no personal property." [Andrews v. His Administrators, 7 Ohio St. 143.] This conclusion accords with reason and it was so held in Ligon v. Hawkes, 110 Tenn. 1. c. 21, 75 S. W. 1072, in construing a statute of that state similar in all of its material features to that under review. An Illinois statute upon the same subject has received a like construction. [Stauder v. Tscherner, 187 Ill. 19, 58 N. E. 317.]

Section 104, Revised Statutes 1909, provides that "executors and administrators shall prosecute and defend all actions commenced by or against the deceased, at the time of his death, and which might have been prosecuted or maintained by or against such executor or administrator." This section simply means that executors and administrators may prosecute and defend such actions as may have been brought by or against the decedent at the time of his death which might have been prosecuted or maintained by or against such executors or administrators. In other words, the class of personal representatives mentioned cannot under this statute prosecute and maintain actions unless they were in a condition to bring a like suit if it had not been brought by the deceased. [Ferrin v. Kenney, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 294; Schreiber v. Sharpless, 110 U. S. 76, 3 S. Ct. 423, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 65.]

Section 105, Revised Statutes 1909, cited by the movers of the motion to revive, has no application to the power of administrators in a case of the character here under consideration. This section authorizes administrators, under the conditions therein named, to prosecute and defend actions for torts to the property, rights or interests of the decedent.

There is therefore neither in the nature of the action to contest a will nor the statutes defining the power of administrators [608] any express authority conferred upon them to institute or maintain this character of action. In Teckenbrock v. McLaughlin, 246 Mo. 1. c. 719, 152 S. W. 38, we said that the right to contest a will is statutory and that an interest in the probate of same is essential to the existence of this right. This has ever been the rule in this State. Gantt, J., speaking for this court, said in effect in Stowe v. Stowe, 140 Mo. 1. c. 604, 41 S. W. 951, that "wills are creatures of the statute and that proceedings to set them aside are vested exclusively in courts of law and that this rule of construction has been adhered to by this court from Lyne v. Marcus, 1 Mo. 410, down to and including the case then under consideration." There has been no variance since in this conclusion. Courts elsewhere have reached the same conclusion. [U. S. v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 16 S. Ct. 1073, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 287; Kochersperger v. Drake, 167 Ill. 122, 47 N. E. 321, 41 L.R.A. 446.] The right of action to contest a will being purely statutory, it is therefore in derogation of the common law and hence subject to the rule that its provisions must be strictly construed. Thus construed the procedure prescribed, or in other words the rights granted and the powers conferred, must be limited to the express terms of the statute. Thus limited there is an absence of authority in an administrator to either institute or maintain a suit to contest a will.

If, however, another well established rule of statutory construction be invoked, viz., that remedial statutes are to be liberally construed (Rozelle v. Harmon, 103 Mo. 339, 15 S. W. 432, 12 L.R.A. 187) and it be conceded that the statute in regard to the contest of wills is within this class, then upon a reference to its express terms we find that "only persons interested in the probate of wills" can be made parties to contests of same, and bearing in mind the character of this interest, as frequently defined by this court, the conclusion follows that although the statute may be remedial in its nature and hence subject to liberal construction, such construction cannot extend beyond its plain terms (Caldwell v. Renfro, 99 Mo. App. 376, 73 S. W. 340), which limit the right of action to those named.

A persuasive ruling in support of this conclusion is to be found in the determination of an analogous question [609] in the case of In re Soulard, 141 Mo. 642, 43 S. W. 617. There the court, in passing upon the question as to the liability of an estate for expenses incurred in a will contest, said in effect that "the executor of a will is entitled to be reimbursed out of the estate for necessary expenses incurred by him in having the will probated, but expenses incurred in the circuit court growing out of a contest of the will should be paid by the parties interested in that proceeding, viz., the heirs or the legatees." If the estate is not to be burdened, as is held in this case, with expenses of litigation of this character, it would seem to follow that the executor or administrator should not be made even a nominal party. His presence in the proceeding adds nothing to its progress or purpose; and, to employ a homely simile, he would constitute "a fifth wheel" in the chariot of procedure.

The rulings of courts of last resort in other jurisdictions in similar cases add force to the correctness of the conclusion here announced. In Diffenderfer v. Griffith, 57 Md. 81, the court held, in a case involving the validity of a will, that the trial court upon the suggestion of the death of one of the contestants had no power to substitute a new party in the place of the deceased, but that the survivor could effectively proceed in the trial of the issue; that the right to prosecute a suit to contest a will did not devolve upon the executor or personal representative of the deceased, because the latter's right in this regard was purely personal and died with him; and that it was not incumbent upon the personal representative to participate in the proceedings, so far as any duty to the estate of the deceased was concerned. This ruling was based on the absence from the Maryland code, as is the case here, of any authority for substituting parties to suits in proceedings of this character. In California various phases of the question here involved have received consideration. In Roach v. Coffey, 73 Cal. 281, 14 Pac. 840, it was held that an administrator cannot represent either side of a contest between heirs, devisees or legatees contesting the distribution of the estate. In the case of In re Sanborn, 98 Cal. 103, 32 Pac. 865, and [610] that of In re Hickman, 101 Cal. 609, 36 Pac. 118, the court held that an administrator, as such, has no interest in the estate other than to discharge the duties devolving upon him under the law. In Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 463, which is cited with approval in the Matter of Marrey, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. 806, the court held that an executor cannot maintain an appeal from an order of distribution of the assets of an estate on the ground that the property was improperly divided between the legatees. In the case of Storrs v. St. Luke's Hospital, 75 Ill. App. 152, it was held that the right to contest a will should be limited to persons interested therein; that this was a personal privilege and when they died the effective force of the statute, so far as they were concerned, died with them; that it did not descend to their heirs nor survive to their administrators (citing cases).

Our conclusion being evident that the substitution of an administrator is not necessary in the event of the death of a contestant in cases of this character, the question naturally arises as to who will represent the interests of such contestants in the event of their death pending a proceeding, as in the case at bar. We have heretofore indicated in discussing another phase of this matter that such representation is not necessary. The purpose of the proceeding is to determine whether or not there is a will. The contestants under our law are mere instruments in effecting this purpose, and the suit having been brought by them cannot be dismissed, but must be finally determined although the contestants acted voluntarily in the first instance in bringing the action. Having so acted their powers cease except to see that the proponents establish the will. Whether, however, they see to this or not is a matter of indifference, because the action having been begun the duty devolves upon the trial court to see that it is finally determined, and this rule has a like application when cases of this character reach this court upon appeal. From this it follows that the motion to revive in the name of the administrator should be overruled.

The reasons stated in support of this conclusion are a sufficient answer to the motion filed by respondents herein [611] that the action should abate. Even if the action had been improperly brought so far as the parties plaintiff were concerned, we have held that proper parties in interest might be substituted therefor on the ground that such substitution did not change the nature of the action but simply properly submitted the issues for the court's consideration. It was so ruled in the case of Lilly v. Tobbein, 103 Mo. 477, 15 S. W. 618, 23 Am. St. Rep. 887. The motion to abate is therefore overruled.

Under the ruling in the Lilly-Tobbein case others who have such an interest in the probate of the will herein as is defined by the statute may, upon proper application therefor embodying a satisfactory showing of such interest, be made parties plaintiff hereto; but whether such application is made or not the court having acquired jurisdiction will finally determine the matter at issue.

NOTE.

Power or Duty of Administrator, Guardian, or the Like, to Contest Will.

Generally, 537.

Executor or Administrator, 537.

Guardian or Guardian ad Litem, 538.

Generally.

As a general rule no person is entitled to maintain a will contest who has not a direct interest in having the will set aside, and the right of a fiduciary to contest is determined by that rule. In the case of In re Stewart, 107 Ia. 118, 77 N. W. 574, it was said: "We have no statute defining the qualifications of those who may contest the probate of a will, but we understand the general rule to be that such action can be taken only by one who would have a beneficial interest in the estate, if there was no such will." So in Matter of Davis, 182 N. Y. 468, 75 N. E. 530, it was said: "The statute in authorizing a person 'who is otherwise interested in sustaining or defeating the will' to appear and at his election to support or oppose its probate, means only a person who has a pecuniary interest to protect, either as an individual or in a representative capacity. An interest resting on sentiment or sympathy, or on any basis other than the gain or loss of money or its equivalent, is not sufficient, but any one who would be deprived of property in the broad sense of the word, or who would become entitled to property by the probate of a will, is authorized to appear and be heard upon the subject."

A receiver appointed in supplemental proceedings is not entitled to contest the will of the debtor's wife. In re Brown, 47 Hun 360, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 622, wherein it was said: "The last will and testament of M. Louise Brown, the wife of George W. Brown, so disposed of her property as to deprive him of all interest in her estate. The receiver of the property of the husband, appointed in supplementary proceedings instituted by his creditors, filed objections to the will, and desired to contest the same before the surrogate. The surrogate struck out the objections and refused to permit the receiver to appear and contest the probate of the will, because he was not interested in the estate of the deceased. If the will was set aside and declared invalid, its destruction would afford the creditors of the husband no interest in his wife's estate. They would still have a claim against the husband and they would have nothing more."

Executor or Administrator.

In the reported case it is held that the personal representative of a deceased heir who was entitled to contest a will has no right to initiate or continue a contest. In Selden v. Illinois Trust, etc. Bank, 239 Ill. 67, 87 N. E. 860, 130 Am. St. Rep. 180, a similar ruling was put on the ground that the right to contest is personal and does not survive. Compare Crawfordsville Trust Co. v. Ramsey, 178 Ind. 258, 98 N. E. 177. In New York the personal representative of a deceased heir is entitled to contest the ancestor's will. Judson v. Staley, 163 App. Div. 62, 148 N. Y. S. 733; Matter of Herrmann, 91 Misc. 464, 154 N. Y. S. 957. In the case first cited it was said: "The complaint shows that in the absence of a will Adam Frederick would have been entitled to a share of the real and personal property of the alleged testatrix. He having survived her, his interest in her real estate, if any, would go to his heirs, and in her personal estate to his personal representatives. The plaintiffs therefore are interested and may maintain the action." In Matter of Milliken, 32 Misc. 317, 66 N. Y. S. 724, it was held that there was no right of contest by the personal representative of a person who was entitled to but a life interest in the testator's property.

In two jurisdictions it has been held that where an administrator has been appointed under the supposition of intestacy, the person so appointed is entitled to resist the probate of a will subsequently produced. In re Cornelius, 14 Ark. 675; Matter of Davis, 182 N. Y. 468, 75 N. E. 530. In the case last cited it was said: "As was said by the learned surrogate in his opinion, 'the right to administer the estate is a sufficient interest in this state to entitle the person in whom it is vested to contest the probate of a will.' The administrator in California was authorized by a decree of the proper court in that state to take possession of the assets of the deceased in his county, to convert them into money and to distribute the proceeds according to law. That decree was granted before any application had been made to prove the will. The assets were of great value and the administrator had a personal interest to the extent of his fees for services already rendered, and a much more important interest as the representative of others, for if there was no will, he had exclusive jurisdiction and control of all the personal property of the decedent in the county of Fresno, California, for the purpose of administration. He represented the beneficiaries, who were the substantial owners of the property. Probate of a will, however, would deprive him of power to administer and leave the validity of all his acts before he heard that there was a will open to question. He had an interest to protect and the right to become a party to the proceeding, so as to see that no paper purporting to be a will of the decedent was admitted to probate unless it was genuine and executed by a competent person according to law."

The contrary view has been taken in other jurisdictions. Thus in Storrs v. St. Luke's Hospital, 180 Ill. 368, 54 N. E. 185, 72 Am. St. Rep. 211, the court said: "The other appellant, the Chicago Title and Trust Company, administrator de bonis non of the estate of George M. Storrs, was not a proper party complainant here, because it had not such an interest, as is contemplated by the statute. The administrator de bonis non merely holds his title in autre droit, as trustee, for the purpose of distribution." So in Parsons's Estate, 65 Cal. 240, 3 Pac. 817, in denying to an administrator an allowance for his expenses in making a contest it was said: "This item is not a charge against the estate; it was the affair of the heirs, as such, to contest, if they wished, the probate of the document—not of the administrator. The latter is an officer to administer the estate for the benefit of those interested, leaving interested parties to settle their own differences."

A like conflict exists as to the right of an executor named in one will to oppose the probate of an alleged later will. In the case of In re Stewart, 107 Ia. 117, 77 N. W. 574, it was held that the executor named in the prior will had no right to maintain a contest. But in Matter of Greeley, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 303, it was said: "The executors named in the will of 1871 have clearly, by statute, an express right to have that will proved, if they can establish the fact that it is the last will, and they may rightfully contend against the validity of any alleged subsequent will as an obstacle in the way of establishing the will under which they claim. Their interest in this regard is very apparent. For, if they can succeed in establishing their will, the title to the movable goods of the testator, though in ever so many different and distinct places, vests in them, in possession, etc.—indeed, did so vest presently upon the testator's death." And see Connely v. Sullivan, 50 Ill. App. 627; In re Coursen, 4 N. J. Eq. 403.

It has been held that the public administrator has no right to contest a will to secure for himself the right to administer. In re Sanborn, 98 Cal. 103, 32 Pac. 865; In re Hickman, 101 Cal. 609, 36 Pac. 118; State v. District Ct. 34 Mont. 226, 85 Pac. 1022. In the case first cited it was said: "The probate of a will can be contested only upon 'written grounds of opposition' filed by a 'person interested'—that is, interested in the estate, and not in the mere fees of an administration thereof. (Secs. 1307–1312, Code Civ. Proc.) A public administrator has no interest in an estate, or in the probate of a will; that is a matter which concerns only those to whom the estate would otherwise go. . . . If a public administrator could legally assume the character of a standing contestant of wills, notwithstanding the wishes of heirs and devisees, he would certainly enlarge the sphere of his activities; but the limitations of the statute do not allow such inflation." In State v. Superior Ct. 148 Cal. 55, 82 Pac. 672, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643, it was held that the public administrator was not entitled to contest a will because of a remote chance that an escheat of the property to the state would result. The court said: "The only ground upon which the state can claim that it has an interest sufficient to authorize it to maintain the contest is, that, although the deceased did leave surviving heirs in whom, if the will is invalid, the title to his property has vested, and who are not aliens whose title will be forfeited by escheat if they do not claim the property within five years, yet there is a possibility that all the heirs, or some one of them, may fail to appear and claim the property, that thereupon proceedings may be instituted under section 1269 of the Code of Civil Procedure to declare an escheat, and that no heir entitled may then, or within twenty years after judgment therein, appear to claim the property or its proceeds, and thereupon the state may take as absolute owner. (Code Civ. Proc. secs. 1271, 1272.) We do not think this remote and contingent possibility, or series of successive possibilities, constitutes an interest which will authorize the party, having nothing more substantial, to maintain a contest of a will." And see Hopf v. State, 72 Tex. 281, 10 S. W. 589. But in Gombault v. Public Administrator, 4 Bradf. (N. Y.) 226, it was held that the public administrator might contest in order to produce an escheat. In the case of Matter of Davis, 45 Misc. 306, 92 N. Y. S. 392, it was held that after the public administrator has been appointed to administer an estate he may contest a will subsequently produced. The court said: "I am referred to In re Hickman, 101 Cal. 609, 36 Pac. 118, in which it was held that the public administrator in that state had not such an interest as would entitle him to appear and oppose the probate of a will. In view of the cases I have mentioned, it may be doubted if this California case is in harmony with the policy of the probate practice of this state; but that case differs from the present. In that case the interest of the public administrator was simply his right to letters of administration upon the estate of the decedent. In the present case, letters of administration upon the decedent's estate have been issued to the public administrator, and he comes before the court, not as one seeking to enforce his right to administer, but as one to whom letters of administration have in fact issued, and who is clothed with the power and authority of an administrator of that part of the decedent's estate in his county. He is not seeking to be made a trustee, but he is a trustee coming to vindicate his right and authority over the trust estate."

Guardian or Guardian ad Litem.

The father of a minor heir though he is by a divorce decree given the custody of the minor is not entitled to maintain a contest of a will whereby the heir is given less than he would inherit. Halde v. Schultz, 17 S. D. 465, 97 N. W. 369, wherein it was said: "What relation the father sustains to his child after a divorce in favor of the wife on the ground of his failure to support her is not entirely clear. The relation existing between parents and children while the marriage relation exists is clearly defined by sections 107 to 127, inclusive, of the Revised Civil Code. By section 111 it is provided that the father of the minor child is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings, and if the father be dead, or be unable or refuse to take the custody, or has abandoned his family, the mother is entitled thereto. By section 114 it is provided that the parent, as such, has no control over the property of the child. And section 127 provides that the husband and father, as such, has no rights superior to those of the wife and mother in regard to the care, custody, education and control of the children of the marriage, while such husband and wife live separately and apart from each other; and the circuit court is authorized, as aforesaid, in such a case, to make such regulations in regard to the minor children as the circumstances may require. It will thus be seen that the father, as such, even in case there has been no divorce, has no control over the property of the child. If Halde, in this case, had no control over the property of his daughter prior to the divorce proceedings, he could certainly have none thereafter as such father. Whatever rights, therefore, he may have retained as the father of the child, would not be affected by the proceedings to probate the will. It is quite clear, therefore, that having no interest in the property of the testatrix, and no right to control the property of the minor child as such father, he had no interest in the proceedings to probate the will that entitled him to contest the same."

A person who in the absence of a will is entitled to the guardianship of an infant may contest a will appointing another as guardian. Taff v. Hosmer, 14 Mich. 249.

While in one jurisdiction it has been held that there is no statutory authority for the appointment of a guardian ad litem in a will contest, State v. District Ct. 34 Mont. 220, 85 Pac. 1022, the more usual practice is to require in a proceeding to probate a will that all minor heirs adversely interested shall be represented by a guardian ad litem. White v. Kilmartin, 205 Ill. 525, 68 N. E. 1086; Shelby v. St. James Orphan Asylum, 60 Neb. 40, 92 N. W. 155; Middleditch v. Williams, 47 N. J. Eq. 585, 21 Atl. 290; Matter of Haynes, 82 Misc. 228, 143 N. Y. S. 570; Cooper's Estate, 2 How. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 38; O'Dell v. Rogers, 44 Wis. 136. See also Peters v. Peters, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 529. Failure to appoint a guardian ad litem is not however jurisdictional. Shelby v. St. James Orphan Asylum, supra. And see Cooper's Estate, supra. In McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682, it was said: "Her children, who were the heirs, who would have taken the entire property after the widow's share was taken out, had the undoubted right by their mother as next friend to take the appeal from probate, and if they could, prevent the probate of the will."

The guardian ad litem of an infant heir whose interests are injuriously affected by a will may and should contest it. Shea v. Bergen, 59 Misc. 294, 110 N. Y. S. 572, wherein it was said: "It is unnecessary to recite the facts set up in opposition to the motion upon which the defendant executor charges collusion between the guardian ad litem and the plaintiff's attorney to harass the estate. It was the duty of the guardian ad litem, in order to protect the interests of the infant, to interpose an answer joining in the prayer of the complaint, and, if the present motion is authorized by the practice and procedure of the court, it was the duty of the guardian ad litem to make it for like reason. It matters not what the motive of the guardian ad litem may have been in so acting, if the acts themselves were lawful and proper." So in Greene v. Mabey, 35 R. I. 11, Ann. Cas. 1915A 1290, 85 Atl. 118, holding that it was improper for the guardian ad litem of an infant heir to stipulate with the proponent facts admitting the will to probate, the court said: "If the will of Charles N. Mabey should be held to be a good and valid will, the estate of said decedent would pass to his widow, Mabel T. Mabey; otherwise it would pass, subject to dower and the widow's interest in the personal estate, to the three minor children before mentioned. The questions therefore submitted to this court, under the statement of facts, involve the disposition of the bulk of the decedent's property; that is, whether it shall go to the widow under the will, or to the children as heirs at law. We think that it is clear, under the authorities cited, that a guardian ad litem cannot lawfully enter into an agreement stating facts upon which the decision of the court and its decree must be based, and that full proof of all the facts which do not clearly appear to the court as advantageous to the infants must be established by proper testimony."

In the case of Chittenden's Will, 1 Tuck. (N. Y.) 251, it appeared that the heir was twenty years of age and very intelligent, and that out of respect for the memory of the testator, her father, she wished the contest initiated on her behalf by a guardian ad litem to be discontinued. On an application by the guardian to the surrogate for instructions the guardian was instructed to dismiss the contest.

CARROLL

v.

KNICKERBOCKER ICE COMPANY.

New York Court of Appeals—July 11, 1916.

*218 N. Y. 435; 118 N. E. 507.Workmen's Compensation Acts — Accident Arising Out of Employment — Evidence Excluding Presumption.

Evidence that a helper of the injured servant and two other witnesses were present at the time and place of the alleged injuries to the servant, and that they did not see any accident happen to him, and that they did not see a cake of ice fall upon him, and of physicians who examined decedent that there were no bruises, discolorations, or abrasions on the surface of his body, is sufficient to overcome the statutory presumption of Workmen's Compensation Law (Laws 1914, c. 41), § 21, which provides that it shall be presumed, in the absence of substantial evidence to the contrary that the claim comes within the provisions of the law.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913A 4; Ann. Cas. 1914B 498; Ann. Cas. 1916B 1293; Ann. Cas. 1918B 768.]

Review of Finding.

Where decision of appellate division affirming award of the compensation commission was not unanimous, the court of appeals may consider whether there was any evidence to sustain the finding.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916B 475; Ann. Cas. 1918B 647.]

Evidence — Hearsay.

In general, hearsay testimony is inadmissible.

Proceeding before Compensation Commission — Rules of Evidence.

Under Workmen's Compensation Law, § 68, providing that technical rules of evidence or procedure are not required, but the commission in making an inquiry, or conducting a hearing, shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence, hearsay testimony is admissible, and the award of the commission cannot be overturned on account of any alleged error in receiving evidence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915A 741.]

Same.

Such statute does not, however, affect the probative force to be given such testimony, but, as further therein provided, the commission must ascertain the substantial rights of the parties, and to sustain an award there must be legally sufficient evidence.

Declaration of Employee as to Cause of Injury.

Hearsay testimony of statements of deceased servant while in nervous condition suffering from delirium tremens in hospital that he was injured when a heavy cake of ice fell upon him is insufficient to overcome positive evidence of witnesses that no ice fell upon him, being in fact no evidence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Evidence — Res Gestae — Subsequent Declarations in Delirium.

Statements of deceased while in hospital suffering from delirium tremens some hours after alleged accident as to nature of accident are not admissible as res gestae, but are narratives of past events.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Change in Law — Effect on Pending Proceedings.

That after appeal is taken from the award of the workmen's compensation commission such commission is superseded by the industrial commission does not affect any of the questions involved.

Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 169 N. Y. App. Div. 450, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Third Judicial Department.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Bridget Carroll, claimant, and Knickerbocker Ice Company, defendant. Claim allowed by Workmen's Compensation commission. Decision affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant appeals by permission. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Frederick M. Thompson, David G. McConnell and Frank R. Savidge for appellant.

Egbert E. Woodbury and E. C. Aiken for respondent.

[437] CUDEBACK, J.—This is an appeal by the Knickerbocker Ice Company from an order affirming the decision and award of the workmen's compensation commission in the matter of the claim of Bridget Carroll for compensation [438] for the death of her husband, Myles Carroll, which was occasioned as it is alleged by injuries received while he was in the employ of the appellant. The Knickerbocker Ice Company is a self-insurer under the Workmen's Compensation Law. The decedent was employed by the ice company as driver on an ice wagon, and the claim is that he suffered an injury on September 22, 1914, while delivering ice. The commission made certain findings of fact upon which it based an award to the claimant. One of such findings of fact is as follows:

"2. On said date while said Carroll was putting ice in the cellar of a saloon at 20 East Forty-second street, borough of Manhattan, city of New York, the ice tongs slipped and a 300-lb cake of ice fell upon him, striking him in the abdomen, causing an epigastric hemorrhage and a rigidity of the abdomen. He was taken to a hospital and there developed delirium tremens and died on the 28th day of September, 1914."

Section 21 of the Workmen's Compensation Law (L. 1914, ch. 41) provides that in any proceeding upon a claim for compensation under the law, "it shall be presumed in the absence of substantial evidence to the contrary (1) that the claim comes within the provisions of this chapter," etc. There was in this case substantial evidence to overcome this statutory presumption. A helper on the ice wagon and two cooks employed in the saloon where the ice was delivered, testified before the commission that they were present at the time and place when it was alleged the plaintiff was injured, and that they did not see any accident whatsoever happen to him, and that they did not see any cake of ice fall. The physicians who subsequently examined the decedent testified that there were no bruises, discolorations or abrasions on the surface of his body.

The finding of the commission is basely solely on the testimony of witnesses who related what Carroll told them as to how he was injured. Carroll's wife testified that when he came home from his work he told her that [439] he was putting a 300 pound cake of ice in Daley's cellar and the tongs slipped and the ice came back on him. The physician who was called to treat the injured man at his home, a neighbor who dropped in, and the physicians at the hospital, where he was taken later in the day, testified that he made like statements to them.

The question is presented whether this hearsay testimony is sufficient under the circumstances of the case to sustain the finding of the commission. The decision of the Appellate Division which affirmed the award was not unanimous, and, therefore, there is open in this court the question whether there was any evidence to sustain the finding.

It is a question with text-book writers whether the rules of evidence which exclude hearsay testimony are wise and well founded or not. It is argued by some that though such testimony is not supported by an oath, and is not subject to the test of cross-examination, it is, nevertheless, valuable. There are some jurisdictions in which it has been held that hearsay testimony is admissible (Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mosley, 8 Wall. 397, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 437), but the contrary has always been the rule of the courts in this state which have steadfastly resisted any innovation in the rule. Waldele v. New York, Cent. etc. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 274, 47 Am. Rep. 41. But we are not concerned here with any abstract question as to the wisdom or lack of wisdom in the law which excludes hearsay testimony.

We have only to consider whether the law of this state excluding such testimony has been changed in cases coming within the Workmen's Compensation Law by section 68 of that law. That section is as follows:

"Section 68. Technical rules of evidence or procedure not required. The commission or a commissioner or deputy commissioner in making an investigation or inquiry or conducting a hearing shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence or by technical or formal rules of procedure, except as provided in [440] this chapter; but may make such investigation or inquiry or conduct such hearing in such manner as to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties."

This section has plainly changed the rule of evidence in all cases affected by the act. It gives the workmen's compensation commission free rein in making its investigations and in conducting its hearings and authorizes it to receive and consider not only hearsay testimony, but any kind of evidence that may throw light on a claim pending before it. The award of the commission cannot be overturned on account of any alleged error in receiving evidence.

This is all true, but, as I read it, section 68 as applied to this case does not make the hearsay testimony offered by the claimant sufficient ground to uphold the award which the commission made. That section does not declare the probative force of any evidence, but it does declare that the aid and end of the investigation by the commission shall be "to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties." No matter what latitude the commission may give to its inquiry, it must result in a determination of the substantial rights of the parties. Otherwise the statute becomes grossly unjust and a means of oppression.

The act may be taken to mean that while the commission's inquiry is not limited by the common law or statutory rules of evidence or by technical or formal rules of procedure, and it may in its discretion accept any evidence that is offered; still in the end there must be a residuum of legal evidence to support the claim before an award can be made. As was said by Justice Woodward in his able dissenting opinion at the Appellate Division: "There must be in the record some evidence of a sound, competent and recognizedly probative character to sustain the findings and award made, else the findings and award must in fairness be set aside by (the) court."

It is not necessary to consider in this case the constitutional limitations upon the power of the legislature to [441] change the rules of evidence. It is sufficient to say that the intention of the legislature as revealed in the Workmen's Compensation Law was not so revolutionary in character as to declare that an award can be sustained which is dependent altogether on hearsay testimony where the presumption created by section 21 of the statute is overcome by substantial evidence.

The only substantial evidence before the workmen's compensation commission was to the effect that no cake of ice slipped and struck the decedent, and there were no bruises or marks upon his body which indicated that he had been so injured. The findings to the contrary rest solely on the decedent's statement made at a time when he was confessedly in a highly nervous state, which ended in his death from delirium tremens. Such hearsay testimony is no evidence. In re Case, 214 N. Y. 199, 108 N. E. 408.

It is suggested that the hearsay testimony was admissible as part of the res gestae; but, according to the rules of the courts of this state, the statements of the injured man in this case were not part of the res gestae but were simply narratives of an event past and gone. Greener v. General Electric Co. 209 N. Y. 135, 102 N. E. 527, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 975.

Since this appeal was taken the workmen's compensation commission has been superseded by the industrial commission, but that change does not affect any of the questions that have been considered.

I recommend that the order appealed from be reversed and the claim for compensation be dismissed, with costs against state industrial commission, and that the question certified to this court be answered in the negative.

WILLARD BARTLETT, Ch. J.—I think that the Workmen's Compensation Law permits the state industrial commission to base an award upon hearsay evidence, in the absence of substantial evidence to the contrary; but where, as in the present case, the hearsay evidence is directly contradicted by the testimony of eye-witnesses [442] to the event, it does not suffice to raise any issue of fact. This view accords with the liberal spirit of the enactment without giving to hearsay evidence a sanction which I cannot believe the legislature intended to give it.

I vote for reversal on the ground stated.

SEABURY, J. (dissenting).—This case presents the question whether hearsay evidence, which the workmen's compensation commission after examination deem to be credible, may furnish a sufficient basis to sustain an award made by that commission. The award that was made rests upon the declaration of the injured man to his wife and physician and to another witness shortly before his death. These declarations related to the manner in which he sustained the injury from which he subsequently died. The learned Appellate Division has sustained the award. I think the decision which is now the subject of review is correct. To sustain this award does not mean that the commission are obliged to act upon all hearsay evidence that is presented, but only that it may act upon it where the circumstances are such that the evidence offered is deemed by the commission to be trustworthy. The Workmen's Compensation Law is an insurance scheme by which compensation is received for personal injuries or death happening in the course of employment. The fund out of which compensation is paid is created by means of contributions which employers are required to pay. Liability under the law is dependent upon injury in the course of employment, not upon contract or fault. Jensen v. Southern Pac. Co. 215 N. Y. 514, 519, Ann. Cas. 1916B 276, 109 N. E. 600, L.R.A.1916A 403. It was because liability was not made to depend upon contract or fault that a prior law designed to accomplish a similar purpose was declared unconstitutional by this court on the ground that the liability sought to be imposed was unknown to the common law. Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, 294, Ann. Cas. 1912B 158, 94 N. E. 431, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162. Since the decision in the Ives case, the [443] Constitution of the state has been amended, and ample power to enact such a law has been conferred upon the legislature. (Art. I, sec. 19, New York Constitution.) In view of this constitutional provision it is unnecessary to determine whether the liability imposed under this law is based upon common-law principles or whether it is based upon principles derived from other systems of jurisprudence. Legislation similar in character seems to have been first successfully applied in Germany. The spirit in which legislation of this character has been applied in Germany is set forth in a pamphlet entitled "The German Workmen's Insurance as a Social Institution," prepared by Dr. Ludwig Lass, imperial government counselor at the imperial insurance office, and compiled and published under the order of that office. In that pamphlet Dr. Lass says: "While the arrangements of the administration and jurisdiction have been made with a view to further social interests, as has been shown above, the question of the interpretation of the workmen's insurance laws has also been settled not only from juridical, but also social points of view, in accordance with the spirit of these laws. In the interpretation of the laws an earnest endeavor is shown, above everything, to give material justice its due, while formal jurisprudence has to stand back. In cases where any legal provision is susceptible of several constructions, that interpretation is preferred, when doubts arise, which corresponds to the intentions of the legislator from the social point of view. There is no anxious clinging to the dead letter; on the contrary, the interpretation is liberal and in keeping with the spirit of the legislation. In this respect, for instance, the interpretation may be mentioned which has been given by Imperial Insurance Office to the words 'accident,' 'work' and 'industrial accident.' Further, mention must be made of the fact that in workmen's insurance matters not the same severe standard is applied by the Imperial Insurance Office to proof, as is customary for disputes in [444] common law. Thus, proof of probability is often considered sufficient. This is important, for instance, with deaths the causes whereof are not cleared up. If a workman is found dead on the working premises and the cause of his death cannot be ascertained, the claims of his survivors, according to strict law, ought to be declined. But according to the jurisdiction of the Imperial Insurance Office the claims for compensation are admitted in cases of this kind, if there is a probability—especially on account of the position of the body—that the death has been caused by anything belonging to the work. A similar view is taken by jurisdiction in the numerous doubtful cases where the accident itself, or the connection between the injury or death of an injured person and the accident, cannot be sufficiently proved." (page 29.)

I think the passage just quoted is significant as revealing the method of interpretation which must be applied if the social benefits which the law was designed to promote are to be substantially realized. It is in this spirit rather than in a spirit of devotion to common-law methods of proof that the legislature enacted this law. That this is the case appears from the whole purpose of the legislation and particularly from section 68 of that law. In that section it is stated that the commissioners in making the "investigation or inquiry or conducting a hearing shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence, . . . but may make such investigation or inquiry or conduct such hearing in such manner as to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties." In this statute we have not only explicit sanction for a departure from common-law methods of proof, but a direct legislative command that the commission "shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence." In the face of this legislative provision I think there is no justification for rendering the Workmen's Compensation Law subject by judicial interpretation to the technical common-law [445] system of evidence. That the common-law classification of the rules relating to hearsay evidence is far from satisfactory is well pointed out in the extract from the work of Prof. Thayer, which my brother Pound has quoted in his opinion. The Workmen's Compensation Law is a new step in the field of social legislation. We should interpret it in accordance with the spirit which called it into existence. Our reverence for the traditional rules of our common-law system shall not lead us to restrict it by subjecting it to the operation of these rules. This court is under no obligation to see to it that laws enacted to remedy abuses arising from new industrial and social conditions shall be made to square with ancient conceptions of the principles of the common law. Indeed, if the common law had not had woven into it by judicial construction the doctrines of assumption of risk and fellow-servant, and the doctrine of contributory negligence, it is doubtful whether the legislation now under consideration would have been rendered necessary. While judges and text writers have often made sweeping generalizations condemnatory of hearsay evidence, the many "exceptions" to the rule prohibiting such evidence show that we have not been able to get along without a frequent resort to it. In cases of homicide dying declarations as to the cause of death are received in evidence, and it is quite within the legislative power to sanction the admission of evidence of a similar kind in cases arising under the Workmen's Compensation Law. The difficulty in proving the cause of death in cases where the person injured dies as a result of the injury has long been recognized, and even in ordinary actions based on negligence the rules requiring proof of freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the deceased are relaxed to some extent. In the case now under consideration the injured man was taken from the place where he was working to his home, and into the presence of his wife and physician. The wife and physician naturally inquired as to how the [446] accident happened, and the injured man told them. The evidence of these persons is now the only evidence available which can explain the cause of death. The commission examined and cross-examined these witnesses, and was satisfied that they correctly reported what the injured man had related shortly before his death and believed that the narrative which the injured man gave was correct. I think that the commission were justified in basing an award upon this testimony and that the language of section 68 of the Workmen's Compensation Law expressly authorized them so to do.

If it were necessary to do so the award made could well be sustained upon the ground urged by my brother Pound in his opinion. I think, however, that it is more in harmony with the spirit of this legislation and with the express provision of section 68 that we should frankly recognize that the commission are not limited by the common-law methods of proof and that if they were satisfied that the so-called hearsay evidence that was offered was credible they were justified in basing their award upon that evidence.

It is said in the prevailing opinion that "this section does plainly permit the introduction of hearsay testimony in all cases affected by the act, but still it does not, . . . make hearsay testimony, unsupported by other evidence, sufficient ground to sustain such a finding of fact as the commission made in this case." The distinction sought to be made between admitting such evidence and basing an award upon it seems to me to be unreasonable and not to find support in anything contained in section 68. In conceding that § 68 sanctions the introduction of hearsay evidence the argument of the appellant is left without any foundation upon which to rest. If the legislature sanctioned the admission of this evidence it follows by necessary implication that it intended to authorize the commission to act upon it. In resting the judgment about to be rendered upon this [447] ground the court concedes that the evidence upon which the commission acted was legal evidence, but holds that it was insufficient to sustain an award. If section 68 sanctions the reception of hearsay evidence there was legal evidence before the commission and if there was any legal evidence before the commission to sustain the award this court has no power to reverse the determination that was made.

I vote in favor of affirming the judgment of the Appellate Division.

POUND, J. (dissenting).—I think this case should not be disposed of by deciding that all evidence held to be objectionable as hearsay in the courts of this state is without probative force. Our law of evidence is largely a product of the jury system. The purpose of its exclusionary rules is to keep from the jury not only all that is irrelevant, but also much that although relevant is remote, or collateral, or non-probative, and, therefore, tends to mislead or confuse. I assume that the industrial commission, although not "bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence" (W. C. L. § 68), must, in exercising its functions, for the sake of system and simplicity, apply certain principles of the law of evidence based on experience as well as authority, the chief being that witnesses should, as far as practicable, testify from their own knowledge of relevant facts, orally, publicly, under oath or affirmation and subject to the test of cross-examination. Yet we cannot overlook the obvious fact that "the changing experience of mankind" may dictate that these fundamental principles be modified and liberalized in their application, when the hearing is before tribunals which adjudicate both on law and fact, and not before a jury summoned temporarily from the vicinage and untrained in the discriminating art of deciding causes on evidence. The ascertainment of truth rather than the integrity of the rules being the foremost consideration, [448] we find that when the jury is absent the rules are less strictly enforced, it being assumed that the court will not be easily confused or misled by that which is irrelevant and inconclusive.

Hearsay is said by the old writers to be "of no value in a court of justice" (Bull. N. P. 294), and "no evidence" (Gilbert on Evidence [2d ed.] 152), yet the rule against hearsay, even at common law, is subject to many exceptions, and is not inelastic either in statement or application. Thayer in his luminous and philosophic "Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at the Common Law" (pp. 522, 523) suggests that "a true analysis would probably restate the law so as to make what we call the rule the exception, and make our main rule this, namely, that whatsoever is relevant is admissible. . . . No doubt, in point of reason, hearsay statements often derive much credit from the circumstances under which they are made, say for example, from the fact of being made under oath, or under impressive conditions as being against interest, or made under strong inducements to say the contrary, or as part of a series of statements or a class of them which are usually careful and accurate, and the like; credit amply enough in point of reason to entitle them to be received in evidence, when once the absence of the perceiving witness is accounted for; and it would in reason have been quite possible to shape our law in the form that hearsay was admissible as secondary evidence, whenever the circumstances of the case were alone enough to entitle it to credit, irrespective of any credit reposed in the speaker."

The rule and its exceptions are not always and everywhere the same. The decisions are not in harmony. What is admissible in one jurisdiction is sometimes excluded in another. In the same jurisdiction the exception as first formulated is sometimes limited or extended by later cases. In Travellers' Ins. Co. v. Mosley, 8 Wall. 397, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 437, the question was whether the assured died from the [449] effects of an accidental fall down stairs in the night or from natural causes. Assured had left his bed between 12 and 1 o'clock at night and it was held that his declarations to his wife when he came back that he had fallen down the back stairs and hurt himself badly were competent and sufficient proof of the fall because they were made so soon thereafter as to be in the nature of res gestae—declarations contemporaneous with the main fact and part thereof. The evidence was, none the less, the narrative by a person since deceased of a past, although a recent event. This court in Waldele v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 274, 278, 47 Am. Rep. 41, therefore, very properly characterized the Mosley case as "an extreme case," and in Greener v. General Electric Co. 209 N. Y. 135, 138, 102 N. E. 527, 46 L.R.A.

(N.S.) 975, said "the distinction to be made (in such cases) is in the character of the declaration; whether it is so spontaneous, or natural, an utterance as to exclude the idea of fabrication; or whether it be in the nature of a narrative of what had occurred." The force of this rule lies somewhat in the application of it. People v. Del Vermo, 192 N. Y. 470, 483, 85 N. E. 690, and cases cited. Can we say that evidence which the Supreme Court of the United States held competent and sufficient, i. e., the declarations of a deceased person made soon after the alleged accidental injury and under circumstances entitling them to credit is not competent and sufficient proof before the industrial commission under the rule of section 68 of the Workmen's Compensation Law which says that the commission shall not be bound by common-law rules of evidence? May not the commission, under this statute, adopt the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States and in its discretion give it an extremely liberal application and reject the stricter rule laid down by this court without being open to the charge of making an award on no evidence whatever? Could not "the substantial rights of the parties" be thereby ascertained? If it may go so far, we need only hold that where the common-law rule against hearsay is [450] not uniformly stated or applied, the commission may base an award upon evidence received under the exceptions to the rule most favorable to the claimant, without being bound by the decisions of this court thereon. I think that the evidence of Carroll's declarations to his wife when he came home from work and to the physician called to treat him might, without too violent a wrench to our established ideas, be held competent under the exception to the rule against hearsay applied to the Mosley case. In any event as pointed out by my brother Seabury in his opinion the evidence was legal and admissible. If it had any probative force, its weight was for the commission as triers of fact and their decision thereon was final. (Workmen's Compensation Law, § 20.) I think that we cannot say as matter of law that it had no probative force under section 68 of the act, but I do not thereby conclude that all hearsay has probative force or that awards in contested cases may be allowed or disallowed on rumor or report to which the circumstances give no weight. It is not to be anticipated that the commission will become confused, waste time, lose sight of the main issue and base awards or refuse them on haphazard hearsay, as our convention is that a jury might if it were permitted to hear everything relevant.

I vote for affirmance.

NOTE.

In the reported case the judges are agreed that under a provision in a workmen's compensation act that the commission "shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence" the hearsay rule is not applicable to a proceeding under the act and a self-serving declaration of an injured workman as to the cause of his injury may after his death be admitted in support of a claim by his dependents. The majority of the court holds however that evidence of that character is not sufficient to sustain an award but "there must be a residuum of legal evidence to support the claim." The earlier cases discussing the admissibility in proceedings under a workmen's compensation act of a statement by the injured workman as to the cause of the injury are discussed in the note to Reck v. Whittlesberger, Ann. Cas. 1918C 771.

v.

CHURCH ET AL.

Tennessee Supreme Court—August 9, 1916.

135 Tenn. 541; 188 S. W. 220.

Mines and Minerals — Effect of Severance of Mineral and Surface Rights.

Possession of the surface of land by one who has by his conveyance of the mineral interest severed the latter from the surface, is not a possession of the underlying severed mineral interest, nor does such possession inure to the owner of the mineral; distinct estates being created by the severance.

[See note at end of this case.]

Adverse Possession — Mineral Lands.

Acts of possession required for the surface and those for the minerals are different; the latter requiring some form of mining or activities directly related thereto.

[See 6 Ann. Cas. 142; Ann. Cas. 1912D 1199; 140 Am. St. Rep. 951.]

Same.

Where the grantee of an adverse possessor takes possession, he may unite his subsequent possession with his grantor's prior possession to make out adverse possession for the seven-year period.

Same.

Where the grantee of mineral rights of an adverse possessor takes immediate and appropriate possession thereof, he may unite his subsequent possession with his grantor's prior possession to make out statutory title by adverse possession.

Courts — Rules of Decision — Following Other Jurisdictions.

The courts of a state may refuse to follow even a consensus of authority in all other states, or a well-recognized rule of common law, on the ground that it is not suited to the genius of the state or is opposed to its public policy; the public policy of a state being shown by its statutes and decisions.

Mines and Minerals — Effect of Severance of Mineral and Surface Rights.

The grantor of minerals by implication of law conveys the right to obtain access to them through the surface, and against such purpose does not hold the surface adversely.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Grundy county: ALLEN, Judge.

Action by L. H. Northcut et al., plaintiffs, against Lewis W. Church et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Robinson & Fancher for appellants.

Fulks & Schnoon and L. V. Woodlee for appellees.

[543] NEIL, C. J.—Complainants L. H. Northcut, and the heirs of H. L. Raulston, deceased, claim the mineral interest in 177 acres of a tract of 200 acres, and the whole interest in twenty-three acres, the residue of the 200 acres. The defendants claim under one Francis Church to whom a grant of 5,000 acres of land was made in 1831. This grant included within its boundaries, but excluded from its operation, "100 acres belonging to one A. Higginbotham entered June 25, 1831, by No. 3083." The [544] complainants claim under one W. R. Nunnely, through a deed made by him to one J. M. Nunnely, and by the latter to complainant Northcut, and H. L. Raulston, the ancestor of the other complainants. W. R. Nunnely's deed describes the land conveyed therein, as made up partly of the above-mentioned Higginbotham tract, but the bill charges that the whole 200 acres lies within the Church grant. Assuming that the complainants are bound by the deed which they have filed, then it is impossible to say how much of the 200 acres lies within the Church grant, and how much within the Higginbotham entry. However, the complainants do not derange their title either to the Church or the Higginbotham grant, if the latter ever procured a grant, on his entry, which is not shown. They trace title only to W. R. Nun-nely, and it is not shown that he had any kind of title. An effort was made to prove that the land was sold for taxes due from Church, and that W. R. Nunnely had bought the land at tax sale, and received a tax deed, but this failed utterly. So, the complainants had no other recourse than to rely on the statute of limitations of seven years.

The facts applicable to this feature of the case are as follows:

The deed which W. R. Nunnely made to J. M. Nunnely, purporting to convey the 200 acres, was executed on the 24th day of July, 1884. The evidence shows that there were several settlements on the land, running back more than seven years prior to that deed, but no color of title is shown covering them, nor are the [545] bounds or descriptions of such settlements shown. All of these must therefore go for naught. It is also shown that J. M. Nunnely divided the land among his children, and put them in possession of parts of it, but the deeds are not exhibited, nor are the descriptions of the holdings of the children given. In view of this fact the defendants insist that since the burden of proof to make out a claim under the statute of limitations rests upon one who relies thereon, and that the evidence must be substantial and clear (Coal, etc. Co. v. Coppinger, 95 Tenn. 526, 530, 32 S. W. 465), the complainants' case breaks down under the uncertainty thus created as to how long J. M. Nunnely, under whom they claim, in fact held possession of the land.

But passing this, we shall assume that inasmuch as no deeds appear as made by J. M. Nunnely to his children, their various holdings were under and for him, after he received his color of title on the 24th of July, 1884.

He did not hold this land, however, under his color of title for as much as seven years before he made his conveyance to the complainant Northcut, and H. L. Raulston. This latter deed was made on the 7th of June, 1890, showing an interval of less than six years.

Perhaps we might stop at this point and refuse further to consider complainants' claim under the statute of limitations, on the ground that it does not appear that all of the land sued for, or how much of it, was land that had been granted by this State or the State of North Carolina; the Act of 1819, chapter 28, [546] section 1, requiring such fact to be shown as a necessary groundwork on which to erect a title acquired under the statute of limitations (Sh. Code, section 4456), but we shall waive this question, and proceed to determine the controversy on the point chiefly argued by counsel, at the bar of the court, and in the briefs and written arguments filed.

That question arises on the fact that J. M. Nunnely, had held the land under color of title less than seven years when he conveyed the mineral interest in the 177 acres to Northcut and Raulston, and the further fact that neither vendor nor vendees exercised any acts of ownership appropriate to indicate possession of such mineral interest. The contention of the complainants is that J. M. Nunnely continued to hold possession of the surface for a period longer than seven years from the date of his deed from W. R. Nunnely, and that this possession inured to the benefit of the persons to whom he had conveyed the mineral interest, and that thus seven years' adverse possession was made out for them. Adding his possession of the surface before his conveyance to Northcut and Raulston and his possession after that time, Nunnely had, prior to the bringing of this action, held the surface of the land more than seven years; but there is no evidence that any mining was attempted, or any effort made to take possession of the minerals as such. So, we have the question: Is the possession of the surface of land by one who has by his conveyance of the mineral interest severed the latter from the surface a possession of [547] the underlying severed mineral interest, and does such possession inure to the owner of the mineral?

The negative of this question is so well settled in other jurisdictions that we should have no hesitancy in answering in the same manner but for the fact that there is a conflict on the subject in our own decisions.

The first case is Murray v. Allred, 100 Tenn. 100, 43 S. W. 355, 39 L.R.A. 249, 66 Am. St. Rep. 740. The facts of that case were viz.: On the 24th of October, 1853, one Rodgers conveyed to Matthias Wright a tract of land lying in Fentress county, reserving all minerals. Wright subsequently conveyed the same land to another without making any reservation, and through a series of conveyances the land passed to Allred, each of the deeds by Wright and those claiming under him, purporting to pass an estate in fee. Facts were agreed upon in the case to the effect that Allred, and those through whom he claimed, had been in the actual, open, and continuous adverse possession of the land, under color of title, for more than seven years before action brought, but that neither he nor any one under whom he claimed had done any mining on the land, or attempted anything of the kind.

Murray claimed the mineral interest under Rodgers, who, as stated, had reserved this interest when he conveyed to Wright. Allred having refused to permit Murray to enter on the land to explore for minerals, the question was brought before one of the chancellors of the State by an agreed case to settle the rights of the parties. He decided against Murray, and on appeal [548] Murray's third assignment of error was that the mineral interest by the reservation referred to, having been severed from the surface, possession of the latter was not inconsistent with the rights of the owner of such mineral interest, not adverse, and therefore that the statute of limitations had not run against him, and the chancellor erred in not so decreeing.

The court sustained this assignment, basing its decision on the following principles: That the owner of real estate may sell the land to one man, the coal, iron, gas, or oil to another, or others, giving to each purchaser a deed in fee simple for his particular deposit or stratum, while he retains the surface for agricultural purposes precisely as he held it before; the severance being complete for all legal and practical purposes, each separate layer or stratum becoming a subject of taxation, incumbrance, levy, or sale, precisely like the surface; and the possession of the soil by its owner for the purpose of tillage, giving him no possession of the underlying minerals; that in order to make a holding adverse to one who has reserved, or had granted to him, minerals in place, there must appear to have been some denial of his right, or assertion of a claim inconsistent therewith, and that the use of the surface for agricultural purposes is not the assertion of a right inconsistent with the right of the owner of minerals to mine under the surface for the purpose of extracting them. 100 Tenn. 100, 102, 119, 120, 43 S. W. 355, 39 L.R.A. 249, 66 Am. St. Rep. 740.

[549] These principles are supported by a practically solid array of authorities in all the other States where similar questions have arisen, and also by the text-books. Westmoreland, etc. Natural Gas Co. v. De Witt, 130 Pa. St. 235, 18 Atl. 724, 5 L.R.A. 731; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Massey, 130 Ala. 156, 33 So. 996, 96 Am. St. Rep. 17; Gordon v. Park, 202 Mo. 236, 100 S. W. 621, 119 Am. St. Rep. 802; Catlin Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 180 Ill. 398, 54 N. E. 214, 72 Am. St. Rep. 216; Kiser v. McLean, 67 W. Va. 294, 67 S. E. 725, 140 Am. St. Rep. 948, and note, pp. 951-969; Wallace v. Elm Grove Coal Co. 58 W. Va. 449, 52 S. E. 485, 6 Ann. Cas. 140, and note; J. R. Crowe Coal, etc. Co. v. Atkinson, 85 Kan. 357, 116 Pac. 499, Ann. Cas. 1915D 1196, and note; White on Mines and Mining, 32; Barringer & Adams on the Law of Mines and Mining, pp. 36, 59 and 60; 1 Cye. 994, 995; 2 Corpus Juris, 147, sec. 258; 1 Ruling Case Law, pp. 738, 739, sec. 57.

In the subsequent case of McBurney v. Glenmary Coal, etc. Co. 121 Tenn. 275, 118 S. W. 694, the existence of these principles is fully recognized, but it is said in the opinion that the better rule is that possession of the surface by one who has conveyed to others the underlying minerals in place is a possession in the interest of the latter, as well as for himself; that is, it is also a possession of the minerals. The facts of that case were: Julian F. Scott, claiming ownership of the land, conveyed it, in 1851, to one Duncan, reserving [550] the underlying coal. Duncan thereafter, between 1851 and 1856, conveyed this land to Edward R. Diden, in several parcels or tracts, by four separate deeds. The question relating to the controversy now before us arose in respect of a certain tract of 342 acres, part of one of the original tracts. Claiming this tract under his father's will, John S. Diden, the son of Edward R. Diden, took possession of it in 1870, and resided upon it continuously, openly, and adversely for twenty-eight years, or until the bringing of the action by McBurney. In 1884, when he had held this land in possession for a period not longer than five years, he conveyed the mineral interest to J. H. Parker & Co. In 1890 Parker & Co. conveyed the mineral interest to Chandler, and the latter, on the same day, conveyed it to the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company. Although, as previously stated, when Julian F. Scott conveyed the land to Duncan he reserved the mineral interest in all the land, the latter, when he conveyed to Edward R. Diden, did not reserve the mineral in the tract of which the 342 acres was a part; but, as just stated, John S. Diden, son of Edward R. Diden, who was the vendee of Duncan, purported to convey such mineral interest in his deed to Parker & Co. It does not appear that either Parker & Co. or the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company ever attempted any mining operations on the 342 acres, nor that they, or either of them, ever did any act indicating a purpose to take possession of the minerals as such, nor does it appear that John S. Diden, the vendor of Parker & Co., during his twenty-eight years' possession of the [551] surface of the land, ever did or attempted any such act. It is said that no actual possession of the coal itself was claimed. The decision of the court was, simply, that John S. Diden's possession of the surface for more than seven years, claiming the land under color of title (his father's will), openly, continuously, and adversely, inured to the benefit of his conveyee, Parker & Co., and through them to the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, and that he had thus perfected the title of the latter to the underlying coal, by the statute of limitations before suit brought. It should be stated that McBurney claimed the mineral not under Julian F. Scott, but under Thomas B. Eastland, who had the true title. The fact that the parties were claiming under different chains of title was referred to in the opinion as having an influence in the solution of the question.

The court adopted the opinion of the court of chancery appeals, from which court the case had been brought by appeal. It is said in that opinion:

"In this case the conflict is not between parties claiming under the same chain of title, but between parties claiming under entirely separate and distinct chains of title. It appears to us that the better, safer, and most sensible rule would be to adopt the rule established in those cases where there is a joint or mixed possession by heirs and life tenants, or by mother and child, guardian and ward, etc., where the possessions are held to be consistent, and in harmony, and all under the same title. . . . We think the better rule and principle is to hold that such possession by a man who [552] has conveyed the mineral rights to others is a possession in their interest, and in harmony with them, as well as for himself. If it be not so held in this case, we have this peculiar condition of matters presented: Diden by his deed conveyed to Parker & Co., and through them to the defendant Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, the mineral rights and mining rights: that is, the right to go upon this land and take out these minerals, and to use the necessary timber on the land for mining purposes. Now, these parties are claiming under him and under his warranty, and if they be ousted therefrom, can hold him liable on his warranty, and the loss will be occasioned by the entry of a party against whom he has been asserting an adverse right for a period of more than a quarter of a century. In addition to that, Diden has certainly been holding the land for all purposes as against the complainants, and is entitled to hold all of it for all purposes, unless it be held that the coal has been severed, so as not to protect it; and if it should be decided under this holding that the complainants have not lost their title to the coal, by what right or on what principle could it be held that they can enter upon the surface in order to reach the coal, and can it be held that they have the right to use the timber upon the land for mining purposes? We think, in a case of this kind, as heretofore said, the better holding would be that the possession of Diden inured to the benefit of his grantee, to whom the mineral and mining rights were transferred. . . . We are of opinion, as stated, that the better and more [553] sensible rule, and the rule which will best promote and carry out the purpose and policy of the statute of limitations, by quieting titles, etc., will be to hold that the possession by a grantor (of a mineral interest and mining rights in property) of the surface will inure to the benefit of the grantee of such rights as against third parties; and such is our holding."

This court after setting out the foregoing added:

"We are of opinion that the court of chancery appeals announces a better rule than that indicated in the authorities we have cited from other States. We are the better contented with this rule in view of the fact that there would be no way of putting complainant in possession of those minerals if his title thereto should be established. The adverse possession of the defendants has deprived the complainant of an easement to remove this coal from defendants' premises, even if it belonged to complainant. Complainant could not assert a way of necessity over the land of defendant Diden to remove the minerals."

After very careful reflection and a re-examination of the authorities, we are convinced this decision is unsound.

When John S. Diden conveyed the mineral interest to Parker & Co. he severed it (if not already severed by the reservation in Julian F. Scott's deed) from the surface as completely as if the land had been cut into two distinct tracts. Catlin Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 176 Ill. 275, 52 N. E. 144; Ames v. Ames, 160 Ill. 599, 43 N. E. 592; New Jersey Zinc Co. v. New Jersey Franklinite [554] Co. 13 N. J. Eq. 322, 341-343; Gill v. Fletcher, 74 Ohio St. 295, 78 N. E. 433, 113 Am. St. Rep. 982; Lillibridge v. Lackawanna Coal Co. 143 Pa. St. 293, 22 Atl. 1035, 13 L.R.A. 627, 24 Am. St. Rep. 544; Gordon v. Park, supra; Wallace v. Elm Grove Coal Co. supra. Possession of the surface thereafter could not be possession of the severed mineral. Gordon v. Park, supra; Wallace v. Elm Grove Coal Co. supra; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Massey, 136 Ala. 156, 33 So. 896, 96 Am. St. Rep. 17; Catlin Coal Co. v. Lloyd, supra; Manning v. Kansas, etc. Coal Co. 181 Mo. 359, 377-379, 81 S. W. 140; Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. St. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436; Armstrong v. Caldwell, 53 Pa. St. 284; Huss v. Jacobs, 210 Pa. St. 145, 59 Atl. 991; Virginia Coal, etc. Co. v. Kelly, 93 Va. 332, 24 S. E. 1020. This is bound to be true, if, as all the authorities hold, distinct estates are created by the severance. And it also follows from the undoubted rule that the acts of possession required for the surface, and those for the minerals are different; the latter requiring some form of mining, or activities directly related thereto.

"The surface owner setting up the statute must establish a possession of the mine, as such, independently of his possession of the surface. Such a possession must be actual, notorious, exclusive, continuous, peaceable, and hostile for the statutory period. And in these respects the surface owner is in no better position than a stranger. . . . Actual possession is taken by the opening of mines and carrying on mining operations." [555] Gordon v. Park, supra; Barringer & Adams on the Law of Mines and Mining, p. 569.

It is true, as held in Finnegan v. Pennsylvania Trust Co. 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 124, that the true owner cannot by executing and recording a deed purporting to convey the mineral, so sever it as to interfere with an adverse possession already begun on the whole tract, or use such deed, as a substitute for a possessory action. The case is altogether different, however, when the person in possession himself surrenders that possession to another. No one doubts that if one in adverse possession of land should convey a distinct part of the tract to another, and place him in possession, or after his conveyance should abandon that possession, he could no longer claim that part of the land under the statute. It is true his vendee might receive the possession, and his subsequent possession, united with the prior possession of his vendor, might make out the seven years' adverse possession for him. So, too, if the land should be divided, by the supposed vendor, into two estates by severance of the mineral, the vendee might unite the possession existing before the severance with an immediate and continuous possession of the mineral after the severance, and so make out title to the mineral under the statute, but there would have to be appropriate possession of the latter; the statute could not be satisfied merely by the vendor's possession of the surface.

When it is said in the opinion in the McBurney Case that the court should not follow the decisions of other States on the point, but should hold as the better rule [556] that the possession of the surface was likewise possession of the severed mineral lying within the earth, not only was the uniform rule prevailing in all other jurisdictions disregarded, but our own prior case of Murray v. Allred as well, and something declared possession which, assuming the existence of a severance of the mineral from the surface, could not, in the nature of things, be possession, any more than one could be said to be in possession of the surface of land which he had conveyed to another, and on which his foot no longer rested. The decision in McBurney v. Coal, etc. Co. on the point stated is therefore unsound, and on that point must be overruled.

The decision could have been based only on one or the other of these two propositions, viz.: that a conveyance of the mineral did not sever it from the surface, or that if the conveyance did effect such severance, still the possession of the surface was also a possession of the severed mineral. Both propositions are without doubt in conflict with all the authorities, and against the common law. The common law binds courts only less firmly than statutes. Its rules are gradually, almost imperceptibly, enlarged or contracted by the courts, by construction, in the course of their application to new States of fact, to meet the needs of a progressive civilization, but it is not allowable to change them per saltum. This can be done only by legislation. It is true the courts of a State may refuse to follow even a consensus of authority in all other States, or even a perfectly well-recognized rule of the common-law, [557] on the ground that it is not suited to the genius of the State, or is opposed to its public policy. We know of no public policy of this State, however, which makes the settled rule of other mining States on the subject referred to inapplicable here. The public policy of a State is shown by its statutes and decisions. We have no applicable statute, but Murray v. Allred, supra, is evidence that we have no public policy which forbids the rule therein applied. That case has been approved in other States, and cited in their decisions, also in the text-books, and it was not in terms overruled, or dissented from, in McBurney v. Glenmary Coal, etc. Co. supra.

In respect of the point in the case last mentioned, to the effect that the question should be settled on the theory of a joint or mixed possession, we say such possession is always actual, and the matter for decision always is, to which one of several so in actual possession shall the law impute the legal or true possession, and the answer is, to that one who owns the legal title. Welcker v. Staples, 88 Tenn. 49, 12 S. W. 340, 17 Am. St. Rep. 869; Ramsey v. Quillen, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 184. In the first-cited case, the persons in actual possession were the husband and wife, and their children, with the legal title in the wife and children, and in the second, the husband and wife, with the title in the wife. In McBurney v. Glenmary Coal, etc. Co. there was no one in possession of the surface except John S. Diden; so the theory of joint or mixed possession could not be applicable. The only theory left is that Diden being [558] in possession of the surface, he was by force of that fact also in possession of the underlying coal, and held it as a trustee for the vendee thereof. But this is but another form of the theory which we have already shown is inadmissible, since it assumes that possession of the surface is possession of mineral severed from the surface.

We add one more observation. It was said in that case that it would be futile to give McBurney a recovery for the mineral because the statute had run against him as to the surface, and he could not therefore reach the mineral. This was not a sound reason for refusing to declare his right. Moreover there could be no obstacle to his reaching such minerals by mining or tunneling under the land in question from adjoining lands obtained by purchase or lease. But this would have been unnecessary, because when John S. Diden conveyed the minerals, he, by implication of law, conveyed the right to obtain access to them through the surface, and as against that purpose no longer held the surface adversely. That was an incident to the conveyance of the mineral right, and became a part of that right when severed.

As to the point that McBurney's claim was under another chain of title, we think undue importance was attached to it. The severance was made by Diden himself, thereby depriving himself of the possession of the minerals, and it was at last only a question of possession. Another view of the matter is, that inasmuch as John S. Diden claimed ultimately under Julian F. [559] Scott, and he had reserved the mineral interest in the deed which he made to Duncan, there was a severance of the mineral at the beginning of John S. Diden's title, with the incidental right of access reserved, but he never had color to the mineral interest, and therefore no sort of possession of it.

The result is that, Murray v. Allred, supra, is reinstated as authority, and following that case, and the authorities on which it is based, and others in accord, we hold that complainants did not acquire the mineral interest in the 177 acres, under the statute of limitations, or otherwise.

We are constrained to the same conclusion, in respect of the twenty-three acres, on the grounds stated in the early part of the opinion, that it does not appear that the land in question, or how much of it, was ever granted by this State or the State of North Carolina, as required by section 1 of chapter 28 of the Acts of 1819.

Therefore the whole bill must be dismissed at complainants' cost.

NOTE.

Resulting Rights of Mine Owner after Severance of Surface and Mineral Estates.

Introductory, 550.

Right in General, 551.

Right to Construct Railroad, 552.

Right to Use Surface and Openings to Remove Minerals from Adjoining Lands, 552.

Right to Deprive Surface of Support, 553.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases passing on the resulting rights of a mine owner after a severance of the surface and the mineral estates. For a discussion of the earlier cases, see the note to Schobert v. Pittsburgh Coal, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1913B 1104.

The presumption that the person having the possession of the surface has the possession of the subsoil also does not exist when those rights are severed; and possession of the surface owner is not adverse to the title of the owner of the coal and minerals. Shrewsbury v. Pocahontas Coal, etc. Co. 219 Fed. 142, 135 C. C. A. 40.

"After severance of the mineral in situ from the surface, the possession of the latter is not possession of the former. The effect of the severance is to create two closes adjoining but separate." Birmingham Fuel Co. v. Boshell, 190 Ala. 597, 67 So. 403. The mineral after severance is a corporeal hereditament, and mere nonuser will not affect the owner's title, and to lose his right, by adverse possession, the owner must be dispossessed. The effect of severance is to create two distinct estates. Hooper v. Bankhead, 171 Ala. 632, 54 So. 549. And see to that effect McBeth v. Wetnight, 57 Ind. App. 47, 106 N. E. 407; Hoilman v. Johnson, 164 N. C. 268, 80 S. E. 249.

The surface ownership of land may be in one man, and the minerals in another, in which case both are landowners. The owner of land may convey the surface to one and reserve to himself an estate in fee in the minerals, or vice versa, or may convey the surface to one and the minerals to another; and the effect of such a conveyance will be to create an estate separate and distinct in the sundered properties, the one from the other, entire and complete in fee simple. Ball v. Clark, 150 Ky. 383, 150 S. W. 359. And see the reported case.

Rights in General.

Because a mine may not be worked practically without other facilities, a grant of the minerals implies the right to construct and operate roads, tram and railway tracks on the surface for the use of the mine, to build air shafts, erect machinery, store water for the use of the engines, and in general to do that which is reasonably necessary for the use of the thing granted. Himrod v. Ft. Pitt Min. etc. Co. 220 Fed. 80, 135 C. C. A. 648 (238 Fed. 746, 151 C. C. A. 596), wherein it was said: "There are obvious degrees of necessity for the use of the surface in the conduct of subterranean mining operations, from the absolute necessity of sinking shafts or making other entrances to the minerals, to the practical necessities of business operations, such as the placing of steam engines and machinery at the mouth of the entrances, of constructing ponds of water to supply the engines, of laying and operating rail or tram ways to bring in supplies and to carry out the ore, of storage of minerals on the surface pending sales, of assembling houses, stores, and shops for the use of the miners; but such uses . . . [are] to be implied in the grants, if found to be necessary by the triers of fact. . . . It is equally obvious that a grant of the right to bore a tunnel or to sink a shaft may imply the right, as a reasonable necessity, to use the surface for the deposit of waste and debris brought from the tunnel or shaft, such necessity to be determined as a question of fact from the circumstances of the case."

One who has the exclusive right to mine coal on a tract of land, has the right of possession even as against the owner of the soil, so far as is reasonably necessary to carry on his mining operations. Bagley v. Republic Iron, etc. Co. 193 Ala. 219, 69 So. 17.

The right to coal deposits, when separated by grant or reservation in a deed, is as much of an estate inlands as the right to the surface of the same lands; and such an estate carries with it the right to use so much of the surface estate as may be reasonably necessary for the proper use of the mineral estate. Gordon v. Million, 248 Mo. 155, 154 S. W. 99. And see the reported case.

The grantee of a right to explore for oil and gas has a right to drill the surface of the land together with such right of ingress and egress on the surface as may be necessary for that purpose. He also has the right to a reasonable use of the surface to place derricks and other necessary machinery for drilling its wells. Chartiers Oil Co. v. Curtiss, 34 Ohio Cir. Ct. 106, judgment affirmed 98 Ohio St. 594, 106 N. E. 1053. See also Barker v. Campbell-Ratcliff Land Co. (Okla.) 167 Pac. 468.

It has been held that while there was no question as to the right of a mine owner to remove coal from around an iron casing which protected an artesian well and was driven through the mineral strata by the owner of the surface, where there was evidence that the casing was negligently destroyed by the mine owner in his mining operation and that he refused to admit the owner of the surface to enter the mine and repair it, he was liable in damages in an action of trespass. Pennsylvania Central Brewing Co. v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. 250 Pa. St. 300, 95 Atl. 471.

A grant of a right to mine coal giving the grantee "all the usual mining privileges for the removal of same and every part thereof from under and in said parcel of land, etc.," will not permit the grantee to mine coal within five feet of the dividing line in violation of a statute. Darby v. Davis Coal, etc.

Co. 74 W. Va. 295, Ann. Cas. 1916A 226, 81 S. E. 1124.

The fact that mining operations have been discontinued for a period of fifteen years does not prevent the mine owner from again using the surface to remove the remaining mineral. Sorg v. Frederick, 255 Pa. St. 617, 100 Atl. 481.

Right to Construct Railroad.

The right to construct tram roads or other means of transportation across the surface of the land for the purpose of mining and producing the minerals from other tracts of land is an easement appurtenant to the ownership of the minerals. Jones v. Island Creek Coal Co. (W. Va.) 91 S. E. 391. And see Himrod v. Ft. Pitt Min. etc. Co. 220 Fed. 80, 135 C. C. A. 648 (238 Fed. 746, 151 C. C. A. 596). But a right given to construct buildings, railroads and wagon roads, and such other facilities as may be necessary to a successful operation of the mine, does not entitle the owner of the mining right to construct a railroad for the purpose of general traffic which has no relation to the shipment of ore from the land. Howell v. Cuyuna Northern R. Co. 127 Minn. 480, 149 N. W. 942. And see Farrow v. Vansittart, 1 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 602, wherein a grant of land reserving in the grantor the mines and quarries with the right to mine, dig and carry away, etc., and particularly the right to lay down, make and grant wagon ways over the conveyed premises, was held not to enable the grantors or their lessees to construct a railway for the purpose of conveying passengers and general merchandise.

Right to Use Surface and Openings to Remove Minerals from Adjoining Lands.

A grantee of coal in place with irrevocable and perpetual license to mine and remove the coal from the land in which it is located, has the right, as an incident of the license to use the space made by mining the coal, for the purpose of removing coal taken from other and adjoining mines. This rule does not apply of course to mere lessees of land or of the surface, where the lease or grant is for the express purpose of transporting only the coal on or under such land; nor does it apply to cases where the time during which the right so to use the land is limited. Bagley v. Republic Iron, etc. Co. 193 Ala. 219, 69 So. 17, wherein the following facts appeared: "Appellants or their predecessors in title conveyed to appellee or its predecessors in title all the coal and minerals of whatever kind that lie on or below the surface of certain lands described, 'together with the right to mine said coal and other minerals, the right to use all necessary timber and water for such mining purposes, the right of way for all necessary roads, and all other rights and privileges which may be necessary for the proper mining and transportation of said minerals.' Appellee acquired from other parties lands adjoining those as to which appellants had conveyed the minerals and mining rights above described. Appellee opened an air shaft on the lands in question, constructed a fan thereon for the purpose of ventilating its coal mines which ramified the lands in question as well as other lands owned by appellee and acquired from third parties. The openings to the coal mines were on lands other than the ones in question, but the entries, following the seams of coal, had been extended to the lands in question, and a part of the coal thereon had been mined; and these underground entries which occupied the space from which the coal had been taken were used for laying tram tracks over which coal, not only from the lands in question but from other lands, was hauled to the tippie. Appellant Bagley filed this bill against Isaacs and appellee, to enjoin appellee from further using these entries on the lands in question, for transporting coal from other lands, and to enjoin the use of the air shafts, fans, etc., constructed thereon, for the purpose of facilitating the mining of coal from lands other than the ones in question; and to prevent the dumping of slate and refuse from such other lands upon the surface of the lands in question." The court said: "The question to be decided is: Does the use by appellee of the air shaft and fans, on the surface, and of the tram lines under the surface of the lands in question, for the purpose of mining coal from other lands, in connection with their use for mining coal from the lands in question, entitle the plaintiff to the injunctive relief sought? The learned chancellor held that plaintiff was not entitled to such relief, and we concur with him in his holding and opinion. He says: 'By virtue of its deed from Isaacs and Bagley defendant owns the coal thereby conveyed and the right to possession of the haulageway and the air shaft used in the mining of that coal. Having such right of possession, it could not while it continues the mining of that coal be guilty of a trespass or other wrong to complainant by mere occupancy of the haulageway or the shaft or by any use thereof which does not injure or interfere with the use of the nominal part of the land containing that coal. That such injurious interference results from the haulage of coal by defendant from its other lands through the passageway, or from the ventilation through the shaft of mines on such other lands, does not appear from the evidence. From such use of the haulageway and shaft defendant could have been restricted by contract, and this irrespective of whether the use is injurious; but there was express contract on the subject, nor is there in the terms of the deed by which the coal was conveyed to defendant anything from which such restriction can be implied. The expression of rights given defendant in that deed was of such rights only as were incident to the mining of the land therein mentioned. As to what use might be made of that land or of the haulageway or the shaft in the mining of other land, the deed is silent, and therefore the doctrine whereunder the expression in a contract of some rights is sometimes held to imply the exclusion of other rights does not here apply. Under these considerations, the court is brought to the conclusion that neither the complainant in the original bill nor the complainant in the cross bill is entitled to relief, and in this it is supported by the decisions in Lillibridge v. Lackawanna Coal Co. 143 Pa. St. 293, 22 Atl. 1035, 24 Am. St. Rep. 544, 13 L.R.A. 627; Schobert v. Pittsburgh Coal, etc. Co. 254 Ill. 474, 98 N. E. 945, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 628, Ann. Cas. 1913B 1104, and other authorities there cited."

Right to Deprive Surface of Support.

In the absence of a contract waiving surface support, the right of the owner of the surface to such support is absolute, and is not dependent on the degree of care that may be exercised in the operation of the mine. Chamber Colliery Co. v. Twyerould [1915] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 268; West Pratt Coal Co. v. Dorman, 161 Ala. 389, 18 Ann. Cas. 750, 49 So. 849, 135 Am. St. Rep. 127, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 805; Bibby v. Bunch, 176 Ala. 585, 58 So. 916; John Hill Coal, etc. Co. v. Bales, 183 Ind. 276, 108 N. E. 962; Collins v. Gleason Coal Co. 140 Ia. 114, 115 N. W. 497, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 736, affirmed in 140 Ia. 123, 118 N. W. 36, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 740; Walsh v. Kansas Fuel Co. 91 Kan. 310, 137 Pac. 941, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 686; Graff Furnace Co. v. Scranton Coal Co. 244 Pa. St. 592, 91 Atl. 508; Gordon v. Delaware, etc. Co. 253 Pa. St. 113, 97 Atl. 1033; Com. v. Clearview Coal Co. 256 Pa. St. 328, 100 Atl. 820, L.R.A. 1917E 672; Penman v. Jones, 256 Pa. St. 416, 100 Atl. 1043; Stonegap-Colliery Co. v. Hamilton, 119 Va. 271, Ann. Cas. 1917E 60, 89 S. E. 305. See also Robinson v. Boynton Coal Co. 58 Pa. Super. Ct. 176.

The great weight of authority, both English and American, undoubtedly supports the rule that where the ownership of the surface of the land has been severed from the ownership of the minerals under it, unless the matter has been otherwise determined by contract or conveyance, the owner of the surface has an absolute right to necessary support for his land. And if the owner of the minerals removes them entirely, so that injury results from the subsidence of the soil, he will be liable for the resulting damage, no matter how carefully or skilfully he may conduct his mining operations. He must either leave pillars or ribs of the mineral itself, or put in artificial supports sufficient to sustain the soil above. Collins v. Gleason Coal Co. 140 Ia. 114, 115 N. W. 497, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 736, affirmed in 140 Ia. 123, 118 N. W. 36, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 740. One who takes out the coal without leaving proper support is liable for damages to the owner of the surface, if the same subsides by reason of his failure to support it properly. John Hill Coal, etc. Co. v. Bales, 183 Ind. 276, 108 N. E. 962.

But the right to surface support may be waived, in which event the mine owner or those claiming under him may mine and remove all the coal underlying the surface lands, without thereby incurring liability for any damage done to the surface or the improvements erected thereon. Com. v. Clearview Coal Co. 256 Pa. St. 328, 100 Atl. 820, L.R.A. 1917E 672. The owner of the fee of the entire estate may grant the mineral estate and by apt words in the deed part with or release his right to surface support, in which event his grantee or those claiming under him may mine all the coal even though it results in the surface falling in. Graff Furnace Co. v. Scranton Coal Co. 244 Pa. St. 592, 91 Atl. 508.

In the absence of an express waiver or the use of words from which the intention to waive clearly appears, the grantee of mineral rights takes the estate subject to the burden of surface support; and the right to surface support is not affected by a clause providing that the owner of the coal in mining and removing it shall "do as little damage to the surface as possible." Penman v. Jones, 256 Pa. St. 416, 100 Atl. 1043.

The rule laid down by the authorities and sustained by the reason of the matter is that the right to mine is servient to the right of the owner of the surface to have it perpetually sustained in its natural state. Bibby v. Bunch, 176 Ala. 585, 58 So. 916, wherein it was said: "Where there has been a horizontal division of the land, the owner of the subjacent estate, coal or other mineral, owes to the superincumbent owner a right of support. This is an absolute right arising out of the ownership of the surface. Good or bad mining in no way affects the responsibility; what the surface owner has a right to demand is sufficient support, even, if to that end, it be necessary to leave every pound of coal untouched under his land. . . . 'I do not mean to say that all the coal does not belong to the defendants, but they cannot get it without leaving sufficient support." We have followed rigidly this rule, as thus tersely suggested, in all our decisions on the subject, and they have been many. Of course, defendant had a right to all the coal under this lot, but, he had no right to take any of it, if thereby, necessarily, the surface caved in. The measure of his enjoyment of his right must be determined by the measure of his absolute duty to the owner of the surface.' . . . Where the parties draw a dividing line, the law of the courts, following the logic of the facts of nature, gives first consideration to the ownership of the surface of the earth, the soil, from which the human family draws sustenance and on which it lives and moves, and declares, in the absence of special covenant to a contrary effect, the absolute right to its use and enjoyment, subject only to those rights in the owner of the underlying minerals which are necessarily implied by a severance of the two estates, and which are conceded by appellee in this cause. This court has considered land as per se property of peculiar value, and has made it the subject of protection against trespasses destructive to its substance without regard to the question whether, in the particular case, it really has any peculiar value or not, just as in cases of contract it is made a subject for specific performance without regard to its quality, use, or value. Where a threatened wrong would destroy the substance of the inheritance, ruin the estate, or permanently impair its future use in the manner in which the owner is entitled to use and enjoy it, pecuniary compensation is inadequate, the injury is irreparable at law, and the interference of equity is demanded."

But where the right to mine coal is specifically granted or reserved without responsibility for surface support, the owner of that right is not liable to the surface owner for a subsidence of the surface and this even though the municipality is the owner of the surface. Scranton City v. Phillips, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 633.

A grant of land with a reservation of the coal mines and a right to work the mines according to the best and most approved mode of working similar mines in the district, and a provision that "reasonable recompense and satisfaction being made for any injury done to the said demised premises by reason of the exercise of any of the rights aforesaid whether by letting down the surface or otherwise," has been held to be a clear implication of the right to cause subsidence and of a waiver by the owner of the surface of his right to surface support. *Jones v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE COMPANY

v.

CITY OF MONTGOMERY.

Alabama Supreme Court—June 17, 1915.

193 Ala. 234; 69 So. 428.

Actions — Moot Case — What Constitutes.

A moot case is one which seeks to determine an abstract question, not resting upon existing facts or rights, and such case will not be determined by the court merely to determine who is liable for costs.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a telegraph company was enjoined, during the year 1914, from carrying on intrastate business within the state because it had not paid the city license fees, and the city had given the statutory bond to secure the injunction, the case will not, after the expiration of the year, be deemed moot, so as to preclude a review of the question by the court, for a dismissal of the appeal would result in leaving the question of whether the issuance of the injunction was wrongful undetermined, and would not give the telegraph company any rights under the bond; this being true, even though it might be maintained that the city, as an arm of the state, was not required to give bond.

[See note at end of this case.]

Licenses — Failure to Pay License Fee — Injunction against Continuing Business.

Where it appeared that the manager of the defendant telegraph company had been convicted for not paying the city license as required, and it was not shown wherein an action at law to recover the license would prove ineffective, a bill to enjoin the company from carrying on intrastate business from that office until payment of the license is without equity, and should be dismissed.

Appeal from City Court of Montgomery:
GUNTER, Judge.

Action by City of Montgomery, plaintiff, against Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. REVERSED.

[234] The City of Montgomery filed this bill against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, alleging in substance as follows: That the respondent is engaged in business in Montgomery; that the city commission of [235] Montgomery on December 2, 1913, adopted an ordinance prescribing the amount of license to be paid for certain businesses, vocations, etc., for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1914, and ending December 31, 1914, of which ordinance section 188 had to deal with the business of telegraph companies, fixing their license tax, and confining same to intrastate business, excluding business done for the United States government; that subsequently, on July 21, 1914, said commission amended said section 188, which amendment is set up in paragraph 4 of the bill, but as to which we deem further reference unnecessary. Paragraph 5 of the bill sets forth section 985 of the City Code of Montgomery, which it is alleged is still in force and effect, and which section prescribes a penalty against any person, firm, or corporation who shall engage in any business, etc., for which a license is required by any ordinance of the city, without first obtaining such license, and fixes a punishment for each day such business is so carried on, and a fine to be imposed upon conviction. In the sixth paragraph it is alleged that at all times during the year 1914, and up to the time of filing the bill, on October 3, 1914, the respondent has been operating a telegraph office in this city, and has never paid any license to the city of Montgomery for the year 1914. It is further alleged that on June 23, 1914, the complainant caused the arrest of the manager of the respondent's business in the city of Montgomery for the unlawful act of doing business as aforesaid without having procured the license required, making for each day's business a separate and distinct charge; and it is further alleged that the said manager was tried before the city recorder on several of the said charges, and convicted, and that he has appealed from said conviction [236] to the city court of Montgomery, where each of the said appeals is still pending, and that notwithstanding the said arrest of the manager the respondent continues to do business in this city without a license. In the ninth paragraph complainant avers that it is without an adequate remedy at law, for the reason that notwithstanding the arrest and conviction of its manager the respondent continues to carry on its business, and that, if complainant elected to bring an action at law for the amount of the license due it, such action would offer no adequate relief from the continued violation of said ordinance, but that such violation would, in the belief of complainant, continue from day to day, notwithstanding any action at law which it might bring. The prayer of the bill is for a perpetual injunction against the respondent's maintaining and operating a telegraph office in the city of Montgomery without complying with the ordinance requiring the procurement of a license for such business. A temporary injunction was asked for, during the pendency of the suit. The application for a fiat was set down for hearing as authorized by section 4528 of the Code; and on December 11, 1914, the judge of the city court entered the order for a temporary injunction as prayed, "effective during the year 1914," upon condition of the complainant's entering into a bond in the sum of $500, conditioned as prescribed by law. The temporary injunction was issued in compliance with this order, and thereby the respondent company, its officers, agents, and employees, were enjoined from having, maintaining, or operating a telegraph office in the city of Montgomery for any other purpose than the doing business for the United States government, or interstate business, without compliance with the ordinances of said city relating [237] to such companies, which said writ of injunction was duly served on December 12th. From the order granting the temporary relief of injunction, the respondent prosecutes this appeal, and the cause was argued and submitted on January 4, 1915.

Edward S. Watts for appellee.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL.

GARDNER, J.—(1) Counsel for appellee moved to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that the same is prosecuted from an order granting a temporary writ of injunction which by its terms was effective only during the year 1914, and that as that time had expired prior to the submission of the cause, although not at the time the appeal was in fact taken, therefore the appeal presents only an abstract question for determination and is a moot case. In Adams v. Union R. Co. 21 R. I. 134, 42 Atl. 515, 44 L.R.A. 273, cited also in 27 Cyc. 911, it is said: "A moot case is one which seeks to determine an abstract question, which does not rest upon existing facts or rights."

In Agee v. Cate, 180 Ala. 522, 61 So. 900, it was said by this court: "Nor is it customary to decide questions of importance, after their decision has become useless, merely to ascertain who is liable for the costs."

We are unable to agree that this appeal does not affect the existing rights, and that the question involved is only one of costs.

(2) The complainant in the court below sought and obtained an injunction against the respondent's transacting [238] intrastate business in the city of Montgomery, and the writ issued prohibited the transaction of any such business from December 12, 1914, to January 1, 1915. As a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ the court below required the complainant to enter into bond payable to the respondent as required by law, and which condition reads as follows: "Now, if the said city of Montgomery and its sureties, or either of them, shall pay or cause to be paid all damages and costs which any person may sustain by the suing out of said temporary injunction or restraining order, if the same is dissolved, then this obligation to be void; otherwise, to remain in full force and effect."

The right of the city to thus prevent the respondent from engaging in intrastate business for this period of time is clearly a question which the respondent had a right to have determined by the court of last resort. The injunction bond was required for its protection against damages which it might sustain by the suing out of the temporary writ of injunction, should same be dissolved. The condition of liability upon the bond is the dissolution of the injunction. A dismissal of this appeal would result in leaving the question of whether or not the issuance of the injunction was wrongful, and the consequent question as to whether or not the injunction should be dissolved, undetermined, and therefore leave without adjudication the question touching the very condition of the bond, and, of consequence, that of liability thereon. To hold that merely because the year 1914 had passed before this cause was submitted would deprive this respondent of the right to have adjudicated to its final conclusion the right of the city to close its place of business for intrastate business would, in effect, be to close the door of the [239] court to this appellant to have determined the question as to the liability of the city upon the said injunction bond. This latter is clearly an existing right, which the respondent is entitled to have adjudicated in the courts of last resort.

The suggestion of counsel that the city (it being a part of the state government) should not have been required to make the bond and the argument that therefore the city would not be liable upon said bond, is beside the mark and premature. These are matters with which we are not concerned, for the question upon the motion is the right of the respondent to have the matter of liability tested and adjudicated in a due and orderly manner should it be held that the injunction was improperly granted. The dismissal of an appeal for the reason urged (that it is a moot question), and where only the question of costs is involved, is a matter which must largely rest in the discretion of the court, and while, as stated in Agee v. Cate, supra, it is not customary to decide questions of importance after their decision has become useless, merely to ascertain who is liable for the costs, yet in our case of Comer v. Bankhead, 70 Ala. 136, the court did not dismiss the appeal, but determined the question and reversed the cause, at the cost of the appellee. Nor is our conclusion in conflict with what was said in the case of Montgomery County v. Montgomery Traction Co. 140 Ala. 458, 37 So. 208. There the injunction issued was merely directed against the board of revenue of Montgomery county to prevent its interference with the railway tracks of the complainant, or, in other words, to hold the property of the complainant in statu quo pending the determination of the issue by the court. Indeed, the situation was the reverse of what we have here, [240] and the opinion stated that it was apparent there was nothing to be accomplished by a decree on the merits of the issue, and no reference was made therein to the injunction bond or any liability thereon. Quite a different situation is presented when conditions are reversed, and when the business of the respondent has been materially interfered with and property rights are involved.

We are of the opinion that this record does not present what is called a moot case, but that in fact existing rights of the parties are involved which it is the duty of this court to determine. The motion to dismiss the appeal will therefore be denied.

ON THE MERITS.

(3) The bill, in substance, merely seeks injunctive relief against the violation by respondent of the ordinance of the city relating to the payment of a revenue license. It is not alleged that the respondent is insolvent, nor indeed is it disclosed why the relief at law is not adequate and complete. That the jurisdiction of a court of equity is exclusively civil is well established in this state, and a few brief quotations from our own authorities will suffice to demonstrate that the bill is without equity. In Moses v. Mobile, 52 Ala. 198, this court, speaking through Chief Justice Brickell, said: "At one time the Court of Chancery in England, exercised a jurisdiction partaking of a criminal character, but it was not without objection and protest from the Commons and the common-law courts. It was excused, rather than justified, because of the inability of other tribunals to maintain internal peace and order, and because it was exercised for the defense of the poor and helpless. It passed away, when [241] the necessity for its exercise ceased, and the common-law tribunals were restored to power sufficient for the repression of violence and wrong. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 341, c. 4. Since, the jurisdiction of a court of equity has been purely and exclusively civil."

And in Brown v. Birmingham, 140 Ala. 590, 37 So. 173, is the following language: "We discover nothing in the case made by the bill to take it out of the well-settled general doctrine that the jurisdiction of courts of equity is purely and exclusively civil; that, of consequence, they are without power to enjoin the commission of threatened crimes on the one hand, and to enjoin threatened prosecution for the commission of alleged crimes on the other; that violations of state laws and violations of penal municipal ordinances, and prosecutions for both, stand upon the same footing in this connection; and that it is wholly immaterial that the statute or ordinance, for an alleged violation of which prosecution is threatened, is absolutely void."

The case of Pike County Dispensary v. Brundige, 130 Ala. 193, 30 So. 451, is an authority directly in point, and is conclusive against the equity of this bill. The facts of the case and purpose of the bill are to be easily ascertained by reference thereto. The town of Brundige sought to enjoin the operation of a dispensary for the sale of liquors within its corporate limits, not only upon the ground that the dispensary corporation had not procured a county license therefor, but upon the ground that a local prohibition law was in force, covering the place where the dispensary was proposed to be operated, and which would, therefore, be in violation of said local prohibition law and constitute a public nuisance. The following [242] quotation from the opinion is sufficient for the purposes of this case: "If it be conceded that the Pike County Dispensary has no right to engage in the liquor business without paying the county license tax, and may not legally engage in such business in Brundige under any circumstances because of the local prohibition statute referred to, the present bill is yet without equity, since chancery courts have no jurisdiction, to enjoin the commission of offenses against the criminal laws of the state; and the proposed acts of the respondent, however illegal they may be, would not constitute a nuisance."

Numerous authorities cited by counsel for appellee have been examined, but the diligence of learned counsel has not been rewarded with "a case in point," and we find among those to which our attention has been directed none which militates against the conclusion here reached. We are referred, among our cases, to Bryan v. Birmingham, 154 Ala. 447, 45 So. 922, 129 Am. St. Rep. 63; but that case supports, rather than conflicts with, the conclusion reached in this case. At the outset of the opinion it is recognized that: "The jurisdiction of equity is purely and exclusively civil, and such courts are without power to enjoin or restrain threatened . . . prosecutions under municipal ordinances as well as state laws. . . . Applying this rule, the courts should not lost sight of the fact that a court of equity can and should interfere by injunction to restrain any act or proceeding whether connected with crime, or not, which tends to the destruction or impairment of property or property rights."

It is thus seen that case is in harmony with our other decisions, and that what was really involved therein was the right of injunctive relief against the destruction [243] or impairment of property rights. This was also the principle involved in the case of Mobile v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 84 Ala. 115, 4 So. 106, 5 Am. St. Rep. 342, which involved the invasion of a vested franchise right. The case of State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564, also cited by counsel for appellee, involved the obstruction of a public highway in the city of Mobile, and clearly has no bearing on the instant case.

The general rule, as stated in the above authorities, and which appears to be well-nigh universally recognized, seems to be conceded as correct by counsel for appellee; but the insistence is made that the continuation of the business of the respondent without payment of the city license is a nuisance, and jurisdiction is sought to be rested upon this theory. As above shown, the authorities from our own jurisdiction will lend no color whatever to this argument, nor, indeed, does it find support in any of the cases cited from other jurisdictions. That of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 S. Ct. 273, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 205, involved the question of the Kansas liquor law, the violation of which was made a nuisance by the statute and its abatement as such provided for. Somewhat similar is the case of Carleton v. Rugg, 149 Mass. 550, 22 N. E. 55, 5 L.R.A. 193, 14 Am. St. Rep. 446, which involved a statute giving jurisdiction in equity to abate by injunction as a common nuisance any place used for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The case of State v. Cauty, 207 Mo. 439, 105 S. W. 1078, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 747, 123 Am. St. Rep. 393, 13 Ann. Cas. 787, was one in which the state sought injunctive relief against a form of entertainment, such as "bull-fighting," and where it was alleged that it was an offense against public order, common [244] good, and public decency, and tended to corrupt the morals of the people and to disturb the peace. The case of Columbian Athletic Club v. State, 143 Ind. 98, 40 N. E. 914, 28 L.R.A. 727, 52 Am. St. Rep. 407, was of a somewhat similar character, involving the question of prize fighting. That of Atty. Gen. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 35 Wis. 435, involved a question of railroad rates. State v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182, involved a statute of the state of Kansas pronouncing saloons in which liquors are sold to be nuisances and providing for their abatement. Kansas v. Lindsay, 85 Kan. 79, 116 Pac. 207, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 810, involved the right to maintain a hospital for the insane for compensation, without a license; the law providing that license should be issued only upon a showing of plans and facilities such as the board deemed adequate and suitable for such an important undertaking. The bill in that case also charged that insane patients in such asylum shrieked, made outcries, exposed their persons, and escaped or attempted to escape, and that defendants, in persistently violating the laws of the state in keeping the asylum, inflicted an injury upon the public and created a common nuisance.

A review of the authorities to which we have here referred sufficiently demonstrates that they are without application in the case at bar and lend no support to the contention that this case presents an exception to the general rule. The rule is recognized by Mr. Pomeroy (5 Eq. Jur. § 476) that: "A Court of equity is in no sense a court of criminal jurisdiction. Its primary province is the protection of property rights."

In section 478, speaking to the question of nuisances and of violations of city ordinances, he says: "But the [245] mere violation of the ordinance is no ground for relief, unless the acts themselves actually constitute a nuisance."

Here the bill seeks to enjoin the respondent from conducting its intrastate business because of its failure to procure the revenue license required by the city. The business conducted by the respondent is recognized as not only entirely legitimate and in no manner injurious to the commercial world. Nothing appears in the bill to show why the relief sought at law for the recovery of the amount of the revenue license is not an adequate remedy; and the bill shows that the manager of the respondent corporation has been prosecuted for a violation of the ordinance, and convicted in the recorder's court, and that his case is now pending on appeal in the city court. Further discussion, however, we deem unnecessary. We are clearly convinced that the bill is wholly wanting in equity. The only decree, rendered in the cause, from which this appeal is prosecuted, is that granting the temporary injunction as prayed for in the bill; the demurrers on file not having been passed upon by the judge of the city court. The judgment here rendered, therefore, can only relate to this order, and the cause will be remanded to the city court, for disposition there in accordance with the views here expressed.

Our conclusion is, therefore, that there was error in ordering the temporary injunction to issue in this cause, because of want of equity in the bill. A decree will be here entered, reversing the order to that effect in the court below, and dissolving the temporary injunction; and the cause will be remanded for further proceedings in that court in conformity to this opinion.

Reversed, rendered, and remanded. All the Justices concur, except Sayre, J., who dissents in part, as he [246] entertains the view that the record presents a moot case, and that therefore the motion to dismiss the appeal should prevail.

NOTE.

What Constitutes Moot Case.

Generally.

"It has long been settled law that, if one of the litigating parties, by purchase or otherwise, extinguish the claim of the opposite party, or if the parties, by collusion, endeavor to obtain from a court a decision upon a moot question, having no substantial right in actual controversy between them for determination, the court will refuse to take further cognizance of the matter and dismiss the proceeding, if pending, or decline to take jurisdiction if the status of the parties and object of the proceeding appear, when the aid of the court is invoked." State v. Lambert, 52 W. Va. 249, 43 S. E. 176. And see 1 R. C. L. tit. Actions, p. 317.

In Adams v. Union R. Co. 21 R. I. 134, 140, 42 Atl. 515, 44 L.R.A. 273, a moot case was defined as follows: "A moot case is one which seeks to determine an abstract question, which does not rest upon existing facts or rights. Where a concrete case of fact or right is shown, we know of no principle or policy of law which will deprive a part of the determination simply because his motive in the assertion of such right is to secure such determination. It is a matter of common practice." The following cases have approved the foregoing definition: Ex p. Steele, 162 Fed. 694, 702, 20 Am. Bankr. Rep. 575; State v. Dolley, 82 Kan. 533, 108 Pac. 846; Winslow v. Gayle, 172 Ky. 126, 188 S. W. 1059; Bunning v. Com. 177 Ky. 155, 197 S. W. 542; State v. Lincoln

First Catholic Church, 88 Neb. 2, 128 N. W. 657. And see the reported case.

In State v. Dolley, 82 Kan. 533, 537, 108 Pac. 846, it was said: "It is universally understood by the bench and bar . . . that a moot case is one which seeks to get a judgment on pretended controversy, when in reality there is none, or a decision in advance about a right before it has been actually asserted and contested, or a judgment upon some matter which, when rendered, for any reason, cannot have any practical legal effect upon a then existing controversy. . . . When there is an actual, bona fide contest as to a legal right, an agreement to put the case, when made, by actual exercise of the right and resistance to it, in such shape that the right can be readily determined by the court, especially when the dispute concerns a matter of public moment, which should be speedily settled, has never been condemned by the courts. It is a common, every day practice in every state of the Union. The noted Legal Tender Cases were made up in that way." Ex p. Steele, 162 Fed. 694, 701."

In Sherod v. Aitchison, 71 Ore. 446, 142 Pac. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916C 1151, the court said: "A case in which a party seeks to have determined in a judicial proceeding an abstract question which does not arise upon existing facts or involve conflicting rights, so far as he is concerned, presents a moot inquiry."

Illustrations.

In State v. Lincoln First Catholic Church, 88 Neb. 2, 128 N. W. 657, the suit was brought by the attorney general at the direction of the board of public lands and buildings to quiet title to some land which had previously been conveyed to trustees for a religious organization under the authority conferred by a statute, it being claimed that the religious organization took no title because it was not incorporated. A decree being rendered in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appealed, and on the appeal a brief was filed by friends of the court who represented clients of theirs who they claimed were interested in the result of the action for the reason that the defendant claimed to have made a contract within them for the sale of the property in dispute. The brief contained the following statement: "There is nothing in controversy between the plaintiff and the defendants. It is purely a moot case, brought by the direction of the board of public lands and buildings, at the instance and request, as we think, of Bishop Bonacum. It is not even a moot case, so far as the plaintiff and the defendants are concerned, because in such a case there is something submitted for decision, while in this case there is nothing to submit for decision, as far as they are concerned. Yet, if this court should permit this case to be maintained, its action will be presented in the ecclesiastical tribunal, we fear, as a decision adverse to our clients of the points involved between them and the bishop, and we respectfully submit that this court should not be used to serve such a purpose." Holding that the case was not a moot one, the court said: "We frankly admit that, if it were shown that the suit does not present conflicting interests between the parties to it, we would hesitate to take jurisdiction, even on appeal, but we are unable to find any evidence in the record that such is the case. The action is brought by and under the direction of the board of public lands and buildings, and it was evidently their intention to procure a settlement of the question of the title to the property. It is clear from the issues presented that the demands of the parties are adverse. The fact that the suit may be a friendly one, if true, would not of necessity render the suit a moot case."

In Empire Coal Co. v. Bowen, 195 Ala. 348, 70 So. 283, an action to recover damages for personal injuries, it appeared that after the recovery of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and an appeal therefrom the plaintiff, without the consent of his counsel, for a valuable consideration executed a release of any damages to which he might be entitled by reason of the judgment, and transferred to the defendant all his right, title and interest therein. On the hearing of the appeal the defendant moved for a dismissal on the ground that the case was moot. Overruling the motion, the court said: "It appears without contradiction, however, that counsel for appellee who make this motion were the counsel representing the plaintiff in the recovery of said judgment, and that as such counsel they are interested in the judgment, claiming a lien thereon for their attorney's fee, and are claiming a liability on the part of appellant to the extent thereof. Subdivision 2 of section 3011 of the Code of 1907, which deals with the question of the lien of an attorney upon a judgment for money, was given consideration in the recent case of Fuller v. Lanett Bleaching Co. 186 Ala. 117, 65 So. 61. The question there determined is, in our opinion, decisive of the motion in this case against contention of counsel for appellee. This is not, therefore, a 'moot case.' See Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Montgomery, 193 Ala. 234, 69 So. 428, where some of the authorities in question of what is a moot case are reviewed. The motion to dismiss is overruled."

In Bokel, etc. Co. v. Costello, 22 App. Cas. (D. C.) 81, a judgment debtor who had made a fraudulent conveyance of his property was proceeded against under a writ of capias ad

satisfaciendum. On a trial of the case a verdict was directed in favor of the debtor although his insolvency and the fraudulent conveyance were proven by undisputed testimony. On an appeal being taken by the plaintiff, it was contended that it was immaterial whether or not the trial court erred. Answering this contention the appellate court said: "The contention of the appellee that the question before us is in any event no more than an academic case, since, as he claims, the defendant having been discharged by the judgment of the court below cannot again be arrested, is substantially an argument to the effect that, in this class of cases, an erroneous decision by the trial court is sufficient, by reason of its very error, to oust this court of jurisdiction in such cases on appeal. We do not think that this contention need to be here seriously considered."

In re Gering, 88 Neb. 192, 129 N. W. 430, an appeal was taken from an order dismissing an appeal from the overruling of a remonstrance against the issuance of a druggist of a permit for the sale of intoxicating liquors. A motion was made by the applicant for the permit to dismiss the appeal on the ground that as he had disposed of his drug store, the record presented only a moot question. Answering this contention, the court said: "The contention that the record presents only a moot question cannot be sustained. When the district court dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal the defendant was entitled to his permit, and it appears that for some time thereafter he enjoyed its benefits. If it be a fact that defendant has disposed of his stock of drugs to another who is conducting the business in the same building formerly used by him for that purpose, that fact does not prevent him from repurchasing the stock or again engaging in the business in the same building and making sales of intoxicating liquors under the terms of his permit. It is not shown that the permit has been relinquished, nor has it been canceled by the city council. It further appears that this case was advanced under the rule in order to secure the plaintiffs the benefit of their appeal; that the permit in question will not expire until April, 1911, and therefore it cannot be said that in deciding this case we would only be deciding a moot question."

In Funk, etc. Co. v. Stamm, 85 N. J. L. 301, 88 Atl. 1050, a foreign corporation brought an action to recover the unpaid portion of the purchase price of a set of books which the defendant had bought. The suit was defended on the ground that the contract was made within the state and consequently could not be sued on by the plaintiff because it had not obtained a certificate authorizing it to do business in the state. It was admitted by the agreed facts that the contract was made within the state, but the facts actually showed that it was not made within the state. Discussing the effect of the admission and holding that the question sought to be raised was a moot one, the court said: "The apparent purpose of this concession by the plaintiff was to obtain the opinion of the court upon an assumed situation, otherwise unnecessary, as to the effect of the statute above mentioned upon interstate business conducted as was that of the plaintiff, for the entire argument in this court is directed to that question. The conclusion we have reached is, that the undisputed facts submitted permit but one inference and that is, that this contract was not made in this state. The admission of a contrary result by the plaintiff is a conclusion, not of fact, but of the legal consequence of the facts stated, which is not binding upon a court, for parties to a litigation cannot, by agreement, deprive a court of its undoubted right to determine the legal effect of the uncontradicted facts appearing in a cause, by an admission inconsistent with the legal conclusion arising therefrom. The case sought to be presented seeks the determination of an abstract question which does not arise upon existing facts, a situation which falls within the definition of a moot case (Bl. L. Dict. (2d ed.) 791), but is based on an erroneous conclusion of the legal effect of existing facts."

In Potter v. Younts, 172 Ky. 130, 188 S. W. 1059, it was held that where on an appeal it appeared that a reversal of the judgment would accomplish nothing and an affirmance would not benefit the appellee, the appeal presented a moot question and would be dismissed.

AXTON FISHER TOBACCO COMPANY

v.

EVENING POST COMPANY ET AL.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—March 9, 1916.

169 Ky. 64; 183 S. W. 269.

Pleading — Demurrer — Admission of Averments.

General demurrers to the petition and amended petition admit the truth of all material averments therein.

Libel and Slander — Pleading — Necessity of Alleging Special Damage.

Where publications are libelous per se, it is not essential to a good cause of action that special damage should be alleged; but, if the publication is not so obviously defamatory that the inference of injury may be drawn, it can only be made actionable when the complaining party pleads and proves that it has in fact damaged him.

What Constitutes Libel — Person Inaccurately Designated.

When a publication as a whole is plainly directed at a person or corporation, the person or corporation so assailed may maintain an action for libel as if he or it were particularly named or described, though the name has not been accurately designated in the publication.

Words Libelous per Se.

If a written or printed publication tends to degrade a person, that is, to reduce his character or reputation in the estimation of his friends or acquaintances, or the public, or to disgrace him, or to render him odious, ridiculous, or contemptible, it is "libelous per se," though spoken words are "slanderous per se" only if they falsely impute the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, an infectious disease, or unfitness to perform duties of an office or employment, prejudice him in his profession or trade, or tend to disinherit him.

Libel or Slander of Corporation.

The distinction between libel and slander obtains as fully with respect to corporations as to individuals.

Same.

A corporation may maintain an action for slander or libel, but only when the words complained of injure it in a business way, since it is only in respect to business that a corporation can be affected or injured.

Same.

To render a publication concerning a corporation "libelous per se," it must reasonably and naturally appear that it was of a nature to deprive the corporation of patronage or trade, or to render it odious and contemptible in the estimation of those with whom it did have or might reasonably expect to have business dealings, but it is not necessary that the publication misrepresent the character or condition of the corporation's marketable products, the methods by which its internal affairs are conducted, its capacity, or business dealings toward the public, or its products, its attitude, its business, or its stability, so as to affect its credit.

Libelous Words — Charge of Unfair

Treatment of Labor.

A publication, charging that a tobacco company paid an average wage less than its competitors, required its employees to work a greater number of hours per day, and that the sanitary conditions of its rivals were better than those of the company, is not libelous per se.

Same.

A publication, charging that a tobacco company placed a negro foreman over white girls, that they quit work and reported the trouble to the union, was libelous per se.

Charge that Name of Employer Was on "Unfair List."

A charge that, on refusal of a tobacco company to remove a negro foreman placed over white girls, the company was placed on the unfair list by the local union, and this action was ratified by the tobacco workers' international union, and that the advertising cards of the company were printed in "scab" shops, so as to display its contempt for organized labor, in connection with matter of inducement that the company employed only union labor, that it received from the union the right to place its label on its products, and had obligated itself to patronize only union shops, that it dealt fairly with its employees and had a good reputation with organized labor and wage-earners, and innuendo that the effect of these publications was to destroy the company's good reputation with organized labor and the public, as the operator of a union factory, is libelous.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The court will take notice that union labor constitutes a large, influential, and well-organized body of the laboring people of the state and country, that the wage-earners, including those who are members of the union, compose a large part of the population, and that labor unions have adopted and promulgated rules and regulations for the protection and guidance of labor, which are carefully observed by the members.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In determining whether a publication charging that a tobacco company was placed on the unfair list and had its advertising printed in scab shops, is libelous per se, the court will consider matter in the petition set out by way of inducement and innuendo.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson county, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Action by Axton Fisher Tobacco Company, plaintiff, against Evening Post Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

J. E. Wise, W. J. Boles and Burton Vance for appellant.

Humphrey, Middleton & Humphrey and Gibson & Crawford for appellees.

[66] CARROLL, J.—This is a libel suit brought by the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co., a corporation engaged, in Louisville, Ky., in manufacturing and selling smoking and chewing tobacco and especially in the manufacture and sale of the brands known as "Old Hill Side" and "Booster Twist." The defendants are the Evening Post Co., the publishers of the Evening Post, a daily newspaper in the city of Louisville having a wide circulation in that city and elsewhere, and Richard W. Knott, editor, and Lewis C. Humphrey, associate editor of the paper.

To the petition and amended petition of the plaintiff general demurrers were filed by the defendants and sustained, and, declining to plead further, the petitions were dismissed, and the plaintiff brings the case to this court.

The demurrers admit the truth of all the material averments in the petition and amended petition, and so the only question before us is, did these pleadings, assuming the averments to be true, state a good cause of action against the defendants?

The petition, after averring that the plaintiff was engaged in manufacturing and selling smoking and chewing tobacco, further averred that it "had been for many years prior thereto especially engaged in the manufacture and sale of its brands of smoking and twist tobacco widely [67] and favorably known as 'Old Hill Side' and 'Booster Twist,' and it had, on and prior to said dates, acquired, enjoyed and deserved a good reputation with the trade and the public as a manufacturer of tobacco, and especially of said brands of tobacco, and had built up, enjoyed and deserved an extensive demand for, and sale of, its said products and brands of tobacco, from which it received a valuable and ever increasing profit.

"That in the introduction of its said brands of tobacco 'Old Hill Side' and 'Booster Twist' to the trade and the public throughout the United States, and in establishing their said good reputation and in acquiring said good reputation with, and good will of the trade and public, as a manufacturer of tobacco, and as the manufacturer of said brands of tobacco, it expended a great many thousands of dollars, and said brands, and plaintiff's reputation and good will therein, constituted plaintiff's most valuable asset, and was on said several dates fairly and reasonably worth the sum of three hundred thousand dollars.

"That it had for many years, at all times operated a union factory and employed union labor in the manufacture of its said tobacco, and had at all times paid its employees engaged in its manufacture the union scale of wages, and in many instances largely in excess of the union scale, and at all times and in all ways dealt fairly and justly with its employees; and by reason of these facts it had on said dates acquired and enjoyed a good reputation with, and the good will of, organized labor and wage earners in Kentucky and throughout the United States, and had especially acquired with them a valuable reputation and good will as the manufacturer of, and for 'Old Hill Side' and 'Booster Twist' as union made tobaccos, and had built up and enjoyed an extensive demand for, and sale of said tobacco to them, which constituted the larger part of the demand for said brands.

"That at all the times hereinbefore and hereinafter mentioned or referred to plaintiff was conducting and operating its said business and its said factory as a unionized factory pursuant to the terms of a contract existing between it and the Tobacco Workers' International Union, a corporation organized and existing under an act of the Congress of the United States of America, by which said union granted to it the right to place on tobacco manufactured by it the label of said union and bound itself to [68] furnish all the said labels required by plaintiff for said purpose, and in consideration of which plaintiff obligated and bound itself to said union, among other things, 'That all persons employed by it in the manufacture of tobacco should be members of the Tobacco Workers' International Union exclusively,' and 'That it would pay to its said employees the scale of wages approved of and agreed to between it and said union.' That at all said times a scale of wages was in force between it and said union under said contract which had been approved and agreed upon between it and said union.

"That the right granted it by said contract to affix said union label to tobacco manufactured by it was a very valuable asset to it in its said business, and by the terms of said contract a failure upon its part to strictly comply with its obligations to pay to its employees wages according to the said scale of wages agreed upon would operate to deprive it of the further use of said union label."

In paragraph 1, it was averred:

"That in several editions of the Evening Post printed, published and circulated by the defendants on October 4, 1913, 'they wilfully, knowingly and maliciously published of and concerning the plaintiff and its business of manufacture of tobacco; of and concerning the wages paid by it in its factory to its employees; of and concerning its methods of conducting its business, and of and concerning the character and kind of men it employed as foremen in its factory, the following false and defamatory statements:

"'Axton (meaning plaintiff) has a negro foreman over white men. That official figures furnished the State Labor Department show that Mr. Axton (meaning plaintiff) pays an average wage considerably less than that paid by the American Tobacco Co. Official record: Here is what the official record of the State Department of Labor and Statistics shows about the Axton's corporation's tobacco factory (meaning plaintiff's factory) compared with other factories: The tobacco trust pays many of its employees wages as high as $14.95 per week; the Burley Tobacco Company pays as high as $12 per week; while the highest wage the Axton factory (meaning plaintiff) pays to any of its employees is $8.75 per week.

"'The sanitary conditions provided by the other factories are also shown by the records to be much better [69] than those furnished by the corporation (meaning this plaintiff) of which Mr. Axton is the head.

"Here are official figures: Axton Fisher Tobacco Factory, Thirteenth and Rowan: Number of hours per day, 10; number of hours per week, 59; highest wages, $8.75; average wage, $7.00.

"American Tobacco Company, Eighteenth and Broadway: Number of hours per week, 55; highest wage, $14.95; average wage $7.50.

"Burley Tobacco Company, Jackson and Caldwell: Number of hours per week, 50 to 55; highest wage $12.00; average wage, $8.00.

"Think of even the tobacco trust paying better wages and giving shorter hours and better sanitary conditions than the Axton corporation's factory (meaning plaintiff).

"In his (meaning plaintiff's) factory he (meaning plaintiff) puts negro foreman over white men. It is another example of his (meaning plaintiff's) double dealing with laboring men. He (meaning plaintiff) don't dare deny it.

"A negro named Brown was foreman on the third and fourth floors of Axton's factory (meaning plaintiff's factory) and that he had many white men under him. This is the same Wm. H. Brown, colored, whose name appears in the city directory, page 230, as foreman of the Axton Tobacco Factory.

"For three years prior to March, 1913, during the entire three years, a negro named Brown was foreman on the third and fourth floors of the Axton Fisher Tobacco Factory, and many white men worked under him at the factory.

"Among the number employed upon the third floor under Brown were a large number of white men."

In paragraph 2, it was averred that in several editions of the paper printed, published and circulated on October 5, 1913, the defendants "wilfully, knowingly and maliciously published of and concerning the plaintiff and its business of manufacturing tobacco, and of and concerning the wages paid by it to its employees in its factory, the following false and defamatory statements:

"Axton's (meaning plaintiff's) average wage is lowest. Records of all factories. Official proof is given. Mr. Ben J. Sand, the State Labor Inspector, made a statement Monday morning.

[70] "Mr. Sand states that the records of the State show that the charges made by Dr. Buschmeyer are entirely correct, and that Mr. Axton (meaning plaintiff) does not permit the eight hour rule in his (meaning plaintiff's) factory, and pays wages less even than those of the American Tobacco Co. There are in Louisville only four tobacco factories where smoking tobacco is manufactured. They are located as follows: American Tobacco Co. Eighteenth and Broadway, employing two hundred and sixty-three females; Burley Tobacco Co., employing thirty females in the manufacture of smoking tobacco; American Tobacco Co., Jackson and Finzer streets, employing one hundred and thirty-six females; Axton Fisher Tobacco Co., Thirteenth and Rowan streets, employing sixteen females. The Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. works fifty-nine hours a week, while the American Tobacco Co. works but fifty-five, with a Saturday half holiday throughout the year. The Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. does not give its employees a half holiday. The only other union tobacco factory, which is the Burley Tobacco Co., works its employees fifty and fifty-five hours each week and affords its employees a half holiday.

"The highest wages earned by any workers are: American Tobacco Co. (West End), high, $14.95; low, $4.00; average $7.50. Burley Tobacco Co., high, $12.00; low, $7.00; average, $8.00. Axton Fisher Co. (meaning plaintiff), high, $8.75; low, $6.00; average, $7.00.

"In addition to the one hundred and fourteen day workers at the East End branch of the American Tobacco Co., there are twenty-two females employed under the piece system. High wages paid in this instance is $12.35, and the low wage is $7.00. The average is $7.50.

"The average weekly wage for a female in the employ of the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. is $7.00. The average weekly wage for males and females employed by the company is $9.14."

In paragraph 3 it was averred that in several editions of the paper printed, published and circulated by the defendants on October 16, 1913, "they wilfully, knowingly and maliciously published of and concerning the plaintiff and its business of manufacturing tobacco, and of and concerning the wages paid by it to its employees in its factory, the following false and defamatory statements:

[71] "Women workers paid scant wage by Axton (meaning plaintiff). Average of $5.40 a week for ten hours a day revealed by the records.

"The printed report of former Labor Inspector Filburn showing that the official records show that the average wage for women operatives in his (meaning plaintiff's) factory was only $5.40 a week.

"Now Mr. Axton (meaning plaintiff) has a legal right to work his (meaning plaintiff's) employees as long or as short as he (meaning plaintiff) wants to and to pay them as little or as much as he (meaning plaintiff) wants to. But he (meaning plaintiff) has no right while he (meaning plaintiff) is paying wages far below those paid by other factories, and working men and women long hours, to claim that he (meaning plaintiff) is a friend of labor.

"Get a copy of Mr. Filburn's report of 1910, when he was labor inspector, and turn to page 75 of that report and read what the official figures show were the conditions in Mr. Axton's (meaning plaintiff's) factory. Those official figures—they are all down on page 75—show that the average wage paid by Mr. Axton (meaning plaintiff) to his female employees was 90 cents a day for ten hours work. Think of it. A total of $5.40 a week, or 9 cents an hour. And remember that this was an average wage. It does not mean that $5.40 a week was the lowest wage Mr. Axton (meaning plaintiff) paid. It means that some got below $5.40 a week and that his (meaning plaintiff's) average wage for these workers was $5.40 a week.

"Get a copy of Labor Inspector Filburn's report of 1910 and turn to page 75. If what I tell you is not a public record and if it had not been true it would have been denied long ago."

In paragraph 4 it was averred that in several editions of the paper printed, published and circulated by the defendants on October 18, 1913, "they wilfully, knowingly and maliciously published of and concerning the plaintiff and its business of manufacturing tobacco; of and concerning the character and kind of foreman or boss it had placed over its girl employees in its factory, in Louisville; and of and concerning the wages paid by it to its employees in its said factory, the following false and defamatory statements:

"Negro foreman was placed as boss over white girls in Axton (meaning plaintiff's) factory. The negro foreman [72] Will Brown was then placed in charge of machines where the girls were employed and as a boss over them. The girls then quit work and refused to work under a negro foreman. They reported the whole trouble to local Union No. 16.

"The union appointed a committee to look into the matter and report as to the merits of the grievance of the girls.

"This same Charles T. Hardy, tobacco worker, employed at Strater Bros. Tobacco Factory, was made chairman of the grievance committee.

"Mr. Hardy and the grievance committee investigated and found that the charges of the girls against Mr. Axton's factory (meaning plaintiff's factory) were true and so reported back to the union. Axton (meaning plaintiff) would not remedy the matter, and upon Mr. Hardy's recommendation the union, after a number of fruitless conferences with Mr. Axton (meaning with Mr. Axton as the president of plaintiff), withdrew the use of the union label from the Axton factory (meaning plaintiff's factory) and placed him and his factory (meaning plaintiff's factory) upon the unfair list. This action was ratified by the International Union of Tobacco Workers.

"The wages of the Axton factory (meaning plaintiff's factory) have never been raised to the basis of other factories in the same line of business, and are now only barely enough to keep the factory from being again placed upon the 'unfair list.'"

In paragraph 5, it was averred that in several editions of the paper printed, published and circulated by the defendants on October 23, 1913, "they wilfully, knowingly and maliciously published of and concerning the plaintiff and its business of manufacturing tobacco, and of and concerning its advertising cards and where they were printed, and of and concerning its relation to and attitude and feeling towards organized labor, the following false and defamatory statements:

"Axton's (meaning the plaintiff's) advertising cards printed in scab shops, and Axton (meaning the plaintiff) displays his (meaning the plaintiff) contempt for organized labor,' comprising the opening and closing lines of said false and defamatory publication, to be printed in said newspaper in a most prominent and conspicuous manner and in letters three-quarters of an inch high and heavily underscored."

[73] In paragraph six it was averred that in several editions of the paper printed, published and circulated by the defendants on October 27, 1913, "they wilfully, knowingly and maliciously published of and concerning the plaintiff and its business of manufacturing tobacco, the following false and defamatory statements:

"More proof of conditions in Axton (meaning plaintiff's) factory. Proof that white men had been required to work under a negro foreman at Mr. Axton's (meaning plaintiff's) factory.

"First as to Mr. Axton's (meaning plaintiff's) negro foreman, Will Brown: This negro was the floor boss over white men and girls. It is proved by Brown's own written statement as well as the affidavits of reputable witnesses.

"She was one of the girls who went on a strike some years ago with this negro Brown was made a boss over the white girls."

Summarizing this lengthy pleading, it will be noticed that in the matter set out by way of inducement it is averred that the tobacco company was engaged in the manufacture and sale of union made smoking and chewing tobacco and especially the brands known as "Old Hill Side" and "Booster Twist," and that it had built up and acquired a good reputation with the trade, the public generally and especially labor organizations and laboring people as a manufacturer of tobacco, and had acquired an extensive and lucrative demand for its products.

That it had for many years conducted and operated its business and factory as a unionized factory pursuant to a contract between it and the Tobacco Workers' International Union, by the terms of which contract it was authorized to place on all of its products the union label, which was a guarantee to organized labor that the tobacco on which it was placed was manufactured in a factory employing only union labor. And by virtue of the terms of the contract between it and the Tobacco Workers' Union it agreed to and did pay to its employees a scale of wages agreed upon between it and the union and in many instances largely in excess thereof.

That by its course of fair dealing with the trade, its employees, the public generally organized labor and wage earners, it had acquired the good will of the public generally; and its sale to organized labor and wage earners constituted the largest part of its sale of tobacco. That the good will of union labor and wage earners towards [74] it and its right to place on its products the union label, constituted valuable assets in its business, and if it failed to comply with the terms of the contract between it and the tobacco workers' union, such failure would operate to deprive it of the union label and result in the union placing its factory on the unfair list, thereby depriving it of the patronage of union labor.

The false and defamatory publications complained of, it is averred by way of innuendo, were maliciously intended to injure and destroy its business, its good reputation and its good will with the public and especially with organized labor; to destroy the demand for its products with the public generally and especially with organized labor and wage earners, and to render it contemptible and odious to them as a manufacturer of tobacco, thereby injuring the value of its business and brands.

The alleged defamatory matter may be divided into four classes. (1) That it employed a negro as foreman or boss over white girls, and the white girls were required in its factory to work under a negro foreman.

That on account of this the girls quit work and reported the trouble to a local labor union, which appointed a committee to look into the matter, and this committee found that the charge of the girls that they were required to work under a negro foreman was true, and the tobacco company failing to correct or remove this cause of complaint, the union withdrew the use of the union label from the factory and placed the factory on the unfair list, which action was ratified by the International Union of Tobacco Workers.

(2) That the advertising cards were printed in "scab shops" and its advertisements were placed in street cars without the union label, to show its contempt for organized labor.

(3) That it paid less wages to its employees and required them to work more hours per day and week than the American Tobacco Co.

or the Burley Tobacco Co., its only rivals located in Louisville in the manufacture and sale of tobacco, and never raised its wages to the basis paid in these factories.

(4) That the sanitary conditions in the American Tobacco Co. and Burley Tobacco Co. factories and other factories were much better than those in its factory.

Each of these classes will be dealt with separately, but before applying the questions of law that we think controlling [75] in the disposition of the case it may be well to here state that no special damage was alleged; nor was it essential to a good cause of action that special damage should have been alleged if, as contended by counsel, the publications were libelous per se, as a matter that is libelous per se is actionable without averment of special damage. As said in Newell on Slander and Libel, page 181:

"When language is used concerning a person or his affairs which from its nature necessarily must, or presumably will as its natural and proximate consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, its publication prima facie constitutes a cause of action and prima facie constitutes a wrong without any allegation or evidence of damage other than that which is implied or presumed from the fact of publication; and this is all that is meant by the terms 'actionable per se.' Therefore the real practical test by which to determine whether special damage must be alleged and proven in order to make out a cause of action for defamation is whether the language is such as necessarily must or naturally and presumably will occasion pecuniary damage to the person of whom it is spoken."

In such a case the complainant may rely upon the inference of damage raised by the law, and is not required to plead or prove that the publication has injured him. But when the publication is not so obviously defamatory that the inference of injury may be drawn, it can only be made actionable when the complaining party pleads and proves that it has, as a matter of fact, damaged him.

It might also be here further noticed that frequent references in the publication are made to "Axton" and to "Axton's corporation," but the fair and reasonable inference from the context of the published matter is that all references to "Axton" and to the "Axton corporation" were intended to and did apply to the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. And when a publication, reading the whole of it, is plainly directed at a person or corporation, as the case may be, the person or corporation intended to be and that is in fact assailed by the publication may maintain an action for libel as freely as if he or it were particularly named or described in the publication, although neither the name of the person nor the style of the corporation has been accurately designated or described in the publication. And so we may treat these publications as referring to the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co.

[76] Another elementary rule in the law of libel and slander is the difference between the actionable nature of alleged slanderous words and the actionable nature of alleged libelous words. In Riley v. Lee, 88 Ky. 603, 11 S. W. 713, 21 Am. St. Rep. 358, in speaking of the general rule as to what publications may be treated as libelous, it was said:

"So it may be regarded as thoroughly settled, that if the written or printed publication tends to degrade the person about whom it is written or printed—that is, if it tends to reduce his character or reputation in the estimation of his friends or acquaintances or the public, from a higher to a lower grade, or if it tends to disgrace him—that is, if it tends to deprive him of the favor and esteem of his friends or acquaintances or the public, or tends to render him odious, ridiculous or contemptible in the estimation of his friends or acquaintances of the public, it is per se, actionable libel."

In slander the rule as stated in Williams v. Riddle, 145 Ky. 459, 140 S. W. 661, is that in the following cases only would words be slanderous or actionable per se: "(1) Words falsely spoken imputing the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, for which the party might be indicted and punished: (2) Words imputing an infectious disease, likely to exclude him from society: (3) Words imputing unfitness to perform the duties of an officer or employment: (4) Words prejudicing him in his profession or trade: (5) Words tending to disinherit him. In all other cases spoken words are either not actionable at all, or only actionable on proof of special damage."

It will thus be seen that many words are actionable when written or printed and published which would not be actionable if merely spoken. And so, in determining whether words are libelous per se or not, it is unnecessary to consider whether they impute to the person concerning whom they are published the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, or an infectious disease, or unfitness to perform the duties of an officer or employment, or prejudice him in his profession or trade, or tend to disinherit him. It is only essential to inquire whether or not they have a natural and reasonable tendency to degrade and disgrace the person of whom they are written, or to render him odious, ridiculous or contemptible. If they do, they are libelous per se, although they might not naturally or reasonably have any meaning that would make them actionable per se if spoken.

[77] This distinction between libel and slander obtains as fully with respect to corporations as it does to individuals. And as a corporation like an individual may have a good reputation and enjoy the good will of its customers and the public, and this good reputation and good will are as valuable to it as good will would be to an individual or partnership, a corporation may maintain an action for slander or libel. But it can only do so when the effect of the words or publication complained of is to injure it in a business way, because it is only in respect to its business that a corporation in its corporate capacity can be affected or injured.

Therefore when the action is for an injury to a trade or business, there seems to us no room for a distinction in respect to what is libelous as between corporations, traders and merchants. If a publication would be libelous if it concerned a merchant or trader in his business, so would it be libelous if it concerned a corporation in its business. In either case it is an injury to the business that constitutes the gravamen of the offense, and in either case the effect is the same. What difference then can there be so far as the effect on business is concerned between the publication that brings the business of the trader or merchant into disrepute and that which brings the business of the corporation into disrepute? The corporation is as much concerned to have its business good will and reputation protected for the benefit and promotion of its trade as is a partnership or the merchant or trader.

And so when a corporation, such as the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co., charges that a publication respecting it is libelous per se, it is essential that it should reasonably and naturally appear from the publication complained of that it was of such a nature as to deprive it of the patronage or trade it enjoyed in a business way, or to render it so odious and contemptible in the estimation of those with whom it did have or might reasonably expect to have business dealings or connections as to injuriously affect its business.

We do not agree with the learned judge of the lower court that "to constitute a libel per se of which a corporation may complain, the publication must (1) misrepresent the character or condition of its marketable products, or, (2) misrepresent the methods by which its internal affairs are conducted, its capacity, or its business dealings [78] toward the public in such a way as to alienate customers, or (3) misrepresent it, its products, its attitude, its business, or its stability, so as to affect its credit."

We think these limitations on what would constitute a libel per se are rather too narrow, as a publication respecting a corporation might injure very seriously its business and do it great damage in a business way without misrepresenting the quality of its marketable products, or the methods by which its business was conducted, or its attitude in its business dealings towards the public. If the publication is of such a nature as to reasonably and naturally render the corporation odious and contemptible in the estimation of the public or its patrons, and thereby deprive it of the favor and esteem of the public and the patronage and trade of its customers, its business may be as grievously injured and as seriously affected in a pecuniary way as if it were directly charged with misrepresenting the quality of its products or the method by which its business was conducted. And so if the publication reasonably and naturally has the effect of bringing the business of the corporation into public contempt, and of making it odious in the estimation of those with whom it has business dealings or connections, then the law will presume that the publication was actionable per se without either pleading or proof of special damage. It will be inferred that the publication did injure it in a business way for it is only in a business way, resulting in pecuniary loss, that a corporation can be damaged by an alleged libelous publication: Newell on Slander and Libel 3rd ed. p. 84; Townshend on Slander and Libel, 3rd ed. p. 279, 25 Cyc. p. 337; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) p. 954; note to Brayton v. Cleveland Special Police Co. 63 Ohio St. 83, 57 N. E. 1085, 52 L.R.A. 525; Marino v. Di Marco, 41 App. Cas. (D. C.) 76, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1214; Gross Coal Co. v. Rose, 126 Wis. 24, 5 Ann. Cas. 549, 105 N. W. 225, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 741; St. James Military Academy v. Gaiser, 125 Mo. 517, 28 S. W. 851, 46 Am. St. Rep. 502, 28 L.R.A. 667; Pennsylvania Iron Works Co. v. Henry Vogh Mach. Co. 139 Ky. 497, 96 S. W. 551, 139 Am. St. Rep. 504, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1033.

It will, therefore, be seen that in testing the sufficiency of the publication on demurrer, the question to be determined is, can it be said as a matter of law that the publications were not of such a nature as to reasonably and naturally injure the corporation in a business way?

Having in mind these general principles, we come now to consider with more particularity the publications complained [79] of, with a view of deciding whether they were of such a nature as to reasonably and naturally tend to make the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. odious or contemptible in a business way, thereby depriving it of the good will and patronage of its customers and the public generally, which deprivation of the good will and patronage of the public generally injured it in its property rights and caused it to suffer pecuniary loss. If the publications did have this tendency, then the petition, as a matter of law, stated a good cause of action.

The publications charging that the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. paid an average wage less than that paid by the American Tobacco Co. and the Burley Tobacco Co. and required its employees to work a greater number of hours per day than either of these companies, and that the sanitary conditions of the American Tobacco Co. and the Burley Tobacco Co. were better than those of the Axton Fisher Tobacco Co., may be treated as publications of a like nature and disposed of together. These publications we do not consider libelous per se. The publication relating to wages did not charge that the wages paid by the Axton Fisher Co. were grossly or at all inadequate. It merely made a comparison of the wage scale of the other tobacco companies with its wage scale, and charged that it paid less than its competitors.

A publication charging that a business concern paid less wages than its rival or required its employees to work more hours per day or per week than its rival is nothing more than a comparison of conditions, and is not of such a nature as to reasonably or naturally make the employer odious or contemptible, and injure him in a business way. Employers of labor have the right unless regulated by contract or statute to pay their employees what they please and fix the hours of labor as they choose; and employees have the right to accept such wages as are offered them and to work such hours as the employment demands. There are doubtless many employers of labor who pay their employees less wages and require them to work more hours per day than other employers of like labor, and yet this might be entirely satisfactory to the employees. There are so many different conditions and so great a variety of circumstances surrounding the employment of labor in establishments carrying on the same lines of business that it would be going far beyond the reason of the thing to hold libelous per se a publication merely because [80] it charged that the complaining employer had a different wage scale or different hours of labor from his competitor.

And so with respect to the publication concerning the sanitary conditions. The publication did not charge that the conditions in the other factories were bad, or that those in the Axton Fisher Company's establishment were worse. It merely said that the sanitary conditions in the other factories were better than those prevailing in the Axton Fisher Company's factory; and the fact that they might have been better did not necessarily or at all convey the meaning that the sanitary conditions in the Axton Fisher Company's factory were hurtful or injurious to its employees, or that the sanitary conditions in its factory were such as to make it dangerous or unhealthful to use its products.

In short, the publication in respect to these matters, would not, we think, naturally and reasonably have a tendency to affect the business standing of the Axton Fisher Co. or to render it so odious or contemptible in the estimation of the public or its customers as to injure its business or cause it to suffer pecuniary loss.

So much of the publications, however, in paragraphs 4 and 6 as charged that "a negro foreman was placed as boss over white girls. . . . The girls then quit work and refused to work under a negro foreman. They reported the whole trouble to the union and the union appointed a committee to look into the matter and report as to the merits of the grievance, . . . and found that the charges of the girls were true; and the company would not remedy the matter and the union withdrew the use of the label and placed the factory upon the unfair list, and this action was ratified by the International Union of Tobacco Workers; this negro was the floor boss over white girls. . . . She was one of the girls who went on a strike some years ago when this negro Brown was made a boss over the white girls," was, in our opinion, libelous per se.

It is very true that in Williams v. Riddle, 145 Ky. 459, Ann. Cas. 1913B 1151, 140 S. W. 661, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 974, this court held that it was not slander per se to say of and concerning a white man that he "was a damn negro and his mother was a mulatto." But in that case the court was very careful to say that there is a marked distinction between slander and libel and that many things are actionable when written and published which would not be [81] actionable if merely spoken, and the opinion was confined to the conclusion that these words did not constitute slander per se. There is no intimation in the opinion that if these words had been written or printed and published of and concerning Williams, they would not have been libelous per se. On the contrary we have no doubt that it would be libelous per se to write or print and publish of a white man that "he was a negro and his mother a mulatto."

It would hardly be possible to publish of a white person matter that would more certainly tend to degrade or disgrace him or to render him odious and contemptible in the estimation of his friends and acquaintances than to charge him with being a negro and that his mother was a mulatto. Perhaps there are some parts of the United States in which a publication of this nature would not tend to disgrace or degrade the white man of whom it was published, or render him odious and contemptible in the estimation of his friends and acquaintances. But in this State we are sure there could not be two opinions on this subject. It is not worth while here to undertake to set out the reasons why this is so. Sufficient is it to say that from inheritance, tradition, training, education and custom the difference recognized by all to exist between the white race and the negro race is so pronounced as that no greater disgrace could be put upon a white man than to publish a charge like this concerning him.

In Chiles v. Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. 125 Ky. 299, 101 S. W. 386, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 268, where legislation requiring common carriers to have separate coaches for the colored race was upheld, in speaking of the distinction between the two races, the court said: "It had its origin in the creation of the races, and is firmly established as a part of the social and domestic order and economy of the country, and the man or set of men of either race who attempts to ignore or obliterate these distinctions and differences undertakes an impossible task. This racial distinction, and the resulting classification, is recognized by legislature, authorized by courts, sanctioned by custom, and approved by an enlightened public opinion. It is not confined to any community, state or nation, but is found wherever the two races abound in sufficient numbers to make noticeable the impassable chasm that separates them. In the home, school, the church, the public place—in truth, everywhere—it exists."

[82] In Berea College v. Com. 123 Ky. 209, 13 Ann. Cas. 337, 94 S. W. 623, 124 Am. St. Rep. 344, where legislation prohibiting white and colored persons from being taught in the same school was upheld, the court said: "The separation of the white and black races upon the surface of the globe is a fact equally apparent. Why this is so it is not necessary to speculate; but the fact of a distribution of men by race and color is as visible in the providential arrangement of the earth as that of heat and cold. The natural separation of the races is therefore an undeniable fact, and all social organizations which lead to their amalgamation are repugnant to the law of nature."

In Harris v. Louisville, 165 Ky. 559, Ann. Cas. 1917B 149, 177 S. W. 472, where a city ordinance making it unlawful for colored persons to establish or maintain a residence on certain streets occupied as residence streets by white people was sustained, the court said: "It needs no extended argument at this time to demonstrate that this State is fully committed to the principle of the separation of the races whenever and wherever practicable and expedient for the public welfare."

The legislation before the court in these cases merely gave statutory expression to a firmly established and deep-seated public opinion that demanded practical and enforceable recognition.

It is also beyond dispute that the sentiment reflected in this legislation and in these opinions does not find the ends or the perfection of its purpose in mere race separation alone. It goes much further than that, as is shown in the general feeling everywhere prevailing that the negro, while respected and protected in his place, is not and cannot be a fit associate for white girls or the social equal of the white race. To conditions like these that are everywhere about them as a part of the social order and domestic economy of the State, courts cannot shut their eyes. They must take notice of the long established and uniform custom and usage of the country in respect to the position of the races and the attitude of the white race toward the negro race.

And so we think the publication that a negro man was placed as a boss over white girls was surely calculated to arouse the hostility not only of organized labor and wage earners, but of all right-thinking people, to such an extent as to influence numbers of them to withdraw their patronage from a concern publicly and widely [83] charged with employing business methods so offensive to the sentiment and good judgment of all classes of decent white people.

That this conduct was calculated to create hostility toward the tobacco company and to injure it in a business way, is, we think, further shown by the fact stated in the publication, that the labor unions, as a result of the charge, placed this factory on the "unfair list."

The other publications relate to the charge in paragraph four, that the tobacco company, on account of its failure and refusal to remedy or remove the complaint lodged against it, that it employed a negro foreman as a boss over white girls, was placed on the "unfair list" by the local union; and this action was ratified by the International Union of Tobacco Workers, and to the charge in paragraph five that the advertising cards of the tobacco company were printed in "scab" shops so as to display its contempt for organized labor.

Accompanying this last charge there is made a part of the petition a page of the Evening Post showing that this matter was printed in large, black type, calculated to attract attention, and with it a picture of the sack containing "Old Hill Side" tobacco with the comment that "The Axton tobacco brands are being advertised in street cars with display cards like the photographic facsimile here shown. Note the absence of the union label of either the International Typographical Union or the International Lithographers' Union."

In connection with the publication in reference to the "unfair list" and advertising in "scab" shops, it should be kept in mind that it was expressly averred as inducement that the tobacco company employed only union labor in the manufacture of its tobacco. That it had received from the union the right to place its label on its products, which was a very valuable asset in its business, and had obligated itself to patronize only unionized shops. That it had always dealt fairly and justly with its employees and had acquired and enjoyed a good reputation with and the good will of organized labor and wage earners in Kentucky and throughout the United States; and had especially acquired with them a valuable reputation and good will on its union made tobacco, and had built up and enjoyed an extensive sale of its tobacco to them, which constituted the larger part of the demand for its brands.

[84] It should be further kept in mind that it was averred by way of innuendo that the effect of these publications was "to destroy its said good reputation and good will with organized labor and the public, as the operator of a union factory in the manufacture of tobacco; to destroy the demand for its products which it enjoyed from organized labor; to especially destroy the valuable reputation of 'Old Hill Side' as a union made smoking tobacco with organized labor and its sympathizers, and the demand therefor for them, and to incite the enmity and ill will of organized labor and its sympathizers towards plaintiff, its business and its products."

We may further take notice that union labor constitutes a large, influential and well organized body of the laboring people of this State and country, and that the wage earners, including those who are members of the union, compose a large part of our population. And also take notice, as a part of the history of the country, that labor unions have adopted and promulgated rules and regulations for the protection and guidance of labor, which are carefully observed by the members.

Coming now to consider the effect on the business of the tobacco company of the publications charging that it had been placed on the "unfair list" by union labor and that it had its advertising cards printed in "scab" shops, we may turn to the matter in the petition set out by way of inducement and to the matter set out by way of innuendo for the purpose of estimating and ascertaining the meaning and effect of the words "unfair list" when applied to a business establishment by organized labor, as well as the attitude of organized labor in a business way towards establishments that have been put by it on the "unfair list" or that have work done in "scab" shops.

Ordinarily to say that a business house had been put on the "unfair list" or that it had its printing done in "scab" shops, would convey but little meaning of the effect such a charge might have on the business of the concern so designated. In the usual and customary use of the words and according to their ordinary and natural meaning, it could hardly be said as a matter of law that a publication charging that a business establishment had been put on the "unfair list" or charging that it had its printing done in "scab" shops, would affect the business referred to in such a way as to cause it to suffer pecuniary loss thereby making the publication libelous per se.

[85] It appears, however, from the publications themselves that these words have a special and significant meaning when applied by labor unions to business concerns that have been guilty of such conduct as to arouse the enmity of these organizations. But aside from and independent of this, we may look to the matter set out as inducement in the petition for the purpose of showing the relation, in a business way, between the tobacco company and union labor; and to the innuendo for the purpose of showing the defamatory meaning and application of the publications as manifested by their effect upon members of labor unions in business dealings with the tobacco company and the consequent business injury suffered by the tobacco company.

The authority for referring to the inducement as well as the innuendo for the purposes mentioned is found in well established rules in the law of libel and slander. Thus it is said in Newell on Slander and Libel, 3rd ed. pages 735 and 736, respecting the inducement: "In all cases where the alleged defamatory words, whether spoken, written or otherwise expressed, do not naturally in themselves convey the meaning the plaintiff would assign to them, or whether they are ambiguous or equivocal, and require explanations by reference to some outside or extrinsic matter to show that they are actionable, it must be expressly stated that such matter existed, and that the defamation related thereto. . . . Where the matter complained of in the declaration as a libel does not upon its face apply to the plaintiff and impute a libel, the pleading must state, by way of inducement, such facts as will support such a meaning and show the libelous application of the matter to the plaintiff."

And in Townshend on Slander and Libel, 3rd ed. page 554, it is said: "It is the office of the inducement to narrate the extrinsic circumstances which, coupled with the language published, affect its construction and render it actionable; where standing alone and not thus explained, the language would appear either not to concern the plaintiff, or if concerning him, not to affect him injuriously. This being the office of the inducement, it follows that if the language published does not naturally and per se refer to the plaintiff, nor convey the meaning the plaintiff contends for, or if it is ambiguous or equivocal, and requires explanation by some extrinsic matter to show its relation to the plaintiff, and make it actionable, [86] the complaint must allege, by way of inducement, the existence of such extrinsic matter."

It is also laid down in Townshend, page 586, that "Where the language is ambiguous, and is as susceptible of a harmless as of an injurious meaning, it is the function of an innuendo to point out the meaning which the plaintiff claims to be the true meaning, and the meaning upon which he relies to sustain his action. This applies whether the ambiguity be patent or latent, and whether or not there are any facts alleged as inducement."

And also laid down in Newell, page 754, that "Where a defamatory meaning is apparent on the face of the libel itself, no innuendo is necessary; though even there the pleader occasionally inserts one to heighten the effect of the words. But where the words prima facie are not actionable, an innuendo is essential to the action. It is necessary to bring out the latent injurious meaning of the defendant's words; and such innuendo must distinctly aver that the words bear a specific actionable meaning."

We find therefor that although these words standing alone would not be libelous per se, they are made so by the inducement and the innuendo, both of which must be read and considered in connection with the words, not for the purpose of enlarging their meaning but to show that under the circumstances they had a special meaning that was hurtful to the business of the tobacco company.

We also think that if words are published of a business concern that have a direct tendency to alienate from it the good will and patronage of a large class of its customers, although others of its patrons may not take offense at them or withdraw their patronage, an action will lie and the words will be treated as libelous, per se: Adolf Philipp Co. v. New Yorker Staats-Zeitung, 165 App. Div. 377, 150 N. Y. S. 1044.

Wherefore, upon the whole case, we think the demurrer to so much of the publications as charged that the tobacco company employed a negro boss over white girls, and had been put on the "unfair list" by labor unions, and as charged that its advertising matter had been printed in "scab" shops, should be overruled.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion; the whole court sitting.

NOTE.

Publication that Employer Has Been Placed on "Unfair List" of Labor Union as Libelous.

In Labor Review Pub. Co. v. Galliher, 153 Ala. 364, 15 Ann. Cas. 674, it was held that a publication charging that an employer was on the "unfair list" of a labor union amounted only to a declaration of his refusal to conform to the regulations of the union and did not impute any illegal or immoral conduct, and was accordingly not libelous. The reported case, which appears to be the only recent case passing directly on the question, takes the contrary view, holding that since the members of labor unions constitute a large and influential part of the population a false charge tending to bring an employer into disfavor with them and calculated to cause them to discriminate against his products is actionable. That decision finds some support in the recent case of Cyclohexam Amusement Co. v. Hayward-Larkin Co. 93 Wash. 367, 160 Pac. 1051, wherein a poster described by the court as follows, was held to be libelous per se: "At the top in large letters is the word 'Danger.' Following this in smaller letters are these words, 'Do you know that a theater that employs incompetent operators endangers your life? Do you know that the theaters that employ competent help display this card in the box office?' Then follows a copy of a union card. Following the card are these words, 'Do you know that the Arcade and the Majestic Theaters cannot show this card?'"

In United Mine Workers v. Cromer, 159 Ky. 605, 167 S. W. 891, the publication of a list of "strikebreakers" referring to them as "detestable scabs and black legs whom we want you to be continually on the lookout for" was held to be libelous.

SILVER KING COALITION MINES COMPANY OF NEVADA

v.

SILVER KING CONSOLIDATED MINING COMPANY OF UTAH.

(Two cases)

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit—April 5, 1913.

204 Fed. 166.

Tenants in Common — Accounting — Parties — Effect of Assignment.

The K. Co. and the C. Co. were equal owners and tenants in common of a mining right. The K. Co. secretly extracted ore therefrom, failed to account therefor, and conveyed its property to the M. Co., which, in consideration of that conveyance, assumed and agreed to pay all the debts and obligations of its grantor.

Held, a suit in equity can be maintained by the C. Co., or its assignee, against the M. Co., without the presence of the K. Co. to enforce the contract of the M. Co. to pay the obligation of its grantor to account to the C. Co. for the latter's share of the value of the ore the K. Co. extracted from the common property.

Same.

When a grantee contracts with his grantor to pay the latter's debt or obligation in payment, or in part payment, for the conveyance, the creditor may accept and appropriate that contract to himself, and maintain a suit in equity upon it. In equity, the grantee then becomes the principal debtor, the grantor the surety, and the creditor is substituted for the promisee or grantor.

It is immaterial in equity whether or not the contract was made or intended for the benefit of the creditor.

Parties — Effect of Omission of Party.

In the federal courts, a suit in equity may proceed without any necessary or proper party, who is not an indispensable party, if his presence would oust the jurisdiction of the court.

An "indispensable party" is one who has such an interest in the subject-matter of the controversy that a final decree cannot be rendered between the other parties to the suit without radically and injuriously affecting his interest, or without leaving the controversy in such a situation that its final determination may be inconsistent with equity and good conscience.

The original debtor is not an indispensable party to a suit in equity by his creditor on the promise of the grantee of the debtor to pay the creditor's claim.

Contracts — Interpretation — Promise to Pay "All Debts."

A promise to pay all the "debts and obligations" of another includes the promise to pay its obligation to account and pay to a cotenant the latter's share of the proceeds of ore which the grantor has extracted from the common property and sold.

Appeal and Error — Review of Facts — Conflicting Evidence.

Where a court has considered conflicting evidence, and made a finding or decree, it is presumptively correct, and unless some obvious error of law has intervened, or some serious mistake of fact has been made, the finding or decree must be permitted to stand.

Mines and Minerals — Extraction of Ore by Cotenant — Measure of Damages.

The measure of damages for the reckless, wilful, or intentional taking of ore or timber from the land of another without right is the enhanced value of the ore or timber when it is finally converted to the use of the trespasser, without allowance to him for the labor bestowed or expense incurred in removing it and preparing it for market.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The basic principle of an accounting by a trustee in equity is that the account should be so stated that the trustee shall make no profit by his use of the property of the cestui que trust and the latter shall receive the value of his property and its income.

A cotenant has the right to extract ore from the common property and sell it, accounting for the proceeds, less the reasonable expense of mining and marketing.

Where the fundamental rule of an accounting can be complied with by allowing to the cotenant, who is a trustee for his fellow, the expenses of mining and marketing the ore, the measure of damages for a wilful trespass is not necessarily applicable to the case, although the cotenant who extracted the ore intended to appropriate all of it to himself, concealed his acts, kept no accounts, caved the stope, and made it difficult and expensive to ascertain the volume and value of the ore taken.

[See note at end of this case.]

Interest — Compounding — Accounting by Trustee.

Where the basic principle of an accounting by a trustee can be given effect without charging him with compound interest on the amount which he has held for his cestui que trust, it is not error to refuse to make such a charge.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeals from United States Circuit Court, District of Utah: MARSHALL, Judge.

Action by Silver King Consolidated Mining Company of Utah, plaintiff, against Silver King Coalition Mines Company of Nevada, defendant. From judgment rendered, both parties appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

Andrew Howat, Edward B. Critchlow, Herbert R. Macmillan and William J. Barrette for plaintiff.

W. H. Dickson, A. C. Ellis, Jr., and Russell G. Schulder for defendant.

Sitting: SANBORN and CARLAND, Circuit Judges, and WILLIAM H. MUNGER, District Judge.

[168] SANBORN, J.—The Silver King Mining Company, a corporation of the state of Utah, and the Silver King Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation of the state of Wyoming, were equal owners and tenants in common of the Vesuvius mining claim, which was situated in the state of Utah, from 1901 until June 19, 1907. During that time the King Company secretly extracted from that claim and sold a large amount of valuable ore without accounting to its cotenant for any of it, and on June 19, 1907, it sold and conveyed all its property to the Silver Coalition Mines Company, a corporation of the state of Nevada and the defendant below, and in part payment for that conveyance the Coalition Company agreed to pay all the outstanding debts and obligations of its grantor, the King Company. The Coalition Company then secretly extracted ore from the Vesuvius claim and sold it, without accounting to its cotenant for this ore or its proceeds. On February 24, 1908, the Consolidated Company of Wyoming conveyed all its title and interest in the Vesuvius mining claim, and in its cause of action against the Coalition Company on account of the extraction of the ores by the King Company and by it, to the Silver King Consolidated Mining Company of Utah, a corporation of that state and the complainant in this suit. On May 26, 1908, the latter company exhibited its bill in equity in the court below against the Coalition Mines Company of Nevada, and prayed, among other things, for an accounting and recovery of one-half of the value of the [169] ores extracted by it and by its grantor, the King Company. The defendant demurred, it subsequently answered, issues were joined, evidence was taken, and upon final hearing a decree was rendered that the defendant was indebted and should pay to the complainant $735,045.87 on account of the ores taken from the Vesuvius claim by the defendant and by its grantor. Both parties have appealed from that decree and specified many alleged errors.

(A) The defendant insisted by demurrer and motion in the court below, and still insists, that the King Company was an indispensable party to the cause of action to recover the value of the ore which its grantor, prior to the latter's conveyance on June 19, 1907, extracted and sold; but the Circuit Court overruled that contention, and its ruling is specified as error.

When a grantee contracts with his grantor to pay the latter's debt or obligation in payment, or in part payment, for the conveyance, the creditor or obligee may accept and appropriate that contract to himself and maintain a suit in equity to enforce it. In that event the grantee becomes the principal debtor and the grantor the surety, and the creditor's suit stands on the equitable doctrines that the creditor may have the benefit of any security or obligation given by the principal debtor to the surety, and that to avoid circuity of action—that is to say, an action by the creditor against the original debtor and a subsequent action by the latter against his grantee—the creditor may be, and is in equity, substituted for the promisee, the grantor. Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 623, 625, 626, 10 S. Ct. 494, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 667, 673, 674; Johns v. Wilson, 180 U. S. 440, 447, 21 S. Ct. 445, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 613, 617; Thompson v. Cheesman, 15 Utah 43, 48, 49, 48 Pac. 477; Blackmore v. Parkes, 81 Fed. 899, 900, 54 U. S. App. 123, 26 C. C. A. 670, 671.

In this case the complainant, the creditor, has accepted the promise of the defendant, the grantee, to pay the obligations of the King Company, the grantor, and standing by substitution in the shoes of the King Company, the grantor, has brought this suit to enforce the covenant of the grantee.

It is contended that this suit cannot be maintained for the value of the ore extracted by the King Company, because it was a necessary party to the suit for the value of the ore which it extracted, and it has not been made a party to this suit. But necessary parties, who are not indispensable parties, may be dispensed with in suits in equity in the national courts. An indispensable party is one who has such an interest in the subject-matter of the controversy that a final decree cannot be rendered between the other parties to the suit without radically and injuriously affecting his interest, or without leaving the controversy in such a situation that its final determination may be inconsistent with equity and good conscience. Every other party who has any interest in the controversy or subject-matter which is separable from the interest of the other parties before the court, so that it will not necessarily be directly or injuriously affected by a decree which does complete justice between them, is a proper party to a suit. But he is not an indispensable party, and if his presence would oust the jurisdiction of the court the suit may proceed without [170] him. Rogers v. Penobscot Min. Co. 154 Fed. 606, 610, 83 C. C. A. 380, 384; Sioux City Terminal R. etc. Co. v. Trust Company of North America, 27 C. C. A. 73, 75, 82 Fed. 124, 126, 49 U. S. App. 523. The King Company, the grantor, is a corporation of the same state as the complainant, and its presence in this suit would oust the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

Why is that corporation an indispensable party to this suit? Counsel for the defendant answer: Because the amount of the claim for the extraction of the ore taken by the grantor, the King Company, was unliquidated. But how can its liquidation in a suit between the creditor and the grantee alone radically and injuriously affect the interest of the grantor? Because, say counsel, in separate actions against a grantor and grantee, founded on the obligation of the former, different juries or courts might find different amounts recoverable, and because the grantor could not maintain an action against the grantee alone to enforce the latter's promise. Let the propositions that different courts and juries might find different amounts recoverable, and that the grantor could not maintain an action against the grantee alone to enforce the latter's promise, be conceded. Nevertheless the grantor cannot be injuriously affected by the creditor's suit and recovery against the grantee. The grantor was liable to a suit by the creditor on its obligation before the creditor's suit against the grantee was instituted, and if it is still subject to such a suit its liability is no greater since the suit and the decree against the grantee than it was before that suit was commenced. Counsel argue that if the creditor first recover a judgment of $100,000 against the grantor on its obligation, and subsequently recover a judgment of $200,000 against the grantee in an action on the grantee's promise to pay the grantor's obligation, the grantee would be subject to two judgments on the same promise—one for $100,000 in favor of the grantor on a suit which it might bring against the grantee, and one in favor of the creditor for $200,000. But the grantee could suffer no legal injury from the judgment for $100,000, because its payment of the judgment of $200,000 against it in favor of the creditor would discharge it from all liability on the judgment for $100,000 on the same obligation, on the ground that a party is required to make but one satisfaction of the same claim.

Counsel say that if the plaintiff, the creditor, should subsequently bring an action against the King Company, the grantor, and recover one-half the amount awarded by the final decree herein, the grantor could not recover of the grantee more than one-half the amount which the grantee is adjudged to pay to the creditor, and yet the creditor could recover of the grantee twice as much as it could from the grantor. But the creditor would not recover, nor would the grantee be required to pay, more than the just amount of its liability, and no one would be injuriously affected; for, against the mere supposition of counsel that a subsequent judgment for one-half the amount fixed by the decree in this case may be recovered by the creditor against the grantor, the amount adjudged by the decree of the court below in this suit, after full hearing, must be presumed to be right and just. Counsel contend that if the creditor should subsequently recover a judgment against the grantor on its obligation for double the amount fixed by [171] the decree herein, the grantor would be entitled to a judgment for that amount against the grantee. The supposition is too improbable for serious consideration. If the creditor subsequently sues the grantor, it is probable that it will be met by the answer that by the present suit the creditor elected to substitute itself for the grantor and in the latter's right to litigate with the grantee, whom it thereby made the principal debtor, while the grantor became the surety in this suit to determine the amount of the grantor's original obligation, that the grantee has obeyed the decree of the court and paid the amount thus adjudged due to the creditor, for the presumption is that it will promptly obey the decree, and that, as the creditor can have but one satisfaction of the same claim, it is estopped by these facts from recovering any judgment or decree whatever against the grantor. And the probability that the creditor will overcome such an answer and recover such a judgment or decree is so remote as to be negligible. Moreover, these hypotheses of counsel present nothing but moot questions. It is improbable that they will ever rise to the dignity of living issues, and the argument based upon them is neither convincing nor persuasive.

On the other hand, the facts disclosed by the record satisfy that the grantor, the King Company, has no such interest in the subject-matter of the controversy in this suit that a final decree cannot be rendered between the creditor, the plaintiff, and the grantee, the defendant, without radically and injuriously affecting the interest of the grantor, or without leaving the controversy in such a situation that its final determination may be inconsistent with equity and good conscience. They convince that a decree between the creditor and the grantee, just and equitable to the latter, can be made and ought to be made in this suit, which will not in any way injuriously affect the interest of the grantor, the King Company, and that the latter is not an indispensable party to this suit. There was no error in the ruling of the court below to this effect. Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 626, 10 S. Ct. 494, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 667, 674; Barker v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 124 Fed. 555, 559, 570; Dancel v. Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. 137 Fed. 157, 158, 159, 160, 161; Dancel v. Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. 144 Fed. 679, 680, 75 C. C. A. 481, 482.

(B) It is specified as error that the court below held that the defendant grantee was liable to account to the creditor, the plaintiff, for the one-half of the value of the ore extracted by the grantor from the common property of the grantor and the Consolidated Company of Wyoming prior to June 19, 1907. The promise of the defendant, evidenced by the deed of all the property of the grantor which the grantee accepted, was to pay therefor, among other things, $3,760,000, and "all the outstanding debts and obligations of the grantor." The grantor owed its cotenant and creditor one-half of the value of the ore it had extracted from their common property. It was under a legal obligation to account for and pay to its cotenant one-half of that value, and without the aid of the ingenious arguments of counsel it would be difficult to perceive any reason why this obligation did not fall within the terms of the grantee's contract.

Counsel contend, however, that it does not do so because the word "debt" is without definite meaning in the law, and in this contract it [172] means a debt for a sum certain, and does not include one for an unliquidated amount, and because the word "obligation" is of the same character, and in this contract has the same meaning. In support of this position definitions of these words are quoted from text-books and opinions of courts; but after a thoughtful consideration of the authorities cited, and many others, an abiding conviction still remains that in this contract these words are so plain and their meaning is so clear and certain that there is no doubt that they include, and must be held to have been intended to include every liability of the grantor of such a nature as that here in suit. The use of the words "debts" and "obligations" is so common that an exhaustive review of opinions concerning their meaning is impossible within the limits of the opinion of a court, and a partial review might be confusing or misleading. The conclusion which has been reached, however, is readily deducible from the terms of the contract and from familiar rules of construction.

Words and phrases should be given their popular sense and meaning, unless there is a clear indication that they were used in a different sense. The popular sense of a word or phrase is that sense which people conversant with the subject-matter with which the contract is dealing would attribute to it. When a word which has a known legal meaning is used in a contract, it must be assumed that it was used in its legal sense, in the absence of a clear indication of a contrary intent. The legal presumption is that words in a contract are used in their usual sense, unless it clearly appears that the parties intended to use them in a different or more restricted sense. Apply these indisputable canons of interpretation to the words and terms of this contract. The popular, the customary, and the legal sense of the word "debt" in a contract to pay all the debts of a party is not, in our opinion, limited to obligations to pay certain sums of money; and, if it is so limited, the popular, the customary and the legal sense of the broader word "obligation" includes every duty "which has a binding operation in law and which gives to the obligee the right of enforcing it in a court of justice." 2 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, page 534. The contract of the defendant is to pay all the debts and obligations of the grantor. The word "obligations" may not be ignored, nor may it be restricted to the more limited meaning of the word "debts;" for in the construction of the agreement tautology must be avoided, and all the words of the contract must be given meaning and legal effect (Keith v. Haggart, 4 Dak. 438, 33 N. W. 465, 468; Ullman v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 112 Wis. 150, 88 N. W. 41, 47, 88 Am. St. Rep. 949, 56 L.R.A. 246; Fitz- gerald v. Rapid City First Nat. Bank, 114 Fed. 474, 52 C. C. A. 276), and the grantor was certainly bound, by operation of law, to account for and to pay to its cotenant one-half of the value of the ore it had extracted from their common property, and the cotenant had the right to enforce that obligation in a court of justice.

The grantee was a new corporation, formed apparently to succeed to the rights of the grantor, to take all its property, and to acquire other interests. Most, if not all, of the stockholders of the grantor received stock of the grantee in payment of their respective shares of the $3,750,000 paid by the grantee for the grantor's property [173] and surrendered their stock in the grantor. Keith was the president, and Kearns was the vice president and manager of the grantor, and they were also stockholders and directors of the grantee, when the conveyance to it was accepted, and they voted for the resolution which authorized the grantee's contract to pay all the debts and obligations of the grantor. There were seven other directors in the board of the grantee. Keith and Kearns had conducted the grantor's extraction of the ore from the common property, and necessarily knew all about it; but they claim that they thought that the grantor was not indebted to its cotenant, because they believed that the expense of finding and taking the ore out of the ground exceeded the proceeds obtained from it. The other seven directors testified substantially that they were aware of three or four other obligations contracted by the grantor, but that they were ignorant of the extraction of this ore and of the grantee's liability therefor, and that they never intended to authorize a contract by the grantee to pay for it. The foregoing facts were proved by counsel for the grantee, and they rely upon them to reach the conclusion that the parties to the contract never intended that the grantee should agree by its promise to pay the grantor's obligation to account for the ore thus extracted. They contend that their evidence proves that the grantee was ignorant of the obligation arising out of the taking of the ore, and, while this is not admitted, it is conceded for the purpose of the discussion and determination of the question here at issue.

Counsel invoke the general rule that the purpose of all interpretation of the words and terms of a contract is to ascertain the sense or meaning in which the parties to it used them when their minds met upon the stipulations of the agreement, and they then argue that inasmuch as the grantee was aware of three or four other obligations contracted by the grantor, and was ignorant of this one, the parties to the contract intended to exclude it from the meaning of the words

"all the debts and obligations of the grantor." But the words and terms of this agreement are clear, and their meaning is not doubtful. It is ambiguous words and terms of doubtful meaning in a contract only that are susceptible to interpretation by the situation of the parties and the circumstances surrounding them when they made them. The secret intentions of parties to a contract, the words and terms of which are clear, free from ambiguity, and inexpressive of the intention, may not be imported into it by construction. Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt, etc. Co. 114 Fed. 77, 80, 52 C. C. A. 25, 28, 57 L.R.A. 696. And:

"Where, without fraud, accident, or mutual mistake (and none of these has been pleaded or proved in this case), the written contract purports to be a memorial of the transaction, it supersedes all prior representations, proposals, and negotiations, and is conclusive evidence that it embodies such of these as were ultimately intended to become parts of the agreement, and that all others were rejected as not expressing the final intention of the parties. . . . The law controlling the operation of a contract is deemed to be, and usually is actually, within the contemplation and intention of the parties, as much as the words in which it is expressed, and becomes equally an [174] essential part of it. . . . For this reason the rule that a written contract cannot be varied by parol extends to the legal import or intentment of the contract, as well as to the terms or words in which it is written." Union Selling Co. v. Jones, 128 Fed. 672, 676, 63 C. C. A. 224, 228; Elliott on Evidence, pp. 646, 647.

By the plain terms of the contract the grantee agreed to pay all the debts and obligations of the grantor. It was not a contract to pay all the debts and obligations of the grantor listed or named in the agreement for none was listed or named, nor all except those unknown to the grantee, nor all the debts and obligations of the grantor except the obligation to pay for one-half of the ore which the grantor extracted from the Vesuvius claim; and because the grantee, at the time it made the contract with the grantor, had the opportunity to require the insertion of any of these limitations and exceptions it desired in its contract, and it did not do so, but permitted and induced the grantor to join in and perform it in reliance upon the grantee's promise to pay all its debts and obligations without exception, it is now estopped from importing into its promise by construction any of these limitations or exceptions. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mowry, 96 U. S. 544, 547, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 674, 676. This is a natural, reasonable, and righteous conclusion. This agreement by the grantee to pay all the debts and obligations of the grantor was a natural and reasonable requirement of the grantor, which was parting with all its property, with all its means to pay its debts and obligations; and the evidence of the situation, knowledge, intention, and circumstances of the parties which counsel for the grantee have produced, if admissible and carefully considered, as it has been, would fail to convince that these parties ever intended that the conveyance should be made without such a contract. The obligation of the grantor to account for and pay to the predecessor of the complainant the value of one-half of the ore extracted by the grantor from the Vesuvius claim fell far within the terms, and meaning of the agreement of the grantee to pay all the debts and obligations of the grantor.

The next contention is that the creditor, the complainant, cannot maintain this suit on the contract of the grantee, because the grantor itself could not have maintained it. But for the reasons already stated the grantor could have maintained a suit upon the contract of the grantee, in the absence of fraud, mutual mistake, accident, or rescission, and none of these has been pleaded or proved in this case. Moreover, while the general rule is that the suit of a creditor against the grantee, founded on the latter's promise to the grantor, is subject to the same defenses as the suit of the grantor would have been, the exceptional facts of this case place the creditor in a much stronger position than the grantor itself would have had. The assignor of the complainant was a creditor of the grantor when the conveyance of all its property to the grantee was made, and the complainant has succeeded to all the rights of its assignor. A "transfer of property by a debtor with the reservation of an interest therein to himself" is always fraudulent and voidable by his creditors as [175] against a debtor and all claiming under him with notice of his act, and a transfer by stockholders of a corporation of all its property to another corporation, in consideration that they receive stock or bonds of the grantee in exchange for their stock in the grantor, is equally fraudulent in law as to the unpaid creditors of the grantor, and renders the grantee liable for their claims. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Boyd, 177 Fed. 804, 101 C. C. A. 18; Luedcke v. Des Moines Cabinet Co. 140 Ia. 223, 118 N. W. 456, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 616; Hurd v. New York, etc. Steam Laundry Co. 167 N. Y. 89, 60 N. E. 327; Montgomery Web Co. v. Dienelt, 133 Pa. St. 585, 596, 19 Atl. 428, 19 Am. St. Rep. 663; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall. 392, 409, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 117, 120; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Paul, 93 Fed. 878, 884, 35 C. C. A. 639.

In the case at bar, most, if not all, of the stockholders of the grantor took stock of the grantee in exchange for their stock in the grantor, and in consideration of this exchange caused all the property of their corporation to be conveyed to the grantee. If, therefore, as counsel for the grantee argue, the grantee did not make a valid agreement with the grantor to pay its obligation to the assignor of the complainant, the conveyance of the grantor's property to the grantee was fraudulent as to the assignor and is fraudulent as to the complainant, and on that ground the grantee is liable to pay the claim of the complainant, for the property of the grantor which the grantee received was worth much more than the amount of this claim. The contention that the grantor may escape liability here, either because the grantor could not maintain an action upon its promise, or because the obligation of the grantor to account and pay for the ore was not within the terms of the promise, cannot be sustained.

Finally, it is insisted that the creditor has no right of action on the grantee's promise to the grantor to pay the creditor's claim because it does not appear that this contract was made for the creditor's benefit, and that it was the party intended to be benefited thereby. The following language of Judge Folger is quoted from Simson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 355:

"It is not every promise made by one to another, from the performance of which a benefit may inure to a third, which gives a right of action to such third person; he being neither privy to the contract, nor to the consideration. The contract must be made for his benefit as its object, and he must be the party intended to be benefited."

Many authorities are cited that have repeated or approved this statement of the law. Austin v. Seligman, 18 Fed. 519, 522; Sayward v. Dexter, 72 Fed. 758, 764, 765, 44 U. S. App. 376, 19 C. C. A. 176; Constable v. National Steamship Co. 154 U. S. 51, 74, 14 S. Ct. 1062, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 903, 914; American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 76 Fed. 130; Central Trust Co. v. Berwind-White Coal Co. 95 Fed. 391; Electric Appliance Co. v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. 110 Wis. 434, 85 N. W. 648, 53 L.R.A. 609, 613; Parker v. Jeffrey, 26 Ore. 186, 37 Pac. 712; Burton v. Larkin, 36 Kan. 246, 250, 13 Pac. 398, 59 [176] Am. Rep. 541; Howsmen v. Trenton Water Co. 119 Mo. 304, 308, 24 S. W. 784, 23 L.R.A. 146, 41 Am. St. Rep. 654; Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160, 2 So. 6. But none of these cases was a suit in equity and in none of them were the equitable doctrines that a creditor may have the benefit of any security or obligation given by the principal debtor to the surety, and that, to avoid circuity of action, the creditor may be, and is, when he sues upon the contract of the grantee.

to pay the latter's indebtedness to the creditor, in equity substituted for the grantee and promisee, upon which this suit stands, either invoked or available. Authorities are conflicting upon the proposition that it is essential to the maintenance of an action at law by the creditor of a grantor upon the contract of his grantee to pay the grantor's debts that the contract should be made for the creditor's benefit as its object and that he should be the party intended to be benefited. Coster v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 399, 411, and cases there cited; Arnold v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 117, 119.

That, however, is a moot question in this case. It is unnecessary to consider or discuss it, and it is here dismissed, because this is a suit in equity, and not an action at law. In such a suit it is sufficient that the grantee has agreed with the grantor to be primarily liable for the latter's obligation to the creditor, so that, as between the parties to the agreement, the first is the principal and the second the surety. The creditor of the surety is then entitled in equity to be substituted in his place, and to maintain his suit against the grantee to the same extent as the grantor could have maintained it, and it is immaterial whether the contract was made and intended for the benefit of the creditor or of the grantor, for the creditor has all the rights of both to enforce the obligation of the grantee. Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 623, 10 S. Ct. 494, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 667, 673, and the authorities there cited; Barker v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 124 Fed. 555, 568, 569; Willard v. Wood, 164 U. S. 502, 519, 520, 17 S. Ct. 176, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 531, 538, 539; Johns v. Wilson, 180 U. S. 440, 447, 448, 21 S. Ct. 445, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 613, 617. There was no error in the decision of the court below that the grantee, the defendant, was liable to account and pay to the creditor, the complainant, for the half of the value of the ore extracted by the grantor from the Vesuvius claim prior to June 19, 1907, and that the complainant could maintain this suit in equity to enforce that accounting and payment on the promise of the grantee to the grantor to pay all the latter's debts and obligations.

(C) The court below found that the value of one-half of the ore extracted from the Vesuvius claim by the defendant and its grantor was $516,264.47, and that the complainant was entitled to recover from the defendant this sum and interest thereon at 8 per cent per annum from January 1, 1906, which amounted in the aggregate to $735,045.87 on April 17, 1911, when the decree for that amount was rendered. The complainant and defendant complain of this amount, the former that it is too small, the latter that it is too large, and by numerous specifications of error challenge the controlling facts which the court found and used to ascertain it. As the defendant [177] stands in the shoes of the grantor in this accounting, the acts, omissions, and intent of the latter will henceforth be treated as those of the former, and the grantor will be ignored. The defendant secretly entered the Vesuvius claim beneath its surface by means of a deep shaft, which it sunk from adjoining claims, which it owned in severalty, and, working by means of levels running from this shaft, extracted the ore, mixed it with the ores it took from the claims it owned in severalty, sold the combined product, and kept all the proceeds. It kept no account of the ore which it took from the Vesuvius claim, and gave no notice to the complainant's grantor that it was extracting it, and that grantor was in ignorance of that fact until the ore was gone.

The court below was compelled to ascertain the amount and value of this ore from more than 4,000 printed pages of evidence. It found from this evidence these facts: The extent of the excavation in the Vesuvius claim was 573,937 cubic feet. After the excavation was made there remained in the cavity 435,350 cubic feet of caved and waste material, and 31,551 cubic feet of like material had been removed, so that the entire amount of this material was 466,901 cubic feet. This material, when it was in place in the cavity, occupied only one-half of the space which it filled after it was extracted, or only 233,450 cubic feet. Deducting this amount from the 573,937 cubic feet in the excavation, there remained 340,487 cubic feet of the cavity which must have been originally occupied by the ore which the defendant removed. This ore was of two classes: There were 18,916 tons of ore of the first class, from which the defendant realized $60.07 per ton, in all $1,136,284.12. The cost of mining, tramming, and smelting this ore was $6.33 per ton, or $119,738.28, which left the net proceeds from it $1,016,545.84. There were 14,187 tons of second-class ore, whose net value was $3.53 per ton, in all $50,080.11. The sum of $1,016,545.84 and $50,080.11 is $1,066,625.95. The cost of the work done by the defendant within the Vesuvius claim in developing the ore was $34,097. Deducting this amount from $1,066,625.95, there remains $1,032,528.95, the total net value of the ore taken from the Vesuvius claim by the defendant. One-half of this amount, or $516,264.47, and the interest thereon, is the amount which the court found from these facts the defendant owed the complainant for its share of this ore.

Each of the findings of fact from which the court deduced this conclusion is vigorously assailed by each of the parties to this suit in oral argument and in briefs which contain many hundreds of printed pages. Each of them has been carefully examined, with the aid of these arguments and briefs, and in the light of the evidence to which they refer, and has been found to have been deduced from conflicting testimony, and many of them from evidence very evenly balanced. These findings, therefore, fall far within the familiar rule that, where a court has considered conflicting evidence, and made a finding or decree, it is presumptively correct, and unless some obvious error of law has intervened, or some serious mistake of fact has been made, the finding or decree must be permitted to stand. Coder v. [178] Arts, 152 Fed. 943, 946, 82 C. C. A. 91, 94, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 372; Tilghman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 136, 8 S. Ct. 894, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 664; Kimberly v. Arms, 129 U. S. 512, 9 S. Ct. 355, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 764; Furrer v. Ferris, 145 U. S. 132, 134, 12 S. Ct. 821, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 649.

An exhaustive consideration of the record and the briefs relating to the defendant's specifications of error in regard to these findings has failed to convince that through any mistake of fact or error of law the court below has made any finding or reached any conclusion too favorable to the complainant. Turning to the specifications of the complainant, there is convincing evidence that there was a space in the openings out of and directly connected with the excavated stope in the Vesuvius claim which contained 22,168 cubic feet that was not included in the 573,937 cubic feet of excavation on which the finding of the court below is based, and one of complainant's specifications is the exclusion of these 22,168 cubic feet. But because there is persuasive evidence that there was only a small percentage of the material taken from these openings which contained any ore, that these openings were made in the course of the work of developing the ore body and determining its extent, and not in the work of stoping for ore, and that the larger part of the material taken from them was never placed in the stoped cavity, but was taken to the surface and thrown away before the cavity was made, the record fails to prove that the court below made any mistake in this exclusion.

The complainant specifies as error the addition by the court of 31,551 cubic feet of waste material removed from the cavity in 1909 to the 435,350 cubic feet of filled material which the court found in the cavity, on the ground that this added material was removed after the measurement of the filled material on which the court relied had been made, so that this addition gave the defendant credit for it twice. This specification is well founded. The evidence convinces that the court fell into the mistake here charged, and on account of it the amount which the court found the defendant owed the complainant should be increased $23,908.07.

The complainant specifies as error: (1) The allowance by the court to the defendant below of one-half the cost of mining, tramming, and sampling the first-class or shipping ore, and one-half the cost of mining, milling, tramming, and sampling the second-class or milling ore, which amounted in the aggregate to about $117,000.00; and (2) that it failed to charge the defendant with compound interest upon the amount found due. In support of the first specification, its counsel invoke the rule that the measure of damages for the reckless, willful, or intentional taking of ore or timber from the land of another without right is the enhanced value of the ore or timber when it is finally converted to the use of the trespasser, without allowance to him for the labor bestowed or expense incurred in removing and preparing it for market. Wooden-Ware Co. v. U. S. 106 U. S. 432, 434, 1 S. Ct. 398, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 230, 231; U. S. v. Homestake Min. Co. 117 Fed. 481, 482, 54 C. C. A. 303, 304; Durant Min. Co. v. Percy Consol. Min. Co. 93 Fed. 166, 167, 35 C. C. A. 252, 254; Resurrection Gold Min. Co. v. Fortune Gold Min. Co. 129 Fed. 668, 679, 64 C. C. A. 180, 191. They argue that this rule is applicable to the [179] case at bar, and cite in support of their contention Sweeney v. Hanley, 126 Fed. 97, 103, 61 C. C. A. 153, 159; Foster v. Weaver, 118 Pa. St. 42, 12 Atl. 313, 4 Am. St. Rep. 573; Walker v. Walker, 9 Wall. 743, 757, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 814, 820; Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. v. Soutter, 13 Wall. 517, 519, 520, 523, 524, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 543, 545; Blank v. Aronson, 187 Fed. 241, 246, 109 C. C. A. 327, 332; Guckenheimer v. Angevine, 81 N. Y. 394, 396, 397; Goble v. O'Connor, 43 Neb. 49, 61 N. W. 131, 133, 134; Lynch v. Burt, 132 Fed. 417, 67 C. C. A. 305.

These and other authorities have been examined, but they fail to disclose any settled rule of law to the effect that a cotenant, who lawfully extracts the ore from the common property and sells it, is deprived, in his accounting with his cotenant, by his preconceived intent to appropriate all the proceeds thereof to himself, of any allowance for the necessary and reasonable expense of extracting, preparing, and marketing the ore. In Sweeney v. Hanley, 126 Fed. 97, 103, 61 C. C. A. 153, 159, and Foster v. Weaver, 118 Pa. St. 42, 12 Atl. 313, 4 Am. St. Rep. 573, cotenants who had first fraudulently obtained from their fellows conveyances of their shares of the common property, and thereafter had extracted the mineral from it, were denied an allowance for their labor and expense. The courts held that the complainants were entitled to the enhanced value of their shares of the mineral extracted and sold by the defendants while the complainants were fraudulently dispossessed by them, without any deduction or allowance for the labor and expense of mining or marketing. In those cases the intentional and fraudulent dispossession of the defendants was first effected, and it characterized and rendered unlawful the subsequent acts of the defendants. In the case in hand, however, the intent of the defendant to appropriate all the proceeds of the ore to its own use did not render its entry upon the common property, or its extraction and preparation of the ore for market, unlawful. In this extraction, preparation, and sale it was not a trespasser. It was not acting without right. It was the owner of one half of every particle of the ore in its own right, and of the other half when extracted as trustee for its cotenant. It had the right to extract and sell the ore, in order that it might obtain its share of its value; and if it had accounted for and paid over to its cotenant in due time its part of the proceeds of the sales, no one would be so bold as to claim that it was not entitled to a just allowance for the reasonable expense of mining it, preparing it for the market, and selling it.

In an accounting by a trustee in equity, the basic principle is that the account should be so stated that the trustee shall make no profit from his use of the property of the cestui que trust, and that the latter shall receive the just value of his property and its income. Other equitable rules and principles inform and guide the conscience of the chancellor; but their application to the particular facts of each case is necessarily and wisely left largely to his discretion, to use them in such a manner as to work out the fundamental principle that governs the accounting.

It is conceded that there is convincing evidence in this record that the defendant had the intent, before it extracted any of this ore, to appropriate it all to itself; that it entered secretly, and carefully concealed [180] its extraction and sale of the ore for many years; that it mixed the ore with its own taken from other mines, which it owned in severalty; that it kept no separate account of this ore, or of its proceeds; and that it caved the stope from which it extracted it, so that it was difficult and expensive to ascertain the amount or value of the ore it took. But an evil intent does not make a rightful act wrongful, or an owner of property in its lawful possession a trespasser thereon (Stevenson v. Newnhan, 13 C. B. 285, 297, 76 E. C. L. 285; Allen v. Flood [1898] App. Cas. (Eng.) 114, 123), or necessarily subject a cotenant who extracts ore from the common property to the measure of damages for a willful trespass. It was a trustee for the complainant of its share of the ore it took, and of the proceeds thereof. As such trustee it violated its duty to notify its cotenant of its entry and taking of the ore, its duty to keep the ore separate, its duty to keep an account of it and of its proceeds, and its duty promptly to account for and pay to its cotenant its just share of the proceeds of the ore. Nevertheless, when this matter came to an accounting in the court below, the duty still rested upon the chancellor so to apply the rules and principles of equity jurisprudence to this accounting that the complainant should receive its just share of the value of the ore, or of its proceeds, and the defendant should make no profit by its breaches of trust.

The general and just rule is that a cotenant, in exclusive possession of mining property, who extracts and sells the ore, may charge against its proceeds the reasonable and necessary expense of its extraction and marketing. Lindley on Mines, § 790, p. 990; Fulmer's Appeal, 128 Pa. St. 24, 18 Atl. 493, 15 Am. St. Rep. 662. The chancellor below was of the opinion that the application of this rule to the accounting in this case would yield a just and equitable result, and our review of the evidence and the arguments has led to the same conclusion. There was neither error nor mistake in allowing to the defendant the reasonable expense of mining, tramming, milling, and sampling the ore.

Did the court err by its refusal to allow compound interest? Compound interest is generally allowed to give effect to the equitable rule that a trustee may not derive profit from the property of the cestui que trust, and that the latter should receive the full value of his property and its income. Walker v. Walker, 9 Wall. 743, 757, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 814, 820; Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457, 472; Schieffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 620, 627, 7 Am. Dec. 507. The defendant stood in a fiduciary relation to its cotenant. It held the complainant's share of the ore and its proceeds in trust for it. It violated its duty to keep an account of the ore and its proceeds, to keep the ore separate from other ores it mined, to account for and promptly pay over to the defendant its share of the proceeds of the ore, and to inform the defendant of its acts and omissions. But if the payment of the amount adjudged will deprive the defendant of all profit from the complainant's share of the ore, and will yield to the complainant the full value of its share and of the interest or income therefrom that it would probably have derived if the defendant had not extracted the ore, the reason for the allowance of compound interest does not exist.

The defendant took this ore from the mine between 1902 and May, 1908. It extracted the larger part of it between 1904 and 1908.

The [181] testimony fails to disclose the amount taken each month, or each year, and the court below fixed January 1, 1906, as the mean time when the entire debt of the defendant for the complainant's share of the proceeds of all the ore should be deemed due, and charged it with interest thereon from that date at 8 per cent per annum. The evidence left the value of the ore uncertain. For the first-class ore the court charged the defendant with the highest monthly price it had received for ore of that class during the extraction of this ore, and it stated its account by the rule that the defendant should be made to bear the burden of any uncertainty in the proof due to its fault. This was the state of the case when the request for compound interest was considered, and the chancellor said that the lawful rate of interest to be allowed by the decree, 8 per cent per annum, was above the current rate, that the method of calculation of the amount adjudged due had been sufficiently unfavorable to the defendant, and refused to grant the request. The evidence in this case is so persuasive in support of many of the findings of the court on the material issues of fact, and so conflicting and uncertain upon the others, that the record fails to convince that the amount adjudged due, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, will not yield to the complainant the full value of its share of the ore extracted, and of the income that it probably would have derived from it, if the extraction had not been made, or that it will not deprive the defendant of all profit therefrom. There is no rule of law which requires the allowance of compound interest under such circumstances, and no mistake of fact or error of law is discovered in the refusal to charge it.

There are many specifications of error of each of the parties to this suit which have not been discussed in this opinion, but there is none which has not received examination and reflection. This is a suit in equity, and the consideration and decision of the questions this appeal presents is a trial of this case de novo. Upon a review of the entire case, the conclusion of this court is that the decree below, modified by the correction of the slight mistake which has been noted, is well sustained by the evidence, reasonable, and just.

Let the case, therefore, be remanded to the court below, with directions to modify the decree by increasing the amount of the adjudged recovery by $34,034.46, which is the sum of $23,908.07 and interest thereon from January 1, 1906, to April 17, 1911, and let the decree, so modified, be affirmed.

NOTE.

Right of Tenant in Common to Remove Minerals from Soil.

Generally, 580.

Rights and Remedies of Cotenant:

In General, 583.

Measure of Recovery, 584.

Generally.

By the common law of England a tenant in common in possession of the property was not liable to his cotenant for waste committed by him on the common estate, but such a liability was imposed by an early statute which is generally deemed to have been adopted as part of the common law of the United States, and similar statutes have been enacted in most American jurisdictions. See the note to Hoolihan v. Hoolihan, 15 Ann. Cas. 269. Such acts of depletion of the freehold as the quarrying of stone from the common lands have been deemed waste within statutes of that character. Childs v. Kansas City, etc. R. Co. 117 Mo. 414, 23 S. W. 373; Cosgriff v. Dewey, 21 App. Div. 129, 47 N. Y. S. 255, affirmed 164 N. Y. 1, 58 N. E. 1, 79 Am. St. Rep. 620.

But where the common property consists of a mine it is obvious that it is capable of no other use than that of extracting the minerals therein contained and that the tenant in possession cannot in the nature of things avail himself of that use without depleting the mineral deposit in which his cotenant has an equal interest. It is accordingly held by the weight of authority that a tenant in common of a mine has a right to work the mine, and is not guilty of waste in so doing. Job v. Potton, L. R. 20 Eq. (Eng.) 84; Dettering v. Nordstrom, 148 Fed. 81, 78 C. C. A. 157; McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co. 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686; Russell v. Merchants' Bank, 47 Minn. 286, 50 N. W. 228, 28 Am. St. Rep. 368; Vervalen v. Older, 8 N. J. Eq. 98; Blewett v. Coleman, 40 Pa. St. 45; Coleman's Appeal, 62 Pa. St. 252. See also Paul v. Craguaz, 25 Nev. 295, 59 Pac. 857, 60 Pac. 983.

The reason of the rule was tersely stated in Vervalen v. Older, supra, as follows: "Quarrying is the only use that can be made of the ground described in the bill; and the complainant sold to the defendant the undivided half of it as a quarry lot. The proper use of it as such cannot be considered waste."

In the leading case of McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co. 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686, it was said: "Is it not also true from the very nature of mining property in this state, valuable only because of the mineral it is supposed to contain, that each of the cotenants may use it in the only way it can be used? The cotenants out of possession may at any time enter into an equal enjoyment of their possession; their neglect to do so may be regarded as an assent to the sole occupation of the other. This is but another application of the principle announced in Pico v. Columbet, 12 Cal. 414. True the cotenants will not be held to assent to the commission of waste by the sole occupant, but the question returns, what acts done by him are waste? It cannot be doubted that on the part of a mere trespasser it is a wrong in the nature of waste to remove any ore from a mine. The cases cited by appellants fully sustain this proposition. But it is not a just inference that as between tenants in common the rule is the same. Section 732 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not relate to trespasses committed by those who have no interest in the property. Nor does it define 'waste,' or declare what acts committed by a guardian, tenant for life or years, or joint tenant, or tenant in common, as the case may be, shall be waste. For the appropriate meaning of the word, as applicable to acts done by these several classes of persons, we are relegated to the principles of the common law, and to various considerations of policy arising out of different conditions which the common law recognizes and approves. The word 'waste' is not an arbitrary term to be applied inflexibly without regard to the quantity or quality of the estate, the nature and species of the property, or the relation to it of the person charged to have committed the wrong. As was said by Roane, J., in Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. (Va.) 134, 'in considering what is waste in this country, it is to be remarked that the common law by which it is regulated adapts itself in this as in other cases to the varied situations and circumstances of the country. . . . The law on this subject must be applied with reasonable regard to circumstances.' In the mining regions of this state where title to a lode can be acquired from a United States government only after work of certain value has been done upon it, can it be, that if one of several locators or owners shall assume the sole risk of developing the mine, he shall become liable to those who have taken no chance of possible loss, not only for an accounting as to net profits—supposing him to be fortunate enough to secure any—but also as a tortfeasor, for three times the value of the whole, or for a proportionate share of the ore taken out? It will be observed, upon the facts herein, no question arises as to unnecessary damage done to the mine or its works, by reason of reckless or unskilful management of the business by the tenant conducting

it. There may be cases in which the courts will impose damages for an abuse of his right by a cotenant in occupation, or interpose to prevent such abuse. But here the theory of plaintiffs is that defendant could not extract ore from the mine without committing waste, because such extraction is a destruction of the very substance of the estate; an irreparable injury to the inheritance. In view of the character of the property, and of plaintiffs' implied assent to its sole occupation by defendant for mining purposes, we regard the right of the latter to the proceeds of its operations as partaking of the nature of an usufruct, the appropriation of the net returns as a legitimate participation of the profits, and its acts of mining as not impairing or consuming the estate to any greater extent than must be presumed to have been intended to be allowable by each of the parties in interest."

In Job v. Potton, L. R. 20 Eq. (Eng.) 84, the Vice Chancellor said: "Now, no authority has been referred to, and I believe none can be found, to say that the rights of tenants in common in a mine are not as extensive as can be suggested for each of those tenants to do what he wills with the undivided property, provided always that he does not take more than his share. The statute of Anne has recognized that principle, and every decision which I know of has adopted it as a principle. What difference is there between a tree growing, which the court refuses to prevent a tenant in common from cutting at his pleasure, although it is a part of the inheritance, and a tree which by some operation of nature has become carbonised and turned into cannel coal? How is a tenant in common to enjoy his share (if that is the right expression) of the common property in a coal mine, if he is not at liberty to dig and carry away the coal? The only restriction upon him is that he must not appropriate to himself more than his share."

A majority of the co-owners of a mine may work the mine against the objection of a minority owner. Sweeney v. Hanley, 126 Fed. 97, 61 C. C. A. 153; Hawkins v. Spokane Hydraulic Min. Co. 3 Idaho 241, 650, 28 Pac. 433, 33 Pac. 40. In Dougherty v. Creary, 30 Cal. 291, 89 Am. Dec. 116, it was said: "As the property can only be used in entirety, it is indispensable to the conducting of the business of mining that those owning the major portion of the property should have the power to control, in case all cannot agree, otherwise the work might become wholly discontinued."

It is held in at least two jurisdictions that a tenant in common, whatever may be his rights as to mines in existence on the common property, has no right to open new mines, and is guilty of waste if he does so. Dangerfield v. Caldwell, 151 Fed. 554, 81 C. C. A. 400 (applying West Virginia rule); Murray v. Haverty, 70 Ill. 318; Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 38 L.R.A. 694; Paxton v. Benedum Trees Oil Co. (W. Va.) 94 S. E. 472. And see Goodenow v. Farguhar, 19 Grant. Ch. (U. C.) 614.

In Murray v. Haverty, supra, it was said: "No principle is better settled, than that one tenant in common cannot lawfully commit waste or destroy the common property, or do any act that will work a permanent injury to the inheritance. Our statute has authorized one tenant to maintain trespass or trover against his cotenant, who shall take away, destroy, lessen in value or otherwise injure the common property. Mining coal or excavating and removing earth, would tend to injure, destroy and lessen in value the estate. Notwithstanding the fact, in contemplation of law, tenants in common are all seized of each and every part of the estate, still, neither one is permitted with impunity to do acts deemed prejudicial or destructive of the interests of the other cotenants."

In Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 38 L.R.A. 694, the court said: "Having seen that Jones, as life tenant, could not take this oil, we shall next inquire whether his right as owner in fee of three-tenths gave him right to do so. Jones was a tenant in common with the owners of the seven-tenths. By the old law one tenant in common was not liable to another for waste; but our Code of 1891 (chapter 92, sec. 2) has remedied this unreasonable rule by making tenants in common, joint tenants and parceners liable for waste. 1 Lomax, Dig. 499; 2 Minor, Inst. 620. Then we have simply to inquire whether the extraction of oil is waste, and under authorities above given we must answer that it is. Those acts which would be waste in a tenant for life would be between tenants in common.

. . . If oil wells had been already opened, Jones, as cotenant, might set up claim under his three-tenths interest to work them, and take all profits under some cases [McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co. 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863]; though I should think he would have to account under section 14, chapter 100, Code. Rust v. Rust, 17 W. Va. 901. That would be no wrong; not waste. His life tenancy would give him the right to take all the oil. But there were no oil wells on it, nor any precedent authority to open any. He first pierced the soil in quest of this fluid of fabulous wealth. He had no right to pierce it to get even his three-tenths of the oil. If he chose to do so, of every gallon seven-tenths belonged to the owners of the seven-tenths in the land, because it had been part of their soil."

But in Smith v. Sharpe, 44 N. C. 91, 57 Am. Dec. 574, it was said: "There is no remainderman or reversioner to be injured, or to bring any action—the whole property in fee simple being in the plaintiff and defendant; the marl lying in the earth is valuable to no one: can it be that the plaintiff, through obstinacy, or any other cause, can deprive the defendant of all benefit to be claimed from it? Or, that by converting the property to its general and profitable use, he commits a wrong to his cotenant, and subjects himself to an action of waste? Suppose A and B are tenants in common of a tract of land which is in woods—can either of them, without the consent of the other, clear a portion of the land, and put it in cultivation, without becoming a tortfeasor? In the case we are considering, we hold that the plaintiff cannot maintain the action, because as a fishery, the land is neither injured in value nor destroyed, but improved. For the value of the marl removed by the defendant, he is no doubt bound to account to the plaintiff, but not in this action."

It has been held that a tenant in common may not transfer his right to extract minerals. Thus, in Boston Franklinite Co. v. Condit, 19 N. J. Eq. 394, it was said: "So, if the ores in one undivided half be conveyed as in this case, the cotenant will not be affected by it, but would be entitled to a partition of the whole between him and his original cotenant, without regard to the rights of the grantee. The whole tract must be divided into two shares equal, not in quantity, but in value; the ores and mines on one part would be valued as against the meadows, waterpower, or buildings, on the other part. And if the part containing the mines or minerals were allotted in partition under the acts requiring partition by lot, or assigned on other proceedings to the cotenant, he would have the right to retain it, although the grantee of the ores should thereby lose all right. His title as against such cotenant is void." So in Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Sandlin, 173 Mo. App. 384, 158 S. W. 857, it was said: "The lessee of one tenant in common has no right to mine and take mineral ores from a tract of land against the will and without the consent of the other cotenant. [17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 673, 674; Zeigler v. Brenneeman, 237 Ill. 15, 86 N. E. 597, 599; Moreland v. Strong, 115 Mich. 211, 73 N. W. 140; Jackson v. O'Rourke, 71 Neb. 418, 98 N. W. 1068; Martens v. O'Connor, 101 Wis. 18, 76 N. W. 774; Adam v. Briggs Iron Co. 7 Cuah. 361, 368; St. Louis v. Laclede Gas-Light Co. 96 Mo. 197, 9 S. W. 581; McBeth v. Trabue, 69 Mo. 642.]"

In Montana a statute of 1895 provided that "if any person shall assume and exercise exclusive ownership over or take away, destroy, lessen in value or otherwise injure or abuse any property held in joint tenancy or tenancy in common the party aggrieved shall have his remedy for the injury in the same manner as he would have if such joint tenancy or tenancy in common did not exist." Under that act it was held that one tenant in common of a mine was entitled to enjoin the other from operating the same. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Butte, etc. Min. Co. 17 Mont. 519, 43 Pac. 924; Red Mountain Consol. Min. Co. v. Esler, 18 Mont. 174, 44 Pac. 523; Connole v. Boston, etc. Consol. Copper, etc. Min. Co. 20 Mont. 523, 52 Pac. 263. The right to an injunction rested wholly on the statute, since the operation of the mine was held not to constitute waste. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Butte, etc. Min. Co. 17 Mont. 519, 43 Pac. 924. Accordingly the right to injunctive relief was held not to be affected by the fact that the value of the mine was enhanced by its operation. Harrigan v. Lynch, 21 Mont. 36, 52 Pac. 642. In 1899 the act was amended so as to give to a tenant in common the right to mine the common property, subject to a liability to account to his cotenant for the latter's share of the profits. That amendment, while it has been held to be unconstitutional as to cotenancies previously created (Butte, etc. Consol. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co. 24 Mont. 125, 60 Pac. 1039, rehearing denied 25 Mont. 41, 63 Pac. 825) is apparently the law of that jurisdiction as to those created after its enactment.

Rights and Remedies of Cotenant.

IN GENERAL.

In case the removal of minerals by a tenant in common constitutes waste his cotenant is entitled to an injunction. See the cases cited in the preceding subdivision. Likewise a tenant in common in possession of mining property has been enjoined from converting the minerals to his own use. Binswanger v. Henninger, 1 Alaska 509. In case of waste by the removal of minerals the tenant out of possession may sue for damages. Murray v. Haverty, 70 Ill. 318. But in such an action he cannot have an accounting. McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co. 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686.

A tenant in common excluded from participation in the operation of a mine is not entitled to bring trespass, Coleman v. Grubb, 23 Pa. St. 393, or forcible entry and detainer, Henderson v. Allen, 23 Cal. 519.

Though the circumstances are such as to warrant an injunction, the tenant out of possession need not thus proceed, but may sue for an accounting. Sweeney v. Hanley, 126 Fed. 97 61 C. C. A. 153.

The general rule that a tenant in common out of possession is entitled to an accounting of the rents and profits (see the note to Schuster v. Schuster, 18 Ann. Cas. 1078) is applicable to a case where a mine owned in common is operated by one of the tenants. Kahn v. Central Smelting Co. 102 U. S. 641, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 266; Barnum v. Landon, 25 Conn. 137; Huff v. McDonald, 22 Ga. 131, 68 Am. Dec. 487; Russell v. Merchants' Bank, 47 Minn. 286, 50 N. W. 228, 28 Am. St. Rep. 368; Gregg v. Roaring Springs Land, etc. Co. 97 Mo. App. 44, 70 S. W. 920; Cosgriff v. Dewey, 164 N. Y. 1, 58 N. E. 1, 79 Am. St. Rep. 620; McCabe v. McCabe, 18 Hun (N. Y.) 153; Abbey v. Wheeler, 32 N. Y. S. 1069, affirming 10 Misc. 61, 30 N. Y. S. 874; Early v. Friend, 16 Grat. (Va.) 21, 78 Am. Dec. 649; Curtis v. Coleman, 22 Grant. Ch. (U. C.) 561.

As was said in McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co. 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686: "We have said that the net proceeds from the working of the mine were rather in the nature of profits from the use than the result of the destruction of the inheritance. But it may be conceded, for the purposes of this decision, that the relation of the tenants in common, under the circumstances disclosed, is sui generis, and their rights peculiar. That while the extraction of ore from the mine by one tenant, who does not exclude his cotenants, is not waste, and the neglect of the latter to enter should be held an assent on their part to the exclusive occupation by the former; yet, because the effect of the exclusive working by one may be to exhaust the mineral, and the uncertainty of the prospective value of the property may render it impossible to make a just partition of it, a court of equity should order an accounting; holding that, while it must have been contemplated by the parties that the tenant in occupation should not be held for waste, nor prohibited from proceeding with his work by the cotenants who do not seek to enter, yet it must also have been contemplated that the tenant in occupation should not appropriate to himself the entire profits."

In Irvine v. Hanlin, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 219, it was held that assumpsit would not lie to recover the share of an excluded cotenant in the profits of a mine. But in Winton Coal Co. v. Pancoast Coal Co. 170 Pa. St. 437, 33 Atl. 110, it was said: "Defendant has not sold the title claimed by plaintiff to the coal in place, but has mined, sold and disposed of the coal itself in such manner that the same cannot be recovered by ejectment. Nor is the present an action for the use and occupation of the land, but merely for the proceeds of coal sold, plaintiff's title to which has been legally divested; and, from the nature of the transaction, the coal thus mined and sold cannot be recovered in specie, in any form of action. By sustaining this action, defendant is not deprived of any legal right, nor prevented from setting up any defense that might otherwise be interposed. On the contrary, circuity of action is avoided, and the rights of both parties may be fully protected. No conflicting title to the coal that still remains in place or right of inheritance will be tried, inasmuch as the coal mined, etc., has been converted into money."

If the person in possession of a mine asserts sole ownership thereof, one claiming to be a tenant in common must establish his right at law before he may have an accounting of profits. North Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Snowden, 42 Pa. St. 488, 82 Am. Dec. 530; Frisbee's Appeal, 88 Pa. St. 144.

MEASURE OF RECOVERY.

Where a cotenant is excluded from the premises and his ore is extracted and disposed of, it constitutes a trespass and the tenant working the mine is liable for the gross value of the ore. See the reported case.

In Sweeney v. Hanley, 126 Fed. 97, 61 C. C. A. 153, it was said: "We are unable to perceive any force in the suggestion that, where the excluded tenant in common knows of the wilful trespass and does not apply for a preliminary injunction on commencing suit, he should be allowed only the net proceeds appertaining to his interests."

So in Foster v. Weaver, 118 Pa. St. 42, 12 Atl. 313, 4 Am. St. Rep. 573, it was said: "The relation of the parties to each other, as cotenants of the lease, and the fact that two of them after fraudulently dispossessing the other may have continued to use the property as it probably would have been used if they had all remained in possession, does not mitigate the tort, nor qualify the ordinary rule of damages. Cotenants are bound to respect the rights of each other quite as much as if they were strangers in title."

But in Dettering v. Nordstrom, 148 Fed. 81, 78 C. C. A. 157, it was held that the act of a cotenant in possession in denying his cotenant's title and breaking a verbal agreement to do no mining did not bring him within the rule just stated.

Where the acts of a tenant in common with respect to mining property do not make him a tortfeasor as to his cotenant, he is bound to account only for the cotenant's aliquot part of the net proceeds of the mining operation. The rule as to the amount recoverable has however been variously stated. In Edsall v. Merrill, 37 N. J. Eq. 114, it was said generally that a share of the "net profits" was recoverable. So in other cases it has been held that the tenant out of possession is entitled to his share of the value of the mineral extracted less the expense of mining and the cost of the improvements necessary thereto. Job v. Potton, L. R. 20 Eq. (Eng.) 84; McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co. 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686; Wolfe v. Childs, 42 Colo. 121, 94 Pac. 292, 126 Am. St. Rep. 152; Graham v. Pierce, 19 Grat. (Va.) 28, 100 Am. Dec. 658; Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 38 L.R.A. 694; McNeeley v. Smith Penn Oil Co. 58 W. Va. 438, 52 S. E. 480; Tipping v. Robbins, 71 Wis. 507, 37 N. W. 427.

In Newman v. Newman, 27 Grat. (Va.) 714, the court referred to the case of Graham v. Pierce, supra, and said: "That was the case of a lead mine, while this is the case of an iron mine; and there seems to be no difference in principle between them on the subject we are now considering. A tenant of such property necessarily uses a part of the subject itself, and may by such uses render the residue of the subject of little or no value. It may be discovered by explorations and operations that the property is of great value, or the contrary. To rent it for a certain sum, is to make a bargain of speculation and hazard, which is always objectionable in such cases, as it is almost sure to operate unequally on the parties. Whereas to carry on operations upon it for the joint and equal benefit of all the owners in proportion to their respective interests in the subject, and by the agency of persons (whether they have an interest therein or not) who may be amply compensated for their trouble, complete justice will be done to all parties concerned. It may be said that to carry on the business required a capital, which one of the parties did not have. But that matter may be adjusted by allowing interest to the party who advances the capital."

In Mallett v. Uncle Sam Gold, etc. Min. Co. 1 Nev. 188, 90 Am. Dec. 484, it was said: "If one partner or tenant in common, after having become associated with his cotenants in the development of the claim, voluntarily leaves it in the possession of his companions, and refuses to bear his proportion of the expenses incurred by them in development of the same, and should afterwards bring his action to recover his interest, undoubtedly, upon a proper application, the equity side of the court would defer his recovery until he has paid his full proportion of the expense incurred in the development and improvement of the claim; and on the other hand, if he had been wrongfully ousted from his possession or rights, the persons so ousting him, or those claiming under them, can acquire no title in the claim adverse to him short of the statute of limitations, and of course could not ask the interposition of equity."

In other cases the value of his share of the mineral in place has been allowed to the tenant out of possession in case of a rightful operation of the mine by his cotenant. Clowser v. Joplin Min. Co. 4 Dill. 469, note, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,908a; Johnson v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 90 Kan. 565, Ann. Cas. 1915B 549, 135 Pac. 589; McGowan v. Bailey, 179 Pa. St. 470, 36 Atl. 325. The value of the mineral in place is arrived at by deducting from its value at the pit mouth the cost of severance and hoisting. Keys v. Pittsburg, etc. Coal Co. 58 Ohio St. 246, 50 N. E. 911, 65 Am. St. Rep. 754, 41 L.R.A. 681.

So in Coleman's Appeal, 62 Pa. St. 252, it was said: "Here a tenant in common exercises his undoubted right to take the common property, and he has no other means of obtaining his own just share than by taking at the same time the shares of his companions. The value of the ore in place is, therefore, the only just basis of account. This is the same as the value of what is called ore-leave—that is, what the right to dig and take the ore is worth. Indeed all parties, as well as the master and court below, seem eventually to have settled upon this basis. But how is the value of ore-leave to be ascertained? It is evident, in the nature of things, that it can have no general market price. It will depend necessarily upon the position and circumstances of each particular mine, as well as on the character of the ore. The value of it at the pit's mouth depends upon its quality and its proximity to the furnace where it is to be used, and on the means of transportation. In addition to this the price of the ore-leave will be influenced by the expense and risk of the process of mining, or of taking it from its place to the pit's mouth. It is evident that the price given for ore-leave in other mines or beds can afford no safe criterion, unless they should be precisely similar in all these respects to the one in question. As to the Cornwall ore-banks no sales had ever been made of ore-leave. No evidence was laid before the master as to what, in the opinion of experts, ore-leave in these banks would have commanded in the market. The master arrived at it by ascertaining the market value of the ore at the pit's mouth, and then deducting from that the cost of mining. We cannot see that under all the circumstances any more just and equitable mode could have been adopted. We do not mean to say that it would hold in any other case than the one now before the court—certainly not where the mining is expensive and hazardous. While the tenant in common of a coal mine, for example, must with great outlay of capital construct expensive machinery, and incur all the risks of such an undertaking, the value of ore-leave or coal in place could not be ascertained by so simple a calculation. The usual profits on capital embarked in such a hazardous enterprise with the proper allowance for personal skill and superintendence would seem to be no more than fair and reasonable deductions. Certainly any business man, sitting down to calculate what he ought to give for ore-leave, would take all these elements into consideration. Otherwise, with his own capital and at his own risk, he would separate the ore from its natural position, and place it on the surface enhanced in value, for the benefit of a stranger. We leave the rule in such a case to be determined when it arises. But the case of the Cornwall ore-banks is very different and very peculiar. Very little outlay of capital was required—the wages of day laborers and the pick-axe and shovel, with occasional charges of powder for blasting, made up all that was to be provided. The returns were immediate: the ore was removed to be used or sold as soon as it loosened. No personal skill or superintendence by the tenants in common was shown, and whatever was necessary was hired and allowed in the cost of mining. Besides upon the determination of the master and the court below on the subject of interest, and which for this and other reasons we think was right, the proceeds of value of the ore in the hands of the defendants, who took more than their proportion, remained in their possession to be employed by them as capital without charge." Compare Barton Coal Co. v. Cox, 39 Md. 1, 17 Am. Rep. 525, wherein the value of the mineral as severed was apparently allowed without deduction.

In several Pennsylvania cases it has been held that under some circumstances the royalty currently paid for the privilege of working similar mines in that vicinity affords the measure of the allowance to which the tenant in common out of possession is entitled. Thus in Fulmer's Appeal, 128 Pa. St. 24, 18 Atl. 493, 15 Am. St. Rep. 662, the court, distinguishing the decision in Coleman's Appeal, supra, said: "The whole tendency of the opinion was to show that there was no substantial difference between the value of the ore in place and its value at the pit's mouth, except the mere cost of digging and of removing it from the one place to the other. This, added to the fact that there never had been any sales of ore-leave at the Cornwall banks, and no proof of the opinions of experts as to what such ore-leave was worth, impelled the adoption of the principle upon which the value of the ore-leave was determined. There was in fact no other method which could have been adopted in that case under the evidence on the record. In the present case, it is only necessary to note the fact that abundant evidence was given as to the value of the royalty or slate-leave in this particular quarry, by very experienced persons who knew it well and had long been engaged in the same business; and the further fact that the value of the slate on the bank included, in addition to the cost of severance and removal, the cost also of splitting, dressing and piling the roofing slate, and splitting the school slate and mantel and blackboard stock. In addition to this, personal skill and superintendence were required. As to the roofing slate the whole profit of manufacture thus enters into its cost on the bank, and a portion of that profit enters into the cost of the school slate and other stock. It follows, that if the method adopted by the master is pursued, the plaintiff would recover, in addition to the real value of the slate in place, a share of the profits of carrying on the business without being subject to the risks or possible losses which might accrue, and this we think would not be just and equitable." See to the same effect Schreiber v. National Transit Co. 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 657; McIntosh v. Ropp, 233 Pa. St. 497, 82 Atl. 949.

A tenant in common out of possession seeking an accounting for his share of mineral removed by a person prospecting under a contract with the cotenant is not bound by the royalty contract made with the prospector or limited to a recovery of his share thereof. He is entitled to recover to the same extent as if the mining had been done by the cotenant in person. Dettering v. Nordstrom, 148 Fed. 81, 78 C. C. A. 157; Chase v. Savage Silver Min. Co. 2 Nev. 9; Mercur v. State Line, etc. R. Co. 171 Pa. St. 12, 32 Atl. 1126; Tipping v. Robbins, 71 Wis. 507, 37 N. W. 427.

In the application of the rule heretofore discussed allowing to a cotenant out of possession the net value of his share of the ore, the burden is on the tenant in possession to show the amount of the expense of mining. Dettering v. Nordstrom, 148 Fed. 81, 78 C. C. A. 157; Johnson v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 90 Kan. 565, Ann. Cas. 1915B 549, 135 Pac. 589.

The tenant out of possession is chargeable with those expenses only by way of set-off against his share of the ore produced. He cannot be held to a personal liability. Fro-wenfeld v. Hastings, 134 Cal. 128, 66 Pac. 178; Neuman v. Dreifurst, 9 Colo. 228, 11 Pac. 98; Stickley v. Mulrooney, 36 Colo. 242, 87 Pac. 547, 118 Am. St. Rep. 107; Wolfe v. Childs, 42 Colo. 121, 94 Pac. 292, 126 Am. St. Rep. 152. And see Rico Reduction, etc. Co. v. Musgrave, 14 Colo. 79, 23 Pac. 458.

WEAR ET AL.

v.

STATE OF KANSAS EX REL BREWSTER.

United States Supreme Court—November 26, 1917.

245 U. S. 154; 38 S. Ct. 55.

Waters and Watercourses — Riparian Rights — Ownership of Bed of Stream.

A territorial statute enacted in 1859 (Laws 1859, c. 121), adopting the common law of England, did not give a subsequent patent from the United States covering riparian lands the effect of a grant to the thread of the stream, and created no constitutional obstacle to a subsequent decision of the state court that the fact of navigability, rather than the ebb and flow of the tide, excluded riparian ownership of river beds.

Judicial Notice — Navigability of Stream.

Whether a state supreme court in a mandamus proceeding should take judicial notice that the principal river of the state is navigable at the capital of the state is a question of state law, and the Federal Supreme Court cannot pronounce its action in taking judicial notice thereof erroneous; there being no constitutional right to a trial by jury.

[See 12 Ann. Cas. 928.]

Waters and Watercourses — Right to Take Sand from Bed of Stream.

That sand in the bed of a navigable stream is migratory, or liable to be shifted, does not change its character while at rest upon the river bed, as respects the right of the state to require payment from persons taking sand from the bed of the stream.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That there is a public right to take sand from a navigable stream does not hinder the state from collecting for the good of the whole public a charge from those individuals taking sand and thereby withdrawing it from public access.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Supreme Court of Kansas.

Action for mandamus. S. M. Brewster, Attorney General, relator, and State Treasurer, defendant. Norman S. Wear, impleaded as Wear Sand Company, and F. D. Fowler made parties. Judgment for relator. Wear and Fowler bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Francis O. Downey for plaintiffs in error.
J. L. Hunt for defendant in error.

[155] HOLMES, J.—This is a petition for mandamus to require the Treasurer of the State to transfer certain funds from a special account to the general revenue funds of the State, so that they can be used for paying the expenses of government. The money in question was collected under the State Laws of 1913, c. 259, requiring payment of ten per cent of the market value on the river bank of sand taken by private persons or corporations from the bed of streams subject to the control of the State. It was paid by the plaintiffs in error for sand taken from the Kansas River at Topeka, and it was kept as a separate fund because the plaintiffs in error paid it under duress and protest and claimed the right to recover it before it should lose its identity by the transfer demanded. Under the state procedure the plaintiffs in error were made parties and came in and set up title to the fund. The Supreme Court of the State overruled [156] the claim and directed the issue of the peremptory writ.

This case was decided on a motion to quash the answers; the allegations of which, so far as now material, may be summed up as follows. In 1859 the Territorial Legislature of Kansas enacted that the Territory should be governed by the common law of England, which still remains the law of the State. On October 1, 1860, the United States conveyed land adjoining the Kansas River to the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs in error, and, as the tides do not ebb and flow in the river, they allege that the conveyance carried title to the middle of the stream; that they were the owners of the sand dredged from the same; that to enforce the provisions of the Act of 1913 against them would infringe the Fourteenth Amendment, and that they paid the sums exacted under protest and duress, the circumstances of which are detailed. The river was meandered on both sides by the surveys of the United States up to above this land, and with the Missouri and Mississippi constitutes an open and unobstructed water way from the up stream end of the meander lines to the Gulf of Mexico and the high seas. But the plaintiff in error Fowler, while adopting this allegation, alleges that it is not and never has been a navigable stream, and in 1864 the Kansas Legislature made a declaration to that effect. There follow allegations that the sand is migratory, and, in short, of the nature of animals ferae naturae, and that ever since the admission of the State the persons within it have taken the sand as of common right. The presence of the sand is alleged to interfere with the use of the stream for its proper purpose of navigation as a valuable commercial highway, the river being alleged to be a public highway the use of which, including the right to take sand, belongs to the people in the State. It also is suggested that if the court should entertain jurisdiction and determine the questions of fact arising in the proceeding the [157] plaintiffs in error would be deprived of the equal protection of the laws contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

The argument of the plaintiffs in error does not need a lengthy response or a statement of all the answers that might be made to it. It was said that the territorial statute gave to the patent of the United States the effect of a grant ad filum aquae. But this attributes to detailed and precise an effect to a general provision of law. We should be slow to believe that a State beginning its organized life with an express adoption of the common law of England stood any differently from one where the common law was assumed to prevail because the citizens were of English descent. Therefore when the Supreme Court of Kansas regards the principle of the common law to be that the fact of navigability, not the specific test of navigability convenient for England, is what excludes riparian ownership of river beds, it is impossible for us to say that the territorial statute even purports to give greater rights. The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. 443, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 1058, had been decided before the Territorial Act of 1859 was passed, and as was observed by Mr. Justice Bradley in Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 224, after that decision there seemed to be no sound reason for adhering to the old rule as the proprietorship of the beds and shores of waters held navigable by that case. See further Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 58, 14 S. Ct. 548, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 331, 352; Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 93, 94, 27 S. Ct. 655, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 956, 973; Donnelly v. U. S. 228 U. S. 243, 261, Ann. Cas. 1913E 710, 33 S. Ct. 449, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 820, 828. We think it too plain for extended argument that the Territorial Act created no constitutional obstacle to the present decision of the Kansas court.

Then it was said, if navigability in fact is the test, the plaintiffs in error were entitled to go to a jury on that fact, as it was in 1860, the date of the original grant, and the Supreme Court of the State was not entitled to take judicial notice that the river was navigable at Topeka. [158] But there is no constitutional right to trial by jury in such a case, and if a state court takes upon itself to know without evidence whether the principal river of the State is navigable at the capital of the State we certainly cannot pronounce it error. In this aspect it is a question of state law. Donnelly v. U. S. 228 U. S. 243, 262, Ann. Cas. 1913E 710, 33 S. Ct. 449, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 820, 828. See Areher v. Greenville Sand, etc. Co. 233 U. S. 60, 68, 69, 34 S. Ct. 567, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 850, 853. The fact is of a kind that should be established once for all, not perpetually retried. The court had too, in favor of its decision, the circumstance that the stream was meandered in the original surveys; the decisions of its predecessors; Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 682, 40 Am. Rep. 330; Topeka Water Supply Co. v. Potwin, 43 Kan. 404, 413, 23 Pac. 578; Johnston v. Bowersock, 62 Kan. 148, 61 Pac. 740; *Kaw Val. Drainage Dist. v. Missouri Pac. R. S. 75, 34 S. Ct. 564, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 857; legislation of the State; Private Laws of 1858, c. 30, § 4, c. 34; 1860, c. 20, § 3, etc.; and of the United States; Private Laws of 1858, c. 30, § 4, c. 31, § 4, c. 34; 1860, c. 20, § 3, etc.; and of the United States; Act of May 17, 1886, c. 348, 24 Stat. 57; Act of January 22, 1894, c. 15, 28 Stat. 27; Act of July 1, 1898, c. 546, 30 Stat. 597, 633, etc.; and the assent, so far as it goes, of this court; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Kaw Val. Drainage Dist. 233 U. S. 75, 77, 34 S. Ct. 564, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 857, 858, not to speak of the allegations in the answers of the Wear Sand Company, adopted, notwithstanding his denial of navigability, by Fowler, the other plaintiff in error before this court.

The allegation that the sand is migratory and belongs to whoever may reduce it to possession, and the allegation of the public right, are inconsistent, of course, with the claim of title and hardly consistent with the allegation that it is got by dredging. But the fact that it is liable to be shifted does not change its character while at rest upon the river bed, and if there were the public right alleged, it would not hinder the State from collecting, for the good of the whole public, a charge from those individuals who withdraw it [159] from public access. We see nothing in the case of the plaintiffs in error that requires further answers that might be made, or discussion at greater length.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case upholds the validity of a state statute imposing a royalty on the taking of sand from the bed of a navigable stream within the state. In so holding the court affirms the decision in State v. Akers, which is reported, with a note on the right to take sand, gravel or the like from the bed of a navigable stream, in Ann. Cas. 1916B at page 543.

NEW YORK, WESTCHESTER AND

New York Court of Appeals—May 2, 1916.

218 N. Y. 140; 112 N. E. 913.

Vendor and Purchaser — Building Restrictions — Validity.

Restrictive building covenants are not invalid as against public policy.

[See 21 Am. St. Rep. 485; 95 Am. St. Rep. 219.]

Effect of Restriction — Subsequent Purchaser.

Restrictive building covenants are valid and enforceable in law and in equity, and all the lots covered thereby are subject to an incumbrance, requiring occupation in accordance therewith, binding upon every subsequent purchaser having notice of the plan, even though his legal title is unrestricted.

Effect on Public Service Corporation.

Under Const. art. 1, § 6, declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, rights based on restrictive building covenants are property rights which cannot be taken for a public use without just compensation, and which make direct and compensational damages which otherwise would be consequential and non-compensational.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The owner of a tract of land laid it out on a map in lots fronting on streets, and, as an inducement to purchasers, sold them by deeds, covenanting that no building or structure for any business purpose whatsoever should be erected on the premises. Defendant railroad purchased lots running across the entire southern part of the tract subject to such restrictions opposite the lots of one of the plaintiffs and adjacent to the premises of the other, and built its railway across such lands partly on an embankment and partly in an open cut, and operated on its tracks many fast electric trains daily. It is held, in an action to restrain the maintenance of such structure and the operation of the road, that defendant had violated the covenant, and that plaintiffs were entitled to damages, a "building or structure" being in the widest sense anything constructed that is erected by art and fixed upon or in the soil composed of different pieces connected together and designed for permanent use in the position in which it is so fixed, and to "erect," meaning not only to raise, but also to build or construct.

[See note at end of this case.]

In such case, the plaintiffs' right is measured by the depreciation in the value of their land, including such depreciation as will be sustained by reason of the use to which the defendant puts its property; the difference in value between their land with and without the railroad.

Flynn v. New York, etc. R. Co. 160 N. Y. App. Div. 907; affirmed.

Brady v. New York, etc. R. Co. 160 N. Y. App. Div. 906, affirmed.

Appeals from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Second Judicial Department.

Actions by Michael W. Flynn, plaintiff, against New York, Westchester and Boston Railway Company et al., defendants, and by Edwin B. Brady, plaintiff, against New York, Westchester and Boston Railway Company et al., defendants. Judgments for plaintiffs. Defendant named appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Louis Marshall and George S. Graham for appellant.

Edwin L. Kalish and Charles A. Kalish for respondents.

[143] POUND, J.—In 1906 one Prince owned a tract of land in the city of New Rochelle, Westchester county, which he laid out on a map in one hundred and fourteen lots fronting on streets. As an inducement to prospective purchasers and in pursuance of a plan to restrict the lots against nuisances and trades and make it exclusively a residence district, all of the lots thus laid out were sold and conveyed by deeds containing the following covenants: "And the said party of the second part does covenant and agree that the grant and conveyance as aforesaid shall be subject to the following covenants, conditions and restrictions, which shall be binding upon them, their heirs, executors, legal representatives and grantees of the respective parties.

[144] "That the said party of the second part shall not build or permit to be built on said premises any house or dwelling of a value less than $4,500 or being less than two and one-half stories in height, or of the style known as 'flat roof.'

"No part of said premises shall be used for any Hospital, Insane, Inebriate or other Asylum, public or private, or cemetery or place of burial.

"No building or structure for any business purpose whatsoever shall be erected on said premises.

"No part of any structure erected shall be within fifteen feet of any street or street line upon which the lot or lots abut, except the steps, which may project a reasonable distance beyond the structure.

"No dwelling shall be erected on any plot less than two lots.

"No part of any barn, stable or other structure or structures of any kind or description erected upon said premises shall be within sixty feet of the line of the street or avenue on which the lots front, or within twenty-five feet of any side street; nor shall there be erected on any part of said lot any slaughterhouse, smith shop, forge, furnace, steam engine, brass foundry, nail, iron or other foundry, or any manufactory of gunpowder, glue, varnish, vitriol, ink, turpentine, or for the tanning, dressing or preparing skins, hides or leather, or any manufactory whatever; or any ale house, brewery, distillery, saloon, liquor store, hotel, or inn, or livery stable, or any other obnoxious, dangerous or offensive business or trade or any building of the character or description known as a tenement house. There shall be no toilet outhouse of any kind or description upon the premises. No closed fence shall be erected on said premises, excepting on the rear line thereof, and that no fence shall be erected on said premises more than four feet high, excepting on the rear line thereof.

"No poultry shall be kept upon any part of the premises [145] unless such poultry is retained or inclosed in proper runs or inclosures.

"It being understood and agreed that said covenants and conditions shall run with the land, and shall be enforceable both as covenants and conditions, with the right of re-entry in case of breach thereof."

Appellant purchased from Prince's grantees lots numbered from 1 to 38 inclusive, running across the entire southern part of the tract, subject to the above restrictions. Respondent Flynn purchased lots 107 and 108, on which he has erected a house directly across the street from appellant, and the respondent Brady purchased lots 39-42 inclusive, immediately adjacent to appellant's premises. The railway of appellant was built across the restricted lands owned by it, partly on an embankment 25 feet above the surface, which is next to the Brady lots, and partly in an open cut, 17 feet in depth, which is in front of the Flynn property. The railroad is equipped as high speed electric, operating many trains daily, and its maintenance and operation render respondents' property less valuable than it would be if appellant's property were used exclusively for private dwelling purposes.

These actions were instituted to restrain the appellant from constructing and operating its road across said lots, but at the time of the trial the railroad was in operation. The judgments appealed from restrain the maintenance by the appellant of its erections and structures upon the restricted land owned by it and the operation of its road, unless appellant pays Flynn $3,370 and Brady $2,000 respectively, as damages by reason of its violation of the restrictive covenants.

Appellant contends (1) that the restrictive covenants upon which respondents rely are, so far as they prohibit the construction and operation of a railroad, against public policy and void, and (2) that they do not by the language used prohibit the construction or operation of a railroad.

[146] The constitutional provision "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation" (Const. N. Y. art. 1, § 6), brings us at once to the inquiry as to whether the rights of respondents based on such restrictive covenants are property rights, for no public policy can exist which is contrary to the fundamental law. Restrictive building covenants have been consistently recognized as valid and enforceable in law and in equity, and it has been held that all the lots covered thereby are subject to an incumbrance requiring occupation in accordance with the plan, which is binding upon each subsequent purchaser having notice of the plan, even though his legal title is unrestricted. Tallmadge v. East River Bank, 26 N. Y. 105; Korn v. Campbell, 192 N. Y. 490-495, 85 N. E. 687, 127 Am. St. Rep. 925, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1. The public service corporation, exercising the right of eminent domain, has the advantage over the private person or corporation in that it cannot be kept off the premises entirely, but may enter the restricted district and destroy its exclusive character upon making just compensation for property rights thus taken. It is said in Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 446, 26 Am. Rep. 615, that building restrictions "have never been regarded as impolitic." It follows that they cannot be taken and destroyed without just compensation. The distinction suggested in U. S. v. Certain Lands, 112 Fed. 622; affd. sub nom. Wharton v. U. S. 153 Fed. 876, 83 C. C. A. 58, between acts done by private individuals for their own benefit and working injurious consequences, and acts, perhaps equally injurious, done for a public purpose in the execution of a public duty, amounts only to this;—for the private use, rights thus created cannot be lawfully taken; for the public use, they may be taken, but only for just compensation. Wallace v. Clifton Land Co. 92 Ohio St. 349, 110 N. E. 940. These restrictive covenants create a property right and make direct and compensational the damages which otherwise would be consequential and noncompensational. Radcliff [147] v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 195, 53 Am. Rep. 357;

Uline v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 4 N. E. 536, 54 Am. Rep. 661. No matter how unpleasant a neighbor the railroad may prove, if it takes no property by physical appropriation it is not chargeable with damages for impaired values due only to proximity. But something in the nature of an easement of privacy over another's land may be acquired by covenant in order that one may live apart from the disagreeable sights and sounds of business if one desires, and if that right has a value and the railroad subtracts a portion thereof by building on the restricted land, it is difficult to conceive why compensation should not follow. Story v. New York El. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146.

The appellant has violated the restrictive agreement by "erecting a building or other structure for business purposes." A building or a structure is, in the widest sense, anything constructed, i. e., erected by art and fixed upon or in the soil, composed of different pieces connected together and designed for permanent use in the position in which it is so fixed. To erect means not only to raise but also to build or construct. Century Dictionary. "A thing constructed" may thus be the equivalent in meaning of "a building erected." We are not now dealing with a penal statute where formal niceties of meaning are invoked in behalf of personal liberty. People v. Richards, 108 N. Y. 137, 15 N. E. 371, 2 Am. St. Rep. 373. To say that the construction of the railroad, whether above, on or below the surface of the ground, is not within the inhibition of the restrictive covenants is to say that it is enough to keep the word of promise to the ear and that the surrounding circumstances must not be allowed to aid in ascertaining the fair expressed intent of parties to a contract.

The right of the property owner is measured by the depreciation in value which his land sustains, including such depreciation as will be sustained by reason of the use to which the railroad puts its property, the difference in value between his land with and without the railroad [148] in operation. South Buffalo R. Co. v. Kirkover, 176 N. Y. 301, 68 N. E. 366. The railroad and its use in violation of the restrictive covenants may not be separated in considering the effect upon the owner. The rule for assessing damages applied herein seems to have been correct and the amount of the award presents no question of law.

The judgments should be affirmed, with costs.

NOTE.

Building Restriction or Restrictive Agreement as Binding Public or Public Service Corporation.

Generally.

It seems to be the rule that a building restriction or restrictive agreement is not so far binding on the public or on a public service corporation as to prevent the condemnation of the restricted land or to prevent its use for a purpose for which it might have been condemned. See Ward v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 92 Ohio St. 471, 112 N. E. 507. And see the cases cited throughout this note. But there is some conflict of authority as to the right of the persons interested in the enforcement of the covenant to compensation or damages for an interference with their right to the continuance of the restriction by the taking of the restricted lands. See the following subdivision of this note.

In Hayes v. Waverly, etc. R. Co. 51 N. J. Eq. 345, 27 Atl. 648, it appeared that certain lots were conveyed under a deed making the property subject to the restriction that the 'premises shall not be used for the purpose of a slaughterhouse or manufactory of fertilizers, glue, vitriol, or any other purpose that shall be a nuisance or detrimental to the surrounding property of the party of the first part, this restriction, however, is to be held not to apply to a railroad on the level of the adjoining streets.' Part of the lots by means of conveyances became the property of a railroad company which laid a track over it. Subsequently the track was taken up and the company proceeded to erect an embankment on which the railroad was to be laid. The original grantor of the property filed a bill praying for an injunction to restrain the operation of the railroad on the embankment, and for general relief. Discussing the right of the complainant to relief, the court said: "The question arises whether an elevated railroad is within the inhibition of the stipulation in question. Slaughterhouses and manufactories of fertilizers, glue and vitriol are expressly within it and so also are nuisances. A railroad is not within any of these descriptions. Existing under authority of law it is not a nuisance. The remaining forbidden use is 'a purpose detrimental to the surrounding property.' Is the erection and operation of the elevated railroad such a use? This question must be answered in view of the saving clause at the end of the stipulation, for the intention of the parties to the stipulation, manifested by the whole instrument, is the thing to be ascertained. That clause excludes a railroad on the level of the adjoining streets. The question, then, is reduced to this, whether an elevated railroad, as distinguished from a railroad upon the level of the street, is detrimental to surrounding property in that locality. The bill charges that it is because the locality is suitable only for residential purposes. It may be that the reason given, as applied to the particular locality in question, in view of its peculiar conditions and the proposed use of the elevated railroad, will not support the charge. The charge, however, upon this demurrer, which does not specially attack it, is sufficient. The demurrer admits the charge in its full force, and that admission must stand upon this argument, even though we may be able to conceive of circumstances which would destroy the reason upon which it is based. I think that the bill presents a meritorious case within the jurisdiction of this court. It is obvious that the court must act by injunction, and it may be well here to say, in view of the fact that injunction is asked to stay an important public work, that it is the general practice of a court of equity in such case either to withhold its final decree until opportunity may be given the parties to agree upon proper compensation for the complainants' right, or, that failing, until opportunity may be had to take the right by proceedings in condemnation (Story v. New York El. R. Co. [90 N. Y. 122] supra); or if for any reason that may not be done, to itself ascertain the value of the right to be protected, and decree that unless within a certain time that value be paid to the complainants, the inhibited use shall be restrained."

In Duncan v. Central Pass. R. Co. 85 Ky. 525, 4 S. W. 228, it appeared that the owner of land made a plot of it in which it was laid out in lots. He believed that the lots would sell best for residences and his plan was to confine them to that use. He conveyed several lots under a deed restricting their use for building other than dwelling houses. The lots were subsequently conveyed to a street railway company which later began the erection of a station thereon. In the meantime the owner had conveyed all the lots adjoining the first mentioned lots, to other persons, by deeds not containing any restrictions, but he still retained some lots which he had mortgaged. In a suit in equity by the trustee in the mortgage to enforce the covenant, it was held that no relief should be given as the owner had put it out of his power to carry out his plan of using the property for residential purposes only.

Right to Damages.

Several cases support the rule that building restrictions or restrictive agreements are not binding on the public or on a public service corporation possessing the right of eminent domain to the extent of denying that persons otherwise entitled to have them enforced may have compensation for the loss of the right. Wharton v. U. S. 153 Fed. 876, 83 C. C. A. 58, affirming U. S. v. Certain Lands, 112 Fed. 622; Wallace v. Clifton Land Co. 92 Ohio St. 349, 110 N. E. 940; Doan v. Cleveland Short Line R. Co. 92 Ohio St. 461, 112 N. E. 505; Ward v. Cleveland R. Co. 92 Ohio St. 471, 112 N. E. 507. See also Hayes v. Waverly, etc. R. Co. 51 N. J. Eq. 345, 27 Atl. 648.

In Doan v. Cleveland Short Line R. Co. supra, the court said: "The case at bar, . . . is one at law, in which plaintiff seeks to recover compensation by way of damages resulting from the taking of an alleged property right which she claims to have had in the lots of the defendant, a railroad company organized under the laws of the state and possessing the right of eminent domain. It is the owner of a number of lots in the allotment and at the time of the commencement of this action was building a railroad on and over its property. It was devoting these lots to a public use. If plaintiff is entitled to compensation by way of damages by reason of the use of this property by the railroad company, a right must grow out of the covenant in the deeds of the allotter and the general plan adopted which restrict the use of the property to residence purposes. If such restriction is not to be construed as preventing the use of the property for public purposes, then of course there is no violation on the part of the defendant, and it follows that no recovery can be had. If, on the other hand, it is to be construed as prohibiting the use of the property for any purpose other than that of residences, it would prevent a public use of the lots and thereby defeat the right of eminent domain. No covenant in a deed restricting the real estate conveyed to certain uses and preventing other uses can operate to prevent the state, or any body politic or corporate having the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, from devoting such property to a public use. The right of eminent domain rests upon public necessity, and a contract or covenant or plan of allotment which attempts to prevent the exercise of that right is clearly against public policy and is therefore illegal and void. Plaintiff's right to compensation, if it exists, must be based upon the restrictive covenant in the deeds and the general plan adopted. To give to plaintiff this right we would be compelled to recognize a right existing under what we hold to be an invalid restriction. . . . We are constrained to the conclusion that restrictive covenants in deeds or a general plan for the improvement of an allotment cannot be construed to prevent the use of the lots for public purposes, and as against the state or any of its agencies which are vested with the right to eminent domain are illegal and void, confer no property right and cannot be the basis of a claim for damages."

In Wharton v. U. S. 153 Fed. 876, 83 C. C. A. 58, affirming U. S. v. Certain Lands, 112 Fed. 622, it appeared that a portion of a tract of land was conveyed by a deed containing the following provision: "This deed is on condition that no slaughterhouse, smith shop, steam engine, furnace, forge, bone-boiling establishment, iron or brass foundry, no manufactory of chemicals of any description, of gas, soap, fish guano, fish oil, kerosene or other oil, no brewery, distillery, bar, ale house, drinking saloon, or other place for the manufacture, compounding or selling of any kind of intoxicating liquors in any manner or form, shall ever be erected, located, used, or suffered, in or upon any part of said granted land; and that no other noxious, dangerous or offensive trade or business whatever shall ever be done, carried on or permitted in or upon said land or any part thereof." Subsequently the land was subjected to a condemnation proceeding by the federal government for the purpose of "the location, construction and prosecution of works for fortification and coast defense." In the proceeding a claim was filed by owners of other parts of the same tract which were subject to the same provisions. The claimants asserted that the rights of restriction in the lands taken were appurtenant to their estate as "negative easements" for the destruction of which they were entitled to compensation. Denying relief, it was held that the right of the claimants was not an easement and that the conditions in the deeds were not to be construed as having reference to ordinary public works, or the incidents thereof.

The rule deducible from the reported case appears to be that a building restriction or restrictive agreement is not binding on a public service corporation possessing the right of eminent domain to the extent that it may be kept off the restricted premises entirely; but the corporation may enter the restricted district and destroy its exclusive character on making compensation for the rights taken. It is also held that the building of a railroad is a violation of a restrictive agreement against the erection of "a building or other structure for business purposes" and that compensation therefor would be awarded. Compare Antes v. Manhattan R. Co. 116 N. Y. S. 697, wherein a suit was brought for an injunction and to recover damages for breach of covenants. Holding that no ground for relief was shown, the court said: "It is contended by the plaintiff that, although the defendants operate their railway upon their own land, she is entitled to damages by reason of a covenant against offensive establishments. While it is true that plaintiff and defendants derived title to their respective lands from a common predecessor in title, and although the covenant is referred to in several conveyances, yet in a number of deeds prior to and since the road was constructed no reference is made to the covenant. It appears, however, in the deed from Bartels to the plaintiff, executed in 1905. At that time, not only had the road been in operation for about eighteen years, but the property in the immediate neighborhood had been changed to a factory section and ceased to be used for residential purposes. To attempt to enforce a covenant of this kind under these circumstances would be inequitable. As to the damages either to the fee or rental value of plaintiff's property by reason of the operation of the road, the plaintiff has failed to make out a case. Plaintiff's expert (Swartwout) testified that manufactories were coming in the neighborhood right along from 1875 to the present time, and that the Southern boulevard, both north and south sides, from Alexander avenue west, is a manufacturing center. It is apparent that whatever change took place in the neighborhood cannot be ascribed to the operation of the defendants' railroad."

In Matter of New York, etc. R. Co. 151 App. Div. 50, 135 N. Y. S. 234, it was held that a covenant restricting the use of land to residential purposes did not preclude the construction of a railroad pursuant to statutory authority.

O'REAR

v.

SARTAIN ET AL.

Alabama Supreme Court—June 30, 1915.

193 Ala. 275; 69 So. 554.

Municipal Corporations — Debt Limit — Effect of Exceeding Limit — Validity of Tax for Payment.

Const. 1901, § 224, provides that no county shall become indebted in an amount, including present indebtedness, greater than three and one-half per cent of the assessed value of the property therein. Section 215 provides that no county shall levy a greater rate of taxation in any one year than one-half of one per cent. It is held that section 215 confers no right to levy taxes to pay an indebtedness incurred in excess of the limitation fixed by section 224.

[See 44 Am. St. Rep. 242.]

Computation of Indebtedness — Interest on Obligations.

Under Const. 1901, § 224, providing that no county shall become indebted in an amount, including present indebtedness, greater than three and one-half per cent of the assessed value, the words "become indebted" contemplate that, in calculating the amount of indebtedness, the face value of the county's obligation and accrued interest thereon must be included, but not interest not yet due.
Ann. Cas. 1918B.—38.

[See note at end of this case.]

Unissued Bonds.

Under Const. 1901, § 224, limiting the amount to which a county may be indebted to three and one-half per cent of the assessed valuation of the property, road bonds not issued cannot be counted as a present indebtedness.

Time as of Which Indebtedness Is Computed.

In determining whether a county has exceeded its debt limit, the validity of a contemplated issue of bonds depends on the condition of the indebtedness at the time of issuance, and not upon its condition at the time of the election authorizing the same.

Injunctions — Apprehension of Injury.

An injunction should not be issued upon the mere apprehension of the complainant that some illegal act would be done.

Counties — Discretion of Officers — Control by Injunction.

Equity has no power to control the discretion of county commissioners in the conduct of the county's business.

Appeal from Law and Equity Court, Walker county: SOWELL, Judge.

Action by Martin O'Rear, plaintiff, against C. M. Sartain et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Ernest Lacy for appellant.

Davis & Fite and Gray & Wiggins for appellees.

[276] THOMAS, J.—Appellant filed this bill, praying that appellees, as members of the court commissioners of Walker county, be enjoined from letting contracts for the construction of four steel bridges. A temporary injunction was granted on the filing of the bill. Appellees filed their answer under oath, and moved the dissolution of the injunction. On the hearing, submission was had upon the bill as amended, and affidavits supporting the same, together with the answer of the appellees and the affidavit of the judge of probate in support of the answer. From the decree dissolving the injunction the appeal is taken.

The bill as amended alleges that the last assessed value of the taxable property of Walker county, Ala., "for the tax year 1914, does not exceed the sum of $12,500,000;" "that the total outstanding indebtedness of the county amounts to $290,250, not including interest warrants;" that said interest warrants were on the court house debt, and amounted, at the time of the filing of the bill, to $100,477.50; that interest warrants outstanding on the bridge debt of the county amounted to the sum of $22,322.96. The interest [277] warrants are payable annually, and, as shown by the exhibits to the affidavit of the county treasurer, have not matured. It is further alleged that there remain unsold $150,000 of the authorized county road bonds, and that if said bonds are sold this year, as is contemplated by the court of county commissioners, the indebtedness of the county will be increased to the sum of $413,560.80, not including the interest debt of the county on said bridge warrants and road bonds. It is further alleged that by the act approved August 2, 1907, three-fifths of all special taxes, except special school taxes, collected for Walker county, Ala., belong to the public road fund of said county, and no part of same is authorized to be spent, except in constructing and maintaining the public roads of the county, except that $2,000 of such taxes may be annually used for repairs to public bridges, and the remaining three-fifths of said special taxes so collected each year have been set aside as a fund with which to meet the payments of the courthouse warrants, and that practically all of this two-fifths of said special taxes is required to pay courthouse warrants as they respectively mature; that after the payment of maturing courthouse warrants, and of demands for building and maintaining the public roads of the county there is, and will be, nothing left of this special tax fund with which to pay debts incurred for the construction of bridges already built or to be built; "that there is no fund out of the money collected by the county out of which payments can be made for bridges, except the general fund of the county; and that it requires all of the money paid into said general fund to meet the expenses of the county, outside of payments of the courthouse debt and money appropriated to the said road fund of the county."

[278] The respondents aver "that the amount of the interest warrants referred to in the bill does not constitute an outstanding indebtedness against the county within the meaning of the constitutional limitation," and "that there remains unsold $150,000 of the county's road bonds;" but they deny that respondents "are making efforts at this time to sell such bonds, and allege that said amount is not an outstanding debt against Walker county." And respondents deny that the building of the proposed bridges entail an expense of $125,000 on the county, averring that, on the contrary, such bridges can be constructed at a cost of not exceeding $75,000. They further aver that the present indebtedness of the county is $262,805, and that, as under the Constitution and laws of Alabama the county is authorized to incur an indebtedness of approximately $437,500, the indebtedness to be incurred by the construction of the proposed bridges will not increase the total indebtedness of the county to the constitutional maximum, but that the present indebtedness and said proposed indebtedness for bridges will not aggregate in excess of $350,000—a sum of $187,500 less than said constitutional maximum. The respondents deny that "there will be nothing left of the special road and bridge and general funds of Walker county out of which to pay for the bridges mentioned in said bill, but allege that Walker county will be amply able to meet its present indebtedness and the additional indebtedness incurred by the building of said bridges."

A county's authority to "become indebted" is limited by section 224 of the Constitution. This provision, peculiar to the Constitution of 1901, is as follows: "No county shall become indebted in an amount including present indebtedness greater than three and [279] one-half per centum of the assessed value of the property therein: Provided, this limitation shall not affect any existing indebtedness in excess of such three and one-half per centum, which has already been created or authorized by existing law to be created: Provided, that any county which has already incurred a debt exceeding three and one-half per centum of the assessed value of the property therein, shall be authorized to incur an indebtedness of one and a half per centum of the assessed value of such property in addition to the debt already existing. Nothing herein contained shall prevent any county from issuing bonds, or other obligations, to fund or refund any indebtedness now existing or authorized by existing laws to be created."

To properly understand section 224, it must be construed in connection with 215, which provides that: "No county in this state shall be authorized to levy a greater rate of taxation in any one year on the value of the taxable property therein than one-half of one per centum: Provided, that to pay debts existing on the 6th day of December, 1875, an additional rate of one-fourth of one per centum may be levied and collected, which shall be appropriated exclusively to the payment of such debts and the interest thereon: Provided, further that to pay any debt or liability now existing against any county, incurred for the erection, construction, or maintenance of the necessary public buildings or bridges, or that may hereafter be created for the erection of necessary public buildings, bridges, or roads, (a) any county may levy and collect one-fourth of one per centum, as may have been or may hereafter be authorized by law, which taxes so levied and collected shall be applied exclusively to the purposes for which the same were so levied and collected."

[280] (1) On counties having "become indebted in an amount, including indebtedness, greater than three and one-half per centum of the assessed value of the property therein," section 215 can confer no right to levy taxes to pay an indebtedness incurred in excess of the limitation placed by section 224. To determine whether a county would "become indebted" in an amount exceeding the constitutional limitation, add the aggregate amount of the proposed contract to the county's present indebtedness, and if the sum of the contract for the proposed improvement and the total present indebtedness of the county is beyond the constitutional limitation, the annual tax is denied, to the extent of the excess. Hagan v. Limestone County, 160 Ala. 544, 562, 49 So. 417, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1027; Brown v. Gay-Padgett Hardware Co. 188 Ala. 423, 66 So. 161.

(2) The question to be determined is: The meaning of the words "become indebted," as used in section 224 of the Constitution. Is it principal and accrued interest, or is it principal and all interest; that is, interest accrued and to accrue between the date of incurring the debt and the date the principal is to mature? Constitutions are the result of popular will, and their words are understood ordinarily as used in the sense that such words convey to the popular mind. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 924, 925. The words "become indebted" were used in section 224 of the Constitution in the ordinary and popular sense, and a natural and common-sense construction must be given them.

The case of Gunter v. Hackworth, 182 Ala. 205, 62 So. 101, is cited as authority for the proposition that the word "debt" is to be so defined as to embrace [281] unmaturing interest. The use, in the opinion, of the words, "The prohibition against indebtedness is generally construed to apply to indebtedness in all forms, however incurred, or for whatever purpose," however, did not decide this question. The decision in the Gunter-Hackworth Case turned on the question whether certain warrants that were issued for the rebuilding of the court house exceeded the constitutional limitation. The precise question before us was presented in Hagan v. Limestone County, supra. The bill sets out an itemized statement of the proposed increased indebtedness against which injunction was sought as:

"Total principal, $59,000.00; interest, $15,989.00; grand total, $74,989.00."

Mr. Justice Denson, for the court said: "We are also of the opinion, and so hold, that the amount to be considered, in determining whether the debt exceeds the limitation, is the aggregate amount of the contract. Culbertson v. Fulton, 127 Ill. 30, 18 N. E. 781; Beard v. Hopkinsville, 95 Ky. 239, 24 S. W. 872, 23 L.R.A. 402, 44 Am. St. Rep. 222; Salem Water Co. v. Salem, 5 Ore. 30; Prince v. Quincy, 128 Ill. 443, 21 N. E. 768; Earles v. Wells, 94 Wis. 285, 68 N. W. 964, 59 Am. St. Rep. 886. Adding the $59,000, which the contract provides shall be paid for the courthouse to the present indebtedness, carries the total indebtedness of the county greatly beyond the constitutional limitations." Hagan v. Limestone County, 160 Ala. 544, 563, 49 So. 417, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1027.

On page 558 of 160 Ala. on page 421 of 49 So, in Hagan's Case, the distinction is made between the principal debt and the interest. Interest is defined as a premium for the use of money, usually reckoned as [282] a percentage, and necessarily invokes the idea of a continuing liability as its foundation. There can be debt without interest, but no interest without a debt. Interest is regarded as incidental to the debt. Principal is always debt; interest is an accessory to the principal. The principal is the fixed sum; the accessory is a constantly accruing one. The former is the basis or substance from which the latter arises, and on which it rests. Howe v. Brandley, 19 Me. 36; Doe v. Warren, 7 Greenl. (Me.) 48; Du Belloix v. Waterpark, 1 Dowl. & R. 16, 16 E. C. L. 12; Brewster v. Wakefield, 1 Minn. 352, 355, 69 Am. Dec. 343.

In Brown v. Gay-Padgett Hardware Co. supra, it was held that, though a county has reached its constitutional debt limit, it is nevertheless bound to pay its ordinary current obligations, and may, for this purpose, anticipate revenues actually assessed and payable for the year in which the obligations incurred. The court said of the words "indebted" and "indebtedness:" "It is clear that, if they are to be understood in their broadest signification, the effect of section 224 would be, only to inhibit further indebtedness when the prescribed limit is reached, but also to practically forestall all municipal action; for certainly neither a county nor a city government could proceed for a single day . . . without incurring, for some period of time, debts or liabilities. . . . The Constitution could not, in reason and common sense, have intended any such result."

This question in another form was practically passed upon by our court, Chief Justice Stone writing the opinion, in Gibbons v. Mobile, etc. R. Co. 36 Ala. 410. It was there contended by the appellant that in making the contract the city authorities [283] had transcended the power conferred upon them, in this: That whereas the statute only authorized them to aid in the construction of the railroad by the issue of city bonds, in the amount not exceeding $1,000,000, yet they had in fact issued bonds and coupons amounting to over $2,000,000. Judge Stone replied that: "This argument is more specious than solid. The bonds are for the precise sum of $1,000,000; nor more, no less. These bonds mature at various times from 1 to 25 years. The excess over $1,000,000 consists in obligations, in the shape of coupons, to pay the interest on the said $1,000,000, until such time or times as the principal of the bonds shall be paid. This, we think, is in strict conformity with the spirit of the statute, which evidently contemplated that the bonds should be interest-bearing, and therefore marketable. Anything less would not have furnished $1,000,000 of aid to the railroad." 36 Ala. 439.

Similar questions have arisen in other states, under Constitutions and legislative enactments, and the courts in construing such provisions, have announced conclusions similar to that we have reached. In Durant v. Iowa County, 1 Woolworth 69, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,189, Justice Miller said that the real debt incurred by the county is the principal sum named in the bonds. The coupons attached to the bonds are promises to pay the annual installments of interest. Their form, and the fact that they may be detached from the principal obligation, does not change their character. They do not form part of the debt, any more than would a provision for interest yet to accrue, incorporated in the body of the bond.

"If the defendant's counsel were correct in his position, the bonds when issued were legal, because it is [284] not pretended that the amount secured by them exceeded the 5 per centum of the value of the taxable property in the county; but by lapse of time, as the interest has become due and remained unpaid, they and their incidents, the coupons, have become illegal. The absurdity is manifest." 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,189.

In Finlayson v. Vaughan, 54 Minn. 331, 56 N. W. 49, it was held that in determining the amount of indebtedness that may be incurred within the 5 per cent of the assessment, the par value of the bonds to be issued is alone considered, and not the interest which may subsequently grow thereon by the terms thereof. Mr. Justice Pollock declared in Kelly v. Cole, 63 Kan. 385, 65 Pac. 672, that the unearned interest coupons attached to municipal bonds, are not "bonded indebtedness actually existing," within the legislative meaning, and intent as expressed in said act, and may not be included in the amount for which refunding bonds may be issued. In Ashland v. Culbertson, 103 Ky. 161, 44 S. W. 441, the court declared that, under the constitutional limitation of the indebtedness that cities and towns were authorized to contract: "The term 'indebtedness,' as used in the Constitution, was not interest . . . to include future interest. The lawmakers were not looking at the incident of the indebtedness, but to the indebtedness proper."

So the Supreme Court of Wisconsin and Illinois have held, in Herman v. Oconto, 110 Wis. 680, 86 N. W. 681; Crogster v. Bayfield Co. 99 Wis. 1, 74 N. W. 635, 77 N. W. 167; Rice v. Milwaukee, 100 Wis. 516, 76 N. W. 341; Stone v. Chicago, 207 Ill. 492, 510, 69 N. E. 970, and Blanchard v. Benton, 109 Ill. App. 578.

In Epping v. Columbus, 117 Ga. 263, 43 S. E. 803, this question was exhaustively reviewed and many authorities [285] collected. and it was there stated: "Taking the word (debt) in the popular sense, it means the amount of the present liability on a given date. The amount of one's indebtedness to-day is the principal sum which may be legally collected from him at a future time, plus any interest on the same which may have accrued up to to-day. Within the meaning of the Constitution, the debt of a city at the time of the adoption of that instrument was an amount represented by the principal and the past-due interest at that time." Carlson v. Helena, 39 Mont. 82, 102 Pac. 39, 17 Ann. Cas. 1233.

This is the construction placed on many constitutional and statutory limitations on the power of municipal corporations to contract debts considered in Mod. L. of Mun. Soc. (by Hainer) § 61; Simmonton's Mun. Bonds, § 37, p. 65; 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) 397. Mr. Dillon thus concisely states the rule: "Accrued interest must be included in computing the amount of the existing indebtedness, but not the unearned interest, although the obligation may not be payable for a long time."

The Supreme Court of the United States has several times discussed the rule, adopted by the state courts, that, in estimating the amount of indebtedness that may be lawfully incurred under constitutional and statutory limitations upon the power of the municipal corporation to contract debts, there is to be considered only the face value of the obligations and the accrued interest thereon, interest to become due in the future not to be reckoned an indebtedness. Lake County v. Graham, 130 U. S. 674, 9 S. Ct. 654, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 1065; Chaffee County v. Potter, 142 U. S. 355, 12 S. Ct. 216, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 1040; Sutliff v. Lake County, 147 U. S. 230, 13 S. [286] Ct. 318, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 145; Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 83, 93, 4 S. Ct. 315, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 360; German Ins. Co. v. Manning, 95 Fed. 597.

If there is an excess of authority, it affects the validity of the bonds or warrants so issued, pro tanto. Bonds are invalid only when issued after the limit is reached; that a portion will not legalize that which is in excess of it. McPherson v. Foster, 43 Ia. 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215; Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 332, 16 Pac. 7. 5 Am. St. Rep. 442. Nor is the portion within the limit invalidated by the fact that another portion of it is in excess of the limit and illegal. State v. Crete, 32 Neb. 568, 49 N. W. 272; Turner v. Woodson County, 27 Kan. 314; McPherson v. Foster, supra.

The reasonable construction of section 224, as to "interest" not accrued, is that all obligations of this character, no matter how evidenced, were by the framers of the Constitution intended to be disregarded in estimating indebtedness under limitations of the debt-contracting power. The limitation here dealt with is based on a per centum of the assessed value of the property in the county, and this value is subject to change from year to year. Butts County v. Jackson Banking Co. 129 Ga. 801, 60 S. E. 149, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 567, 121 Am. St. Rep. 244. It cannot be said that the framers of the Constitution intended the item of interest on long bond issues, or that of unaccrued interest on unmatured warrants issued in payment of authorized county improvements, should be counted a part of the present indebtedness of the county. In many instances this annual interest is distributed through many years, and, in the aggregate, would approach the amount of the cost of the principal improvements. For the same period, the [287] percentage of "the assessed value of the property" in the county is subject to change yielding additional credit or reducing the basis of credit; and the fact that the county has entered into a special contract to pay this interest, or evidenced the same by separate warrants maturing yearly, does not change the fact that these warrants are for interest on a county indebtedness.

If, however, interest on the county's obligations has matured and remains unpaid, this becomes a "present indebtedness," and must be estimated, in ascertaining the county's right to incur additional indebtedness under the limitation of section 224. Durant v. Iowa County, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,189; Kelly v. Cole, 63 Kan. 393, 65 Pac. 672, and authorities there collected; 1 Dillon Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) p. 396, § 205; Stone v. Chicago, 207 Ill. 492, 510, 69 N. E. 970; Epping v. Columbus, 117 Ga. 271, 43 S. E. 803. The unmatured interest warrants are not part of the "present indebtedness" of the county, and the proposed bridge contracts, aggregating \$75,000, would not cause the county of Walker to become indebted in an amount, including present indebtedness, greater than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per centum of the assessed value of the property therein.

(3) The commissioner's court not having issued the road bonds, the authorized issue of $150,000 of these bonds cannot be counted a present indebtedness of the county, within the meaning of section 224 of the Constitution.

(4) It is evident that the validity of the issue of county bonds must depend upon the condition of the county indebtedness at the time of the issuance, and not upon its condition at the time of the election authorizing the issue. Corning v. Meade County, 102 Fed. 57, 42 C. C. A. 154; Lake County v. Sutliff, 97 Fed. 270, [288] 281, 38 C. C. A. 167; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Newton, 42 Fed. 723, 728; Board of Education v. National L. Ins. Co. 94 Fed. 324, 328, 36 C. C. A. 278; Rathbone v. Kiowa County, 83 Fed. 125, 27 C. C. A. 477; Dudley v. Lake County, 80 Fed. 672, 26 C. C. A. 82; Goodson v. Dean, 173 Ala. 301, 55 So. 1010. In Redding v. Esplen, 207 Pa. 248, 56 Atl. 431, bonds having been authorized, but not issued, the borough thereafter entered into contract for the construction of a sewer, and when the issue of the bonds was sought the amount of the bond issue and of the sewer contract exceeded the constitutional limit. It was held that the validity of the bond issue was dependent on the county debt, not of the date of the election, but of the time of the issue.

(5) An injunction should not be issued upon the mere apprehension of the complainant that some illegal act will be done. Alston v. Dunn, 176 Ala. 421, 58 So. 300; Goodson v. Dean, supra; 1 High on Inj. (2d ed.) § 591, p. 391; 1 Joyce on Inj. § 17, p. 35; Troy v. Doniphan County, 32 Kan. 507, 510, 4 Pac. 1009.

(6) A court of equity, at the suit of a taxpayer, may restrain by injunction the misappropriation of county funds by county officials; but no power exists in a court of equity to compel county commissioners in the exercise of their discretion in the conduct of the county's business. When a court of equity undertakes to review the action of the boards of revenue or courts of county commissioners, a question of jurisdiction is presented: and unless the jurisdictional facts are alleged, and the charge thereon is made of fraud, corruption, or unfair dealing, jurisdiction of the subject-matter is not acquired. The bill in this cause falls short of such jurisdictional [289] averment. The Walker county law and equity court could not review the finding of the court of county commissioners, on the necessity for the bridges, or on the sufficiency of the plans and specifications therefor. Board of Revenue, Covington County v. Merrill, 193 Ala. 521, 68 So. 971; Long v. Shepherd, 159 Ala. 598, 48 So. 675; Matkin v. Marengo County, 137 Ala. 155, 34 So. 171; Hays v. Ahlrichs, 115 Ala. 239, 22 So. 465; Talley v. Jackson County, 175 Ala. 649, 39 So. 167.

The decree of the Walker law and equity court, sitting in equity, dissolving the injunction, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.Interest on Municipal Bonds as Factor in Determining Whether Municipality Has Exceeded Constitutional Debt Limit.

The ruling in Carlson v. Helena, 39 Mont. 82, 17 Ann. Cas. 1233, that in determining whether a municipality has exceeded its constitutional debt limit the unaccrued interest on its bonds is not to be computed, is supported by the reported case and two other recent cases. Goodwine v. Vermilion County, 271 Ill. 126, 110 N. E. 890; Brown v. Guthrie (Ind.) 114 N. E. 443.

In Goodwine v. Vermilion County, supra, the court said: "The assessed value of the real and personal property of the county was $36,402,538, five per cent of which is $1,820,000. It is stipulated that the aggregate amount of interest on the bonds during the period of twenty years to be paid by the county would amount to $570,000. While the principal of the bonds is less than the limit of indebtedness which the county may incur, if the interest is to be considered in determining the amount of such indebtedness that amount will exceed the constitutional limit by $250,000. The appellants insist that the liability of the county for the interest is the same as its liability for the principal of the debt; that the amount of the indebtedness to be incurred by the issue of the bonds will be the full amount of the principal and interest for the time the bonds have to run, and that the whole amount of such indebtedness will be incurred at the time the bonds are issued. The appellees contend that interest is a mere incident of the principal and cannot be regarded as a part of the indebtedness until it has accrued. We have held that accrued interest is a debt within the constitutional limitation (Stone v. Chicago, 207 Ill. 492) but the question in regard to accruing interest has never been decided by this court. The doctrine is stated in McQuillin on Municipal Corporations (vol. 5, sec. 2224) that 'interest is not a debt, within the meaning of debt-limit provisions, until it is earned and becomes due, and in determining whether an indebtedness will be created in excess of the debt limit, unearned interest cannot be added to the principal. The authority granted by the constitution or statute to contract a debt refers to the amount of the debt at the date at which it is created and has no reference to the amounts of interest which accrue thereafter. On the other hand, interest which has become due and payable is a part of the existing indebtedness in figuring the total amount of municipal indebtedness.' The cases of Ashland v. Culbertson, 103 Ky. 161; Finlayson v. Vaughn, 54 Minn. 331, and Herman v. Oconto, 110 Wis. 660, sustain this statement. In the last case it is said: 'Interest is not a debt, within the meaning of the constitution, until it is earned and becomes due.' This is in accordance with the ordinary view, which, in estimating the liabilities of individuals or corporations, does not take into consideration interest to accrue on unmatured obligations. Such interest is not to be regarded as a part of the indebtedness of municipal corporations within the constitutional prohibition."

So in Brown v. Guthrie (Ind.) 114 N. E. 443, it was said: "It is insisted by appellant that the court erred in its conclusions of law in holding that the interest coupons attached to the bonds in question should not be considered in determining the total indebtedness of the taxing district. It is generally held that interest is not to be taken into consideration in computing indebtedness as used, either in the constitution or the gravel road law."

But in Bateman v. Clarendon Dist. No. 1, 102 Ark. 306, 143 S. W. 1062, the court said: "The question presented is, whether interest to accrue on bonds issued to defray the expense of construction is within the meaning of the statute, to be included as a part of the cost of the improvement. This court has already decided the question in the affirmative. Fitzgerald v. Walker, 55 Ark. 148."

Interest already due on municipal bonds is to be computed in determining whether the amount of indebtedness incurred by a municipality exceeds its debt limit. Goodwine v. Vermilion County, 271 Ill. 126, 110 N. E. 890. And see the reported case.

FARMERS LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY

V.
PLANCK.

Nebraska Supreme Court—April 16, 1915.

Bills and Notes — Negotiability — Provision for Discount.

A promissory note is not rendered non-negotiable by the insertion of the following provision: "A discount of six per cent will be allowed, if paid in full within fifteen days from date."

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Madison county: WELCH, Judge.

Action by Farmers Loan and Trust Company, plaintiff, against Walter Planck, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

M. S. McDuffee for appellant.

William V. Allen and William L. Dowling for appellee.

[225] ROSE, J.—This is an action on a promissory note for $587, dated August 30, 1909. The principal is payable in six instalments maturing at different times within 13 months. The Equitable Manufacturing Company is named as payee and defendant is maker. By mesne assignments plaintiff, September 1, 1909, became the holder of the note as collateral security for a loan. The instrument, when executed, was attached to a contract for the purchase of jewelry and it was given for the price thereof. Under the terms of sale defendant was entitled to the possession of a piano to be given as a prize to the holder of the largest number of jewelry certificates issued by defendant to purchasers of goods from him. Plaintiff claims to be a holder of the note for value before maturity. In his answer defendant pleaded that the note was obtained by fraudulent representations; that he immediately rescinded the contract of purchase; and that he never received the jewelry or the piano. Upon a trial of the issues the district court directed a verdict in favor of defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

Defendant contends that, under the rule in Bothell v. Schweitzer, 84 Neb. 271, 120 N. W. 1129, 133 Am. St. Rep. 623, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263, the note in controversy is not negotiable, [226] and that even a bona fide holder cannot recover in an action thereon. When Planck signed the note it was attached to the order for goods to be shipped, but was separated therefrom by a perforated line, above which were these words: "The instalment note below to be detached by Equitable Mfg. Co." The contract of sale also contained the following: "If goods are shipped, detach and credit my account with attached instalment note which I hereby give in payment of this bill. If goods are not shipped, note is to be returned to me." In the Bothell case the note was glued to the contract of sale and was unlawfully detached. In the present case, when the goods were shipped, the note was detached according to agreement. The rule in the Bothell case is correct, but is inapplicable here.

The note executed by defendant contained the following provision: "A discount of 6 per cent will be allowed, if paid in full within fifteen days from date." Is the negotiability of the note thus destroyed? Under the statute an instrument, to be negotiable, "must contain an unconditional promise or order to pay a sum certain in money." Rev. St. 1913, sec. 5319. The act of the legislature defines what a "sum certain" is, but does not mention discount. Rev. St. 1913, sec. 5320. The authorities upon this point are in conflict. In the following cases it is held that such a note is non-negotiable: Fralick v. Norton, 2 Mich. 130, 55 Am. Dec. 56; Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525, 18 N. W. 248; Way v. Smith, 111 Mass. 523; National Bank of Commerce v. Feeney, 12 S. D. 156, 80 N. W. 186, 76 Am. St. Rep. 594, 46 L.R.A. 732; Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. v. McCoy, 32 Okla. 227, 122 Pac. 125, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177.

Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525, 18 N. W. 248; follows the holding in Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488, 8 N. W. 87. In Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank, 40 Neb. 484, 58 N. W. 1016, 42 Am. St. Rep. 683, 24 L.R.A. 444, this court said: "In Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488, it was held that the negotiability of a note payable on or before two years from date was destroyed by a memorandum attached, providing that if paid within one year there should be no interest, and that case is cited by Mr. Daniel in support of a similar statement, and is the only authority cited. We are not satisfied with that doctrine. In Hope v. Barker, 112 Mo. 338, the provision was 'without [227] interest thereon if paid at maturity; if not paid at maturity, to bear interest from date.' It was held that that provision did not destroy the negotiability of the note, the note on its face showing what should be paid at any particular time, and being therefore certain in its terms."

In Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. v. McCoy, 32 Okla. 277, 122 Pac. 125, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177, it is held that a provision in a note similar to the one now in controversy impairs its negotiability. This decision rests upon Randolph v. Hudson, 12 Okla. 516, 74 Pac. 946, and South Dakota cases therein cited.

In Randolph v. Hudson, 12 Okla. 516, 74 Pac. 946, it was held that a provision, "with interest at the rate of 12 per cent from date, if not paid at maturity," destroyed the negotiable character of the note. This is contrary to Hope v. Barker, 112 Mo. 338, 20 S. W. 567, 34 Am. St. Rep. 387, cited with approval in Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank, 40 Neb. 484, 58 N. W. 1016, 42 Am. St. Rep. 683, 24 L.R.A. 444.

Oklahoma also holds that a provision for an attorney's fee, if the debt is not paid at maturity, renders the note non-negotiable. This is contrary to the holding in Stark v. Olsen, 44 Neb. 646, 63 N. W. 37, and is inconsistent with the negotiable instruments law. The Oklahoma cases were decided under local statutes in force when the notes were executed, and in the McCoy case the court says that it does not decide what the result would be under the negotiable instruments law subsequently adopted by that state. The Oklahoma decisions were rendered under the following statutory provisions: "A negotiable instrument must be made payable in money, only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment," and "must not contain any other contract than such as is specified" in the statute. These provisions were adopted from South Dakota, and the Oklahoma cases follow the South Dakota construction.

In National Bank of Commerce v. Feeney, 46 L.R.A. 732, 737, 12 S. D. 156, 80 N. W. 186, 76 Am. St. Rep. 594, it is held that "a stipulation for a discount of 12 per cent, if a note is paid before maturity, renders it non-negotiable because of the uncertainty as to the amount to be paid," and the court quotes an earlier decision containing the following language: "While, in the opinion of the writer, a promissory note, [228] otherwise unobjectionable, meets the requirements, and stands the test of negotiability, when there is no date at which the exact amount then due cannot be ascertained by inspection and computation, this court has placed itself in line with a class of authorities which require such a degree of certainty that the exact amount to become due and payable at any future time is clearly ascertainable at the date of the note, uninfluenced by any conditions not certain of fulfillment; and the rule thus established must control cases subsequently arising, where the facts are substantially the same."

The doctrine thus stated is in conflict with some of the Nebraska decisions and with the negotiable instruments law. Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank, 40 Neb. 484, 58 N. W. 1016, 42 Am. St. Rep. 683, 24 L.R.A. 444; Stark v. Olsen, 44 Neb. 646, 63 N. W. 37; Fisher v. O'Hanlon, 93 Neb. 529, 141 N. W. 157; Rev. St. 1913, secs. 5320, 5322.

In Loring v. Anderson, 95 Minn. 101, 103 N. W. 722, it is held that a note providing for a discount of 6 per cent, if the debt is paid on or before maturity, does not make the instrument non-negotiable, as the amount of the deduction is readily ascertainable from the face of the paper. To the same effect is Harrison v. Hunter (Tex.) 168 S. W. 1036. This is in harmony with the statutory and the general rule that a note is negotiable, though payable on or before a certain date. Rev. St. 1913, sec. 5322. The amount of the discount and the amount due on the note in controversy, if paid within 15 days from date, are sums readily ascertainable.

With the question of negotiability determined in favor of plaintiff, the peremptory instruction for defendant is erroneous. Whether plaintiff is a "holder in due course," within the meaning of the statute, and whether there was fraud on the part of the original payee are issues not determined on this appeal. The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

Negotiability of Note Containing Provision Allowing Discount if Paid within Certain Time.

View that Note is Not Negotiable, 602.

Introductory.

It is of course thoroughly established that certainty with respect to amount is essential to the negotiability of a promissory note. See 3 R. C. L. tit. Bills and Notes p. 891. But in the application of that rule considerable diversity of opinion has arisen as to whether a provision for a discount in case of payment within a certain time destroys the certainty of amount which is requisite to negotiability. One line of decisions apparently looks at the matter of certainty of amount from the time of payment, and considers a note to be certain if it is plain from its face what amount must be paid thereon at any particular time. Other jurisdictions take the view that the certainty of amount is to be determined as of the date of the instrument so that a provision for a discount allowable on an uncertain event is deemed to destroy negotiability. The uniform Negotiable Instruments Law is not explicit on the question and conflicting decisions have been rendered under an enactment of that kind. See the reported case wherein it is said that to hold that a provision for a discount renders a note non-negotiable "is inconsistent with the Negotiable Instruments Law," and Iowa City First Nat. Bank v. Watson (Okla.) 155 Pac. 1152, wherein the contrary view was taken.

View that Note Is Negotiable.

Some jurisdictions are in accord with the reported case in holding that the negotiability of a note is not destroyed by a provision for a discount in case it is paid within a certain time. Smith v. Crane, 33 Minn. 144, 33 N. W. 633, 53 Am. Rep. 20; Loring v. Anderson, 95 Minn. 101, 103 N. W. 722; Hope v. Barker, 112 Mo. 338, 20 S. W. 567, 34 Am. St. Rep. 387; Mansfield Sav. Bank v. Miller, 1 Ohio Cir. Dec. 383, 2 Ohio Cir. Ct. 96; Harrison v. Hunter (Tex.) 168 S. W. 1036; Iowa City First Nat. Bank v. Rooney, 6 Saak. L. Rep. 72, 11 Dominion L. Rep. 358, 24 West L. Rep. 163. And see the reported case. See also Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank, 40 Neb.

484, 58 N. W. 1016, 42 Am. St. Rep. 683, 24 L.R.A. 444. Compare Syracuse Third Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 25 Minn. 530; Edwards v. Ramsey, 30 Minn. 91, 14 N. W. 272.

An instrument in the usual form of a negotiable promissory note providing for the payment of interest at ten per cent per annum from date until paid or at seven per cent if paid when due, has been held to be negotiable, the amount being certain and ascertainable. Smith v. Crane, 33 Minn. 144, 22 N. W. 633, 53 Am. Rep. 20, wherein the court said: "What the payee really wants is his money at the due date of the contract, and to secure this he holds an increase of the rate of interest over the debtor's head. In other words, the increase is a penalty for the debtor's delinquency. Treating the increase as a penalty, it follows, under the decisions of the court before cited, that the note in suit will in law draw the same rate of interest before as after maturity—that is to say, seven per cent—and that therefore (whatever might be the case if the interest clause were upheld according to its literal terms) the sum absolutely payable upon the instrument at any given time is thus made certain as the principal, and seven per cent interest." The court practically overruled Syracuse Third Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 25 Minn. 530, and Edwards v. Ramsey, 30 Minn. 91, 14 N. W. 272, although no reference was made to those cases in the opinion.

In Loring v. Anderson, 95 Minn. 101, 103 N. W. 722, the court held to be negotiable a written instrument in these words: "October 1st, 1903, after date I promise to pay to the order of the Maplebay Wind Stacker Company of Crookston, Minnesota, Two Hundred & Fifty and 00/100 Dollars. Value received, with interest before and after maturity at the rate of ten per cent per annum until paid. A discount of six per cent to be allowed if paid on or before October 1, 1903." The court said: "It is an essential condition of a promissory note that there be no uncertainty as to the amount of money it calls for at any particular time. Thus an instrument whereby the maker promises to pay to the payee or order or bearer a definite sum plus or minus a definite amount or discount is a promissory note, and hence it is negotiable; but, if the promise be to pay a stated sum of money plus or minus an indefinite amount or discount, it is not a negotiable instrument. . . . While there is a contingency before the maturity of the note as to whether the maker will pay it at maturity or before, there is no contingency or uncertainty as to the amount to be paid in full discharge of the note at maturity or at any time before, if the maker elects to pay before. The amount is $250, with interest, less a discount of six per cent—a matter capable of being made certain by computation. The result of such computation would give the exact amount due on the note at its maturity, and the exact amount which the maker was required to pay in full discharge of the note at any time before October 1, 1903, or at any time on that day, and the exact amount called for by the note at all times until it became dishonored by nonpayment."

It was held in Harrison v. Hunter (Tex.) 168 S. W. 1036, that a promissory note payable in instalments was not rendered non-negotiable by a provision for a discount of six per cent if the full amount should be paid at the maturity of the first instalment. The court said: "The only entertainable doubt as to the negotiability of this instrument, results from the following provision: 'A discount of six per cent will be given if the full amount of this instrument is paid at maturity of the first instalment,' which, however, is a definite amount payable at a definite time, reducing the note a certain amount if the option is exercised. A note payable 'on or before' a certain date is negotiable. The maker of such an instrument has the option to pay at any time before the stated maturity of the same, but the payee or holder of said note cannot, of course, demand payment before that day."

In Mansfield Sav. Bank v. Miller, 1 Ohio Cir. Dec. 383, 2 Ohio Cir. Ct. 96, it was held that a stipulation in a promissory note that "if this note is paid in full when due, a discount of thirty-nine and 78/100 dollars is to be made from the amount then due" did not render the note non-negotiable. The court said: "In legal effect then, this stipulation in each of these notes is equivalent to the expression: I authorize this note to be negotiated, and when negotiated it shall be payable without deduction or diminution. Taking the whole note together, this is its meaning. Now conceding that this is not strictly a negotiable promissory note, yet to hold that a person who purchases it for value without notice holds it subject to all offsets, defenses and deductions in favor of the maker, would be to hold that he could not by contract bind himself to the contrary. If A held a non-negotiable or past due note on B, and desired to sell it to C, and C should ask B whether it was all right and free from offsets, and B should say it was, on the faith of which C should purchase, I apprehend it would not be claimed after that, that B could set up any transaction between him and A as a defense. This is in substance what Miller says on the face of this paper to whomsoever it may be presented for discount. He invites negotiation by stipulating that the note shall be negotiable and payable in full and without deduction. He could have done so no more specifically if he had written a letter to the bank when the note was presented, stating he authorized the note to be negotiated, and it should be paid without deduction. While this note may not, therefore, be a 'carrier without luggage,' to use the language of some of the decided cases, a part of the luggage it carries is a written passport and continuing letter of credit recommending its negotiation and waiving all deduction in that event."

In Iowa City First Nat. Bank v. Rooney, 6 Sask. L. Rep. 72, 11 Dominion L. Rep. 358, 24 West L. Rep. 163, it was held that a provision in a note that a discount of five per cent would be allowed if the note was paid in full within fifteen days from date, did not render the instrument non-negotiable, the court saying: "Further, the note, as far as I can see, is a good and valid note; it is an absolute and unconditional promise to pay a sum certain in instalments on certain specified days. The provision for a reduction of the sum certain if paid within fifteen days does not render that sum uncertain. The sum less the discount is readily arrived at."

In Hope v. Barker, 112 Mo. 338, 20 S. W. 567, 34 Am. St. Rep. 387, it appeared that a note was to bear no interest if paid at maturity; but if not paid at maturity, it was to bear ten per cent interest from date. It was held that this provision did not destroy the negotiability of the note since it showed on its face what should be paid at any particular time and hence it was certain in its terms.

View that Note Is Not Negotiable.

Other jurisdictions, however, adhere to the rule that a note in order to be negotiable must be absolutely and unconditionally certain as to the amount to be paid and that a provision allowing a discount if the note is paid within a certain time renders it uncertain in that respect and hence non-negotiable. Way v. Smith, 111 Mass. 523; Fralick v. Norton, 2 Mich. 130, 55 Am. Dec. 56; Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488, 8 N. W. 87; Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525, 18 N. W. 248; Randolph v. Hudson, 12 Okla. 516, 74 Pac. 946; Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. v. McCoy, 32 Okla. 277, 122 Pac. 125, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177; Iowa City First Nat. Bank v. Watson (Okla.) 155 Pac. 1152; Hegeler v. Comstock, 1 S. D. 138, 45 N. W. 331, 8 L.R.A. 393; National Bank of Commerce v. Feeney, 12 S. D. 156, 80 N. W. 186, 76 Am. St. Rep. 594, 46 L.R.A. 732, reversing National Bank of Commerce v. Feeney, 9 S. D. 550, 70 N. W. 874, 46 L.R.A. 732; Farmers Loan, etc. Co. v. Devear, 2 Tenn. Civ. App. 366.

A note payable in instalments allowing a discount of six per cent if paid in full within fifteen days from date has been held to be non-negotiable for uncertainty as to the amount payable at the time of its execution, the court saying that in order for a note to be negotiable under the rules of the law merchant there is required such a degree of certainty that the exact amount to be due and payable at any future time can be clearly ascertained at the date thereof, uninfluenced by any conditions not sure of fulfilment. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. v. McCoy, 32 Okla. 277, 122 Pac. 125, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177. The negotiability of a note identical in terms came up for decision in Iowa City First Nat. Bank v. Watson (Okla.) 155 Pac. 1152. The court followed the rule and reasoning in Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. v. McCoy, supra, and held the note to be non-negotiable notwithstanding the following provision of the Negotiable Instruments Act: "The sum payable is a sum certain within the meaning of this chapter; although it is to be paid: First, with interest; or second, by stated instalments; or third, by stated instalments, with a provision that upon default in payment of any instalment or of interest, the whole shall become due; or fourth, with exchange, whether at a fixed rate or at the current rate; or fifth, with costs of collection or an attorney's fee, in case payment shall not be made at maturity." The court said: "The sum payable—that is, the amount for which, by the terms of the instrument, the maker became liable, and which he might tender and pay in full satisfaction of his obligation—was, at the date thereof, to a certain extent, dependent upon his will; he had the right to pay a greater or less sum than the principal; he could, if he saw fit, within the prescribed period, discharge his debt at ninety-four per cent, or thereafter pay one hundred per cent on the dollar. Under such condition, the sum payable was, at the time of the execution of the instrument, clearly indefinite and uncertain. Unless the rule of the law merchant which obtained in this jurisdiction with respect to the certainty required in the sum payable in a negotiable instrument has been changed by the statute, supra, such rule still governs, and the note in question is non-negotiable. In our opinion, it is obvious that the statutory provisions above quoted do not purport to prescribe a rule in this regard different from that recognized by the courts of this state before their enactment, in a case where a promissory note provided for the discount of a principal sum otherwise payable, if, at the option of the maker, payment is made before maturity."

In Fralick v. Norton, 2 Mich. 130, 55 Am. Dec. 56, it appeared that a note for sixty dollars payable in two years contained a provision that if fifty dollars was paid ten days before maturity the payee would cancel the instrument. It was held that this provision destroyed the negotiability of the note since the makers by the terms of the instrument were bound to pay one sum or the other, but not to pay either sum at all events. The court gave the reason for its holding as follows: "The sum claimed upon the instrument set forth in the case made, is the sixty dollars and interest mentioned therein; for it is not claimed that the defendants were absolutely and at all events bound to pay the fifty dollars. The question then is, whether they by this note engaged absolutely and without any condition to pay the sixty dollars and interest. The whole of the instrument must be taken and construed together, in order to determine this question. The first clause, taken by itself, clearly imports such an agreement; but, by the last clause, it is made subject to the condition that if a smaller sum should be paid at an earlier day, such payment should cancel the note. Now if the condition had been, that the note should become void provided the makers should convey a certain estate or perform certain labor, or deliver certain goods within a limited time, no one would pretend that the instrument was a promissory note. Such an instrument would simply import an engagement to do one of two things at the option of the maker, and not absolutely and at all events to do either. And could such an instrument be distinguished from the one under consideration?"

In Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488, 8 N. W. 87, it appeared that a note was payable on or before two years after date with interest at ten per cent and current rate of exchange. Indorsed on the back of the note was a provision that if the note was paid within one year no interest should be paid. It was held that this provision destroyed the negotiability of the note, the court saying: "We are of opinion that the instrument sued upon cannot be considered a negotiable promissory note. While it is made payable on or before two years with ten per cent interest, and is thus far definite and certain, yet the subsequent clause, that if paid within one year it shall not draw interest, destroys the element of certainty which otherwise would exist. No person until after the expiration of the first year, could with absolute certainty determine or ascertain the amount that would be paid in discharge thereof. The memorandum at the foot of this instrument is inconsistent with the promise made in the body, and in this respect it will be found to differ very materially from other cases decided in this court, and cited by defendant in error." On a second trial, based on the theory that the defendant was liable on the indorsement, judgment was again obtained against the defendant. But on a second appeal, Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525, 18 N. W. 248, the court held that the instrument was not a promissory note either negotiable or non-negotiable and was not therefore subject to the rules governing commercial paper since it lacked the required elements of certainty in time and amount of payment. In so holding it was said: "The so-called note being no more than a simple contract, not a note, and without negotiability, could only be transferred by assignment; and the indorsement 'pay to Thomas Story' on the contract, does no more than transfer the right to recover the money payable on the instrument, and the right to sue therefor, to Story. It is not an unusual way of transferring such claims, but such indorsement imports no legal liability on the part of the indorser to pay the amount of the claim in case of failure by the debtor. This would be giving the indorsement the character, and subjecting the maker of it to the liability, of the indorser of commercial paper."

In National Bank of Commerce v. Feeney, 12 S. D. 156, 80 N. W. 186, 76 Am. St. Rep. 594, 46 L.R.A. 732, it was held that a promissory note with a stipulation on the stub that the note was to be discounted at twelve per cent if paid before maturity was not negotiable since the exact amount which would be required to pay it could not be ascertained without considering the discount which depended on a condition uncertain of fulfillment.

In Farmers Loan, etc. Co. v. Devear, 2 Tenn. Civ. App. 366, it was held that a note payable in six equal instalments with a condition that a discount of five per cent would be allowed if it was paid within fifteen days from date, was rendered non-negotiable by the condition for the reason that the amount payable was uncertain. The court followed the decision of National Bank of Commerce v. Feeney, supra, and quoting from that case, said: "A promissory note is non-negotiable unless the exact amount to become due and payable at any future time is clearly ascertainable at the date of the note, uninfluenced by any conditions not certain of fulfillment." The opinion quoted from was delivered as the result of a second petition to rehear the case, the court having originally held the note negotiable, and the case seems to have been well and thoroughly considered by the court."

In Henler v. Comstock, 1 S. D. 138, 45 N. W. 331, 8 L.R.A. 393, the court held to be non-negotiable an instrument in these words: "On or before the 1st day of December, 1884, for value received, I or we, the undersigned, living five miles of Howard P O, county of Miner, Territory of Dakota, promise to pay to Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company or order, one hundred dollars, at the Miner County Bank, in Howard, with interest from date until paid at the rate of ten per cent per annum, eight per cent if paid when due." The court said: "By a careful review of these cases it seems that the basis of the decision is that of uncertainty in the amount to be recovered. In most of them, if not all, it is not sufficient that the amount necessary to liquidate the note on the day when due is certain, and can be determined, but that certainty must continue till the obligation is discharged."

It has been held that a note promising to pay a certain sum thirty days after date with interest at the rate of twelve per cent from date if not paid at maturity is not a negotiable instrument, not being certain in respect to the time of payment and the amount payable when due. Randolph v. Hudson, 12 Okla. 516, 74 Pac. 946.

A note providing that "it is agreed that this note may be paid at any time before maturity and that interest at the rate of eighteen per cent per annum shall be deducted till due" has been held to be non-negotiable. Way v. Smith, 111 Mass. 525, wherein the court said: "This stipulation gives the maker the right to pay the note at any time before its maturity at his option, and such payment would discharge his contract. It renders the contract uncertain and contingent, both as to the time of payment and the amount to be paid, and is inconsistent with the essential character of a negotiable promissory note."

v.

CALDWELL ET AL.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—June 6, 1916.

170 Ky. 571; 186 S. W. 648.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Validity.

The Workmen's Compensation Act of 1916 (Laws 1916, c. 33) is not unconstitutional, under Const. § 54, forbidding limitation of amount of recovery for injuries, as being compulsory on employees, since by section 74 it provides for their election to accept the provisions of the act, notwithstanding section 76b, providing that as to nonaccepting employee, the employer may use the defenses of contributory negligence, fellow servant, and assumed risk.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Nor is the act unconstitutional under Const. § 196, forbidding a common carrier to contract for relief from its common-law liability.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such act is not unconstitutional as a depriving of property without due process of law, contrary to Const. U. S. Amend. 14 (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416) because taking from a nonaccepting employer certain defenses, since the employer has no vested rights in these defenses, and the legislature could take them away without giving any election at all.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Nor is the act invalid as making, by section 11 thereof, radical changes in the law of parent and child, since there is no constitutional restraint on such action by the legislature.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The constitutionality of the act as a whole is not affected by the validity or invalidity of section 22 thereof, as to compensation to alien widows, children, and relatives, since this section is separable from the remainder of the act.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such act does not violate Const. § 135, forbidding establishment of courts not provided for in the constitution, since the compensation board is not a "court" within the constitution, and the act provides in section 52 for appeal from its decision, so that its members are arbitrators within Const. § 250, providing that arbitrators shall be chosen by the parties, the acceptance of the act by employer and employee constituting a consent that the board act as "arbitrators."

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Nor is it unconstitutional because not allowing a jury trial, since the parties accepting it thereby agree to trial without jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The title to such act does not violate Const. § 51, requiring the subject of a law to be expressed in the title.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Nor is such act unconstitutional as class legislation in violation of Const. § 59, providing that the general assembly shall not pass local or special acts concerning a number of subjects therein mentioned, since the classification made is reasonable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Nor is the act special legislation within the meaning of Const. § 59, since "special legislation" applies to particular places or persons as distinguished from classes of places or persons.

[572] CARROLL, J.—In 1914 the legislature passed a workmen's compensation act which was declared unconstitutional in State Journal Co. v. Workmen's Compensation Board, 161 Ky. 562. In 1916 the legislature again enacted a workmen's compensation act, and the validity of this act, which was upheld in the circuit court, is drawn in question on this appeal.

Before considering the objections urged to the present law, it is well to have a clear understanding of the grounds upon which the act of 1914 was condemned. In the State Journal case, as appears from the opinion, counsel in opposition to the validity of the act urged many reasons why it should be set aside, but the court, after considering the various objections raised, found that only three of them presented substantial grounds upon which the act could be assailed. These were: (1) That the act violated section 54 of the constitution, providing that, "The General Assembly shall have no power to limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to person or property;" (2) that the act was compulsory in that both the employers and employees were compelled to accept its provisions, and being compulsory it deprived appellant of its property without due process of law in violation of section 54 of the constitution; (3) that the act was in contravention of section 241 of the constitution, providing that: "Whenever the death of a person shall result from an injury inflicted by negligence or wrongful [573] act, then, in every such case, damages may be recovered for such death, from the corporation and persons so causing the same. . . ."

In the course of the opinion, the court, in pointing out the availability of these objections as grounds for adjudging the act invalid, said that in limiting the compensation to which an injured person should be entitled to the amount specified in the schedule of the act the legislature violated section 54 of the constitution heretofore quoted; and further said: "But we think it is within the power and right of an employee to waive this limit of recovery for injury, by contract, if such contract is freely and voluntarily made."

It was further said that the act was objectionable in compelling the injured employee to accept its provisions and take the compensation allowed by the board in lieu of any cause of action he might have against his employer whether he desired to do this or not, whereas "His election should be free, not even in the alternative. The law has no right to force him to accept the compensation fixed by this board by depriving him of his causes of action. . . . The legislature has no right to say to one of its citizens that 'unless you accept the provisions of a law impairing your constitutional rights, it will take from you other rights more valuable.' In the light of section 54 of the constitution, we must treat the contract made by the employee under the provisions of this act as compulsory and therefore void."

In reference to the burdens put on the employer who refused to come under the provisions of the act, it was said: "If any employer should determine that he wanted to carry his own risk and make his own contracts instead of having the law to make a contract for him, he can do so. . . . But what is the result? The law says to this employer: 'You may go on with your business industries, but if one of your employees is injured or killed, you shall not avail yourself of the following defenses: The defense of the fellow-servant; the defense of the assumption of risk; or the defense of contributory negligence.' These are practically all the defenses the employer has, and they are taken from him unless he accepts the provisions of this act. He cannot, under these conditions, successfully defend any suit for personal injury. . . . We cannot subscribe to the proposition [574] that this is a voluntary contract, even on the part of the employer."

In upholding the contention that the act violated section 241 of the Constitution before set out, it was said that: "If an injury to an employee should result in his death, his personal representative is authorized to recover damages from the negligent person or corporation causing his death. This is an absolute right given by this section of the constitution to his personal representative to recover damages for such negligence as has resulted in his death. And it is immaterial, under this section of the constitution, whether the money recovered goes to the children or parents, or becomes a part of his personal estate. The disposition of the money after his death cannot affect the right of the personal representative to recover. It may go to his heirs, or it may become a part of his personal estate and go to his creditors. . . ."

"It seems clear to us that such parts of this act as take from the personal representative or estate of a deceased employee, who left no dependents surviving him, any part of the compensation due such representative or his estate, and directs its payment into this fund for the benefit of other people, is a violation of the above section 241 of the constitution. The legislature has no right to limit the damages recovered, for the death of an employee negligently killed, to his dependents. Nor do we think the legislature has the right to take what is due the estate of one man and give it to another.

"It then necessarily follows that such parts of this act under consideration as give to this Board of Compensation, without the voluntary contract of the employee, the right to recover from the employer for the death of the employee leaving no dependents, and such other parts of the act as coerce the employee to consent or to make a contract that such compensation shall be paid into this compensation fund, are unauthorized and void."

Responding to other objections urged to the act, it was said: "A sufficient answer to all this is, that these are matters addressed entirely to the wisdom of the legislature and can be regulated as necessities may require. . . . The Legislature has the right to create [575] a compensation board and put it into operation free from the objectionable features of the present act. . . . And it is not the purpose of the court of the intention of this opinion to lay down any rule that will preclude the legislature from enacting a compensation act that will conform to the constitution, as we are clearly of the opinion that the legislature may, in conformity to the constitution, adopt an effective compensation law. But this court cannot consent that the legislature has the power to put this compensation act in operation by means of compulsory contracts."

A petition for a rehearing was filed by counsel for the compensation board, and in response to this petition the court, in Kentucky State Journal Co. v. Workmen's Compensation Board, 162 Ky. 387, 172 S. W. 674, retracted some objections to the act pointed out in the opinion and stated more explicitly the material grounds upon which it was induced to hold the act invalid, saying:

"First. The provisions of the present compensation act, as far as they affect the employer, are unobjectionable, as they do not conflict with any provisions of the constitution.

"Second. Any employee coming within the provisions of the act may voluntarily agree to accept its provisions fixing and limiting his recovery in case of injury.

"Third. He may likewise voluntarily accept the provisions of the act fixing the amount that shall be recovered in the event of his death, and said sum should be paid to his dependents if he leaves any, and if not, to his personal representatives. The legislature has no power to direct that this sum shall in any event be paid into the compensation fund.

"Fourth. Some provisions should be made in the act whereby the employee signifies his acceptance of the provisions of the act by some affirmative act on his part. Silence on this subject should not be construed into acceptance.

"Fifth. Provision should be made in the act for appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction for review in all cases where compensation is denied or where a less sum is allowed by the board than that claimed by the injured employee."

In the light of this opinion pointing out the objections to the act of 1914, while indicating that it was competent for the legislature to enact a compensation act [576] that would be free from the objectionable features of the act of 1914, it would appear that all we need do in this opinion is to ascertain whether the legislature conformed the act of 1916 to the opinion of the court by eliminating from it the clauses that rendered the act of 1914 invalid, and if this was done, to further ascertain and determine if any provisions or sections not found in the act of 1914 were inserted in the act of 1916 that would bring it within the condemnation of the constitution. If the act of 1916 is free from the obnoxious features of the act of 1914 and does not contain any new sections prohibited by the constitution, there would seem to be no sound reason why it should not be sustained, however much the policy or wisdom of it may be questioned or its economic benefits to both employer and employee doubted by those not favorable to legislation of this nature, for it has been pointed out by this court in many decisions that the judiciary will not interfere with the enactments of the law-making department of the state unless they are found to be clearly in contravention of some provision of the constitution. This well settled rule in the construction of statutes was thus stated in Com. v. Goldberg, 167 Ky. 96, 180 S. W. 68.

"Laws cannot be disregarded merely because they are supposed to be repugnant to some governmental principles that lie outside of constitutional limitations. The constitution of this state, in sections 27 and 28, distributing the powers of government, confined to the legislative branch the authority to enact laws, and this authority the judiciary is not at liberty to interfere with unless the legislation violates directly or by necessary implication some provision of the state or federal constitution. Subject to this limitation, the policy of the legislation or the wisdom or the propriety of it, is not for the judicial branch of the government to decide. When the courts have exercised their jurisdiction in restraining the legislature from transgressing constitutional bounds, they have reached the limit of their control. The people put in the constitution such limitations as they wished to impose on the legislative branch, and within these limitations its activities are controlled by the constitution; but outside of them it may act with a free hand, subject, of course, to the restraint imposed by the federal constitution. So that when the validity of legislation is challenged in the courts, the inquiry is [577] limited to the questions, what provision of the constitution does it violate? What does it do or propose to do that the constitution forbids?"

Coming now to consider the exhaustive argument of counsel opposing the legislation, we find it insisted that the act of 1916 contains provisions that in their operation and effect, although differing in form of expression from the act of 1914, compel the employee to accept the provisions of the act; and this being so, it is open to the objection that made the act of 1914 obnoxious to the constitution as pointed out in the opinion referred to. But after carefully considering this act, our opinion is that it conforms in the particular mentioned to the requirements of the opinion and hence is not compulsory on the employee, but leaves him the individual right to accept or reject its provisions whichever he chooses to do. Under the act of 1914, as was aptly said in the other opinion, "When the employer accepts the provisions of this act the employee is automatically drawn into this so-called contract and made subject to its provisions." He could exercise no independent volition in the matter at all. It was not necessary that he should be asked to accept the law because when his employer accepted it, this act of the employer, in and of itself without any action on the part of the employee, subjected the employee to all the provisions of the law, and this arbitrary method by which the provisions of the act were imposed on the employee was one of the principal objections urged to the act of 1914 and the chief ground upon which the invalidity of the act was rested."

In the act of 1916, however, the objectionable compulsory features of the act of 1914, in so far as the employee is concerned, were eliminated, and under the act of 1916 the employer cannot, without the consent of the employee, bring him under the influence of the act, nor does it become operative as to the employee until he has voluntarily signified his willingness to accept its provisions by signing the paper described in section 74, which section reads as follows:

"Section 74. Election to operate under the provisions of this act shall be effected by the employee by signing the following notice, to wit:

"I hereby agree with (name of employer) to accept the provisions of chapter 33, acts of 1916, commonly known as the Kentucky Workmen's Compensation Act."

[578] "The election shall be effective from, and including, the date of signing, which shall be inserted opposite the employee's signature. In case an employee be unable to write, his mark shall be witnessed by a third person, who shall at the time read the notice to the employee. Any number of employees may sign the same notice, provided that there be conspicuously written or printed at the top of each page thereof on which signatures appear a copy of the above form of notice. If the employment be intermittent or be temporarily suspended, the original acceptance of the employee shall continue effective in subsequent employment under the same employer."

It is also provided in section 76 that: "At any time after electing to operate under the provisions of this act, either party may withdraw such election. . . . The employee desiring to withdraw such election shall file with the employer a written notice of withdrawal, stating the date when such withdrawal is to become effective. Following the filing or giving of such notices, the status of the party withdrawing shall become the same as if his former election had not been made; provided, however, that withdrawal shall not be effective as to any injury sustained less than one week after the filing thereof."

It is, however, provided in section 76b that: "Every employee affected by the provisions of this act who does not elect to operate thereunder, and his representative in case of death, shall, in any suit at law to recover damages for personal injury or death by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment against an employer electing to operate under the provisions of this act, proceed at law as if this act had not been enacted, and the employer may avail himself of the defenses of contributory negligence, negligence of a fellow servant, and assumption of risk as such defenses now exist at common law."

Passing for the moment section 76b, it will be seen that whether the employee accepts the act or not depends entirely upon his voluntary act. He can either accept or reject it as he pleases, and no one else has authority to do either of these things for him. It would seem, therefore, that the law itself is a sufficient answer to the argument that it is not an elective, but a compulsory statute [579] by which the employee is drawn under its provisions whether he desires to be subjected to them or not.

But it is said that when section 74 is read, as it should be, in connection with section 76b, it very plainly shows that it was the purpose of the legislature to evade, through the form of voluntary acceptance stipulated in section 74, the compulsory feature of the act of 1914, while coercing the employee by section 76b to accept the provisions of the act, although he might not voluntarily wish to do so. This coercion is found by counsel to exist in that part of section 76b which denies to the employee the right of recovery for injuries that may have been inflicted by the negligence of the employer, if the injuries were caused by the contributory negligence of the employee, or by the act of a fellow servant, or if the risk of the resulting injuries was assumed by the employee.

It is true that under section 76b the employee who does not elect to accept the act and who brings an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the alleged negligence of the employer who has accepted its provisions, may be met with the defenses that he was guilty of contributory negligence, or that the injuries complained of were caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, or that he assumed the risk of the accident that resulted in his injury. But, clearly, the fact that the employer may rely on these defenses is far from denying to the employee the right to recover for injuries caused by the negligence of the employer. He still has his cause of action as he has always had, and the employer has only the right to rely on defenses that he always had the right to rely on, although it should be said that the common law definition of these defenses has been greatly modified by court opinions and that they do not now excuse the employer to the full extent they formerly did.

To what extent these defenses may be relied on by the accepting employer to defeat recovery by a nonelecting employee, it would be obviously improper in this opinion to undertake to say.

It will be time enough to construe and define section 76b when we have a case arising between a nonelecting employee and an accepting employer in which there is presented the question of the extent to which these defenses may be relied on by the employer to defeat [580] a recovery. For the present it is sufficient to say that whether at all or in what degree this act puts in the way of the nonelecting employee obstacles by which he was not theretofore hindered in suits against his employer, is really not a material inquiry in the case we have, as the right of election or nonelection is left with the employee, and this is all the former opinion required.

We may, however, say that we do not agree that the changes in the existing law proposed in section 76b have the coercive influence attributed to them by counsel or that this section compels the employee to accept the act when he would not have accepted it if this change had not been made. When the section is looked to, this assumption is entirely too speculative to be made the basis of a charge of compulsion. What the employee will do when he comes to decide whether to accept or reject the act depends on the viewpoint from which he weighs for himself its benefits and disadvantages. One employee might be entirely willing to elect to accept its provisions with a full recognition of the effect of section 76b, while another employee, if this section were eliminated, would not accept it. But, however this may be, and without regard to the influence section 76b may have on the employee, the real and determining question by which the validity of this act upon the point under consideration must be decided is, has the employee the right to act for himself? Has he the right to exercise his voluntary, independent judgment and do as he pleases? The act declares that he has, and as was said in the former opinion, this is all that is necessary to remove the charge of compulsion.

It is also urged that although section 54 of the constitution provides that "The General Assembly shall have no power to limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to person or property," the General Assembly, in disregard of this section, has attempted by this act to limit the amount that may be recovered for injuries or death.

It is quite correct to say that this section operates as a restraint on the General Assembly and prohibits it from attempting to limit the amount of recovery in the cases described in the section. But in this legislation the General Assembly did not arbitrarily or at all undertake to limit the amount of recovery. It merely proposed a statute to a certain class of people for their individual [581] acceptance or rejection. It did not assume to deprive these classes or individuals without their consent of any constitutional rights to which they were entitled. The General Assembly merely afforded by this legislation a means by and through which individuals composing classes might legally consent to limit the amount to which the individual would be entitled if injured or killed in the course of his employment.

Section 196 of the constitution provides that: "No common carrier shall be permitted to contract for relief from its common law liability." And it is suggested that as this act includes certain classes of common carriers which are permitted to accept its provisions, the acceptance of the act by these common carriers, if its provisions were not accepted by their employees, would have the effect of enabling the common carrier employer to limit his common law liability in violation of this section.

It was held in Davis v. Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. 122 Ky. 528, 12 Ann. Cas. 723, 92 S. W. 339, 121 Am. St. Rep. 481, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, supported by a reference to section 196 of the constitution, that a contract between a common carrier and its employees by which in consideration of his employment the employee assumed all risk of death or accident or damage to him or his property sustained by the negligence of the employer, was against the public policy of the state and not binding on the employee. But the principle laid down in this and other cases involving like questions can have no controlling application here, because if we should put to one side this compensation act, it is clear that no employer, whether common carrier or not, could enter into a contract with his employee by which the employee, in consideration of his employment, could bindingly consent to waive any right of action he might have against his employer to recover damages for injuries sustained by the negligence of the employer. Individual contracts like this have always been and are now against the public policy of the state. This act, however, may modify in some measure this rule when the employer has accepted its provisions and the employee has not. But as to all other employers and employees the public policy of the state remains unchanged.

It is, of course, apparent that this act, which is the result of a widespread demand for a radical change in the existing law, has set up as to these classes to which it applies a new public policy for this state which it is [582] confidently believed will prove beneficial to all who come under its protection. And the authority for the legislation is found in the police power of the state; in the power to regulate and control by legislation all matters affecting not only the health and the safety, but the general welfare of the people individually as well as in classes into which they may reasonably be grouped; and this extension of the power has been sustained by the courts practically with unanimity.

Another ground for reversal is found by counsel in the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States in which it is said, in part: "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law," (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416) and the contention is made that this act, by taking from the nonelecting employer certain defenses that he had before its adoption, in effect deprives him of his property without due process of law. Many cases are cited by counsel in support of the asserted proposition, but we do not find the reasons advanced available for the purpose urged by counsel. Nor do we think the principle announced in the case of Louisville v. Cochran, 82 Ky. 15, relied on, applicable to the questions submitted.

The only ground on which this attack is rested is that the employer who elects not to accept the provisions of the act shall not, in any suit by his employee to recover damages for personal injuries or death arising out of and in the course of his employment, be permitted to defend the suit upon the grounds that the employee was guilty of contributory negligence, or that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, or that the employee had assumed the risk.

Aside from the fact that it was held in the former opinion that the act of 1914 containing like provisions was free from objection so far as the employer was concerned, it may be again said that these burdens are not arbitrarily imposed on the employer, as it is left entirely to his election whether he will assume them by refusing to accept the provisions of the act or be relieved from them by electing to come under its provisions. The choice is put before him and he may act as he chooses. The only compulsion attempted to be exerted is that if he refuses to accept he cannot rely on these defenses which would be available to him if he did accept. But if this is compulsion, as claimed, the legislature had the [583] right at any time to withdraw the benefit of these defenses from employers and to make them liable at the suit of injured employees, although the injured employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence, or the injury may have been inflicted by a fellow servant, or the risk of injury may have been assumed. The employer had no vested right in these defenses. The law gave them to him and the law may take them away, and it could have taken them away without giving any election at all. This being so, it would seem clear that this legislation does not take the property of the employer without due process of law.

Objection is also found to section 11, which provided that "A minor, except where employed in wilful violation of any law of this state regulating the employment of minors, shall be deemed sui juris for the purpose of this act, and no other person shall have cause of action or right to compensation for any injury to or death of such minor employee for loss of service on account thereof, by reason of the minority of such employee. In the event of the award of a lump sum of compensation to such minor employee, payment shall be made to the guardian of such minor." And it is insisted that this section is open to serious complaint on account of the radical changes it works in the long existing law in respect to the mutual obligations of parent and child.

It is true that this legislation does make material changes in the law of parent and child; but a sufficient answer to all the objections urged is that the legislature, in undertaking to fix the status of minors under this act, was not restrained by any constitutional provision. It had the unquestioned power to make such changes in what may be called the business relations of parent and child as seemed to it advisable.

Section 22 of the act reads as follows: "Compensation under this act to alien dependent widows and children, not residents of the United States, shall be one-half of the amount provided in each case for residents; and the employer may, at any time, commute all future installments of compensation to alien dependents or the then value thereof. Alien widowers, parents, brothers and sisters, not residents of the United States, shall not be entitled to any compensation." This section, which was not in the act of 1914, is assailed because it is said to discriminate against aliens and their dependents and [584] is also a discrimination against American labor in favor of foreign labor; and apparently this charge is well founded. We do not, however, find it either necessary or proper, in determining the constitutionality of this act as a whole, to express any opinion as to the validity of this section. It is not so related to or connected with the other sections as that it might not be eliminated and leave a complete act in such form as would accomplish the chief purpose of the legislation. This being so, if this section should be declared to be unconstitutional, the remainder of the act would not be affected by its invalidity. Com. v. Goldberg, 167 Ky. 96, 180 S. W. 184, and cases therein cited.

In view of this it is obvious that the fitting thing to do is to postpone adjudging any question concerning this section until its construction and effect come before us in some case in which an alien, his relatives or dependents, are parties, and the objections to the section in its practical application to existing conditions are made an issue.

It is further insisted that the compensation board as created by this act is a court established in violation of section 135 of the constitution, reading: "No courts, save those provided for in this constitution, shall be established." This question was before us when we came to consider the act of 1914, and we did not then find that this compensation board was a court in the meaning of the constitution, and so the objection to the compensation board on this ground was overruled. But it was said in the extended opinion, in 162 Ky. that: "Provision should be made in the act for appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction for review in all cases where compensation is denied or where a less sum is allowed by the board than that claimed by the injured employee." In the 1914 act the right of appeal to the courts by a complaining employee from the decision of the compensation board was so limited as to practically deny any appeal and to make the judgment of the compensation board final. But the act of 1916 contains an elaborate scheme by which courts may review the final decisions of the compensation board, and it is provided, in part, in section 52 of the act that:

"Either party, within twenty days after the rendition of such final order or award of the board, may by petition appeal to the circuit court that would have [585] jurisdiction to try an action for damages for said injuries if this act had not passed, for the review of such order or award.

"No new or additional evidence may be introduced in the circuit court, except as to the fraud or misconduct of some person engaged in the administration of this act, and affecting the order, ruling or award, but the court shall otherwise hear the cause upon the record or abstract thereof as certified by the board, and shall dispose of the cause in summary manner, its review being limited to determining whether or not:

"1. The board acted without or in excess of its power.

"2. The order, decision or award was procured by fraud.

"3. The order, decision or award is not in conformity to the provision of this act.

"4. If findings of fact are in issue, whether such findings of fact support the order, decision or award.

"The board and each party shall have the right to appear in such review proceedings; the court shall enter judgment affirming, modifying or setting aside the order, decision or award, or in its discretion remanding the cause to the board for further proceedings in conformity with the direction of the court. The court may, in advance of judgment and upon a sufficient showing of fact, remand the cause to the board."

And it is further provided in section 52 of the act that: "Where an amount sufficient under existing laws to authorize an appeal to the Court of Appeals is involved, the judgment of the circuit court shall be subject to appeal to the Court of Appeals, the scope of whose review shall include all matters herein made the subject of review by the circuit court and also errors of law arising in the circuit court and upon appeal made reviewable by the Civil Code of Procedure where not in conflict with the provisions of this act."

From these excerpts it will be seen that in all cases in which there arises a question affecting the substantial rights of either the employer or the employee, an appeal may be taken to the courts from the decision of the board upon the record made up in the hearing before the compensation board. So that the board in its settlement of disputes arising between employer and employee as to the compensation the employee is entitled to is really [586] nothing more than an agency created by the legislature for the purpose of assisting the courts in the preliminary findings of fact that may be necessary in executing the administrative features of the act. If the parties are satisfied with the decision of the board, it merely acts as a board of arbitration whose judgment is acquiesced in by the parties who have submitted the matter in dispute to its settlement; if they are not satisfied they may appeal to the courts.

As to the suggestion made that the members of this board are not arbitrators within the meaning of section 250 of the constitution because the employer and employee have no voice in the selection of the board, it may be dismissed with the comment that the employer and employee in accepting the provisions of the act thereby consent that the board of compensation may act as a board of arbitrators for the purpose of determining matters of difference between them. And the criticism that the act is faulty in not allowing a jury trial may be shortly answered by the statement that persons having a case in court may consent to a trial without a jury, and this is what the parties who accept this act agree to do.

The title of the act is also censured as being in violation of section 51 of the constitution, but this criticism is without merit. The title of the act is very elaborate; indeed, more so than the constitution requires, and covers every substantial feature of the law.

It is also pressed on our attention that the act is special and class legislation and for this reason violates section 59 of the constitution, providing that the General Assembly shall not pass local or special acts concerning a number of subjects that are mentioned in the section. It is, however, so well settled as not to need citation of authority that the right of classification when reasonably exercised is not opposed to either the state or federal constitution; and all that this act proposes to do is to create a class out of described employers and employees and deal with this class separately and apart from other classes of employers and employees. In making classifications like this it is obviously impossible to draw the line of separation with such accuracy as to include all who might well be brought within the class or to exclude all who might be left without it. It is, therefore, only required that the classification shall be [587] as reasonable and as practicable as conditions will permit, and this legislation, we think, conforms to this rule.

Neither is the act special legislation within the meaning of the constitution, as special legislation applies to particular places or persons as distinguished from classes of places or persons.

Some objection is also pointed out to the insurance provisions, but these are merely administrative and for the purpose of making more satisfactory and secure the compensation provisions of the act and do not contravene any section of the constitution.

In conclusion we may say that after a careful consideration of this progressive and beneficial legislation and of all the material arguments advanced by counsel in opposition to its validity, we are convinced that as a whole the act is not open to any constitutional objection. The legislature in its enactment was careful to avoid the objections found to exist in the act of 1914 and to keep it free from other fundamental faults that might affect its validity.

It may be true that there are sections and parts of sections relating to administrative features of the act that need reforming, and, indeed, it would be singular if structural defects could not be found in so comprehensive and complicated a piece of new and remedial legislation dealing with a subject-matter that directly affects so many people and so many business concerns. But when the board charged with the administration of the law comes to apply it to the practical conditions it was designed to regulate, these defects, whatever they may be, will surely be discovered, and when they are, the legislature can, and we have no doubt will, from time to time, correct them in such manner as the needs of the persons and businesses affected may seem to require.

We have not, in the course of the opinion found it useful to support what has been said by authority, although there is abundant that might be found sustaining our conclusions, as may be seen by an examination of Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, Ann. Cas. 1912B 156, 94 N. E. 431, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162; State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 117 Pac. 1101, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 466; Cunningham v. Northwestern Improvement Co. 44 Mont. 180, 119 Pac. 554; Borgnis v. Falk Co. 147 Wis. 327, 133 N. W. 209, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 489; State v. Creamer, 85 Ohio St. 349, 97 N. E. 602, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 694; Milwaukee v. Miller, [588] 154 Wis. 652, 144 N. W. 188, and the very full note to this case in L.R.A.1916A page 1; Jeffry Mfg. Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 35 S. Ct. 167, 59 U. S. Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed. The whole court sitting.

Generally.

Since the preparation of the note to Kentucky State Journal Co. v. Workmen's Compensation Board, Ann. Cas. 1916B 1273, there have been a number of cases passing on the validity of workmen's compensation acts, and the decisions have been uniformly in favor of legislation of that kind. That such acts are not in violation of any provision of the Federal Constitution is established by three recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court, New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629 (sustaining the compulsory act of New York); Hawkins v. Bleakly, 243 U. S. 210, Ann. Cas. 1917D 637 (sustaining the elective act of Iowa); and Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, Ann. Cas. 1917D 642 (sustaining the state insurance fund act of Washington). Since the decision in the reported case, sustaining the act passed as a substitute for that held to be invalid in Kentucky State Journal Co. v. Workmen's Compensation Board, supra, there is no American jurisdiction in which the latest compensation act is held to be invalid.

Among the principal objections which have been urged unsuccessfully against workmen's compensation acts in the recent cases are the following:

—that they take property without compensation, Solvuca v. Ryan, etc. Co. (Md.) 101 Atl. 710;

—that they deny due process of law, New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1; Solvuca v. Ryan, etc. Co. (Md.) 101 Atl. 710; Madden's Case, 222 Mass. 487, 111 N. E. 379, L.R.A. 1916D 1000; Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. (Okla.) 162 Pac. 938; Middleton v. Texas Power, etc. Co. (Tex.) 185 S. W. 556; —that they impair the obligation of a contract, Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145;

—that they impair the liberty of contract, Anderson v. Carnegie Steel Co. 255 Pa. St. 33, 99 Atl. 215; —that they amount to class legislation, New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1; Chicago Rys. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 534; Casparis Stone Co. v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 77, 115 N. E. 822;

—that they delegate judicial power to administrative officers, Hawkins v. Bleakly, 243 U. S. 210, Ann. Cas. 1917D 637, 37 S. Ct. 255; Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 243, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145; Fassig v. State, 95 Ohio St. 232, 116 N. E. 104; Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. (Okla.) 162 Pac. 938; Middleton v. Texas Power, etc. Co. (Tex.) 185 S. W. 556; —that they oust the courts of jurisdiction, Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145; Solvuca v. Ryan, etc. Co. (Md.) 101 Atl. 710;

—that they deny to the employee his common-law remedies, New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1; Keeran v. Peoria, etc. Traction Co. 277 Ill. 413, 115 N. E. 636; Anderson v. Carnegie Steel Co. 255 Pa. St. 33, 99 Atl. 215; Middleton v. Texas Power, etc. Co. (Tex.) 185 S. W. 556; —that they abolish the common-law defenses of the employer, New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1; Strom v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. 271 Ill. 544, 111 N. E. 555; Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145; Brost v. Whitall-Tatum Co. 89 N. J. L. 531, 99 Atl. 315; Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. (Okla.) 162 Pac. 938; Anderson v. Carnegie Steel Co. 255 Pa. St. 33, 99 Atl. 215; Middleton v. Texas Power, etc. Co. (Tex.) 185 S. W. 556; Watts v. Ohio Valley Electric R. Co. 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659;

—that they violate the constitutional guaranty of a jury trial, New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1; Hawkins v. Bleakly, 243 U. S. 210, Ann. Cas. 1917D 637, 37 S. Ct. 255; Raymond v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 233 Fed. 239, 147 C. C. A. 245; Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145; Fassig v. State, 95 Ohio St. 232, 116 N. E. 104; Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. (Okla.) 162 Pac. 938; Anderson v. Carnegie Steel Co. 255 Pa. St. 33, 99 Atl. 215; Middleton v. Texas Power, etc. Co. (Tex.) 185 S. W. 556.

An elective act does not violate a constitutional prohibition against limiting by statute the amount recoverable for personal injury or death. Anderson v. Carnegie Steel Co. 255 Pa. St. 33, 99 Atl. 215. And see the reported case.

In addition to the rulings on the validity of a workmen's compensation act as a whole, the following specific provisions in such an act have been sustained in recent cases:

—making employer liable for act of stranger on premises, Sertz v. Industrial Ins. Commission, reported ante, this volume, at page 354; —making employer liable for injury occurring in another jurisdiction, Hagenback v. Lippert (Ind.) 117 N. E. 531;

—creating liability to dependents for death of workmen, North Pac. Steamship Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 163 Pac. 910; —giving to employer alternative to pay compensation personally or to subscribe to insurance fund, State v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. (Ohio.) 117 N. E. 232; —permitting notices to be given to parent or guardian of infant workman, Young v. Sterling Leather Works (N. J.) 102 Atl. 395;

—subrogating employer to rights of employee against third person causing injury, Friebel v. Chicago City R. Co. (Ill.) 117 N. E. 467; —including municipality within purview of act, McLaughlin v. Industrial Board (Ill.) 117 N. E. 819; Wood v. Detroit, 188 Mich. 547, 155 N. W. 592; Purdy v. Sault Ste. Marie, 188 Mich. 573, Ann. Cas. 1917D 881, 155 N. W. 597; State v. Carroll, 94 Wash. 531, 162 Pac. 593;

—imposing special liability on contractor if he fails to require subcontractors to insure, Parker-Washington v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 498, 113 N. E. 976; —allowing funeral expenses in cases of partial dependency but not in cases of total dependency, Northern Redwood Lumber Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 166 Pac. 828, wherein the court said: "It is obviously not for us to inquire why the legislature discriminated as to funeral expenses between the two classes of cases dealt with, respectively, by the first and second subdivisions of section 15. It is enough to know, as is clearly true, that the distinction or discrimination thus made is one which the legislature has the power and the right to recognize and establish. Presumptively there was, in the legislative mind, a sufficient reason for the discrimination, albeit such reason may not be manifest upon the face of the statute itself. But, as suggested, whether there exists a substantial reason for the distinction, or whether the same was arbitrarily drawn, the power to make it is nevertheless in the legislature. In other words, the fact of the discrimination does not render the provisions invalid, nor does the absence of an obviously substantial reason therefor compel, as is true in some cases, a construction of the provisions contrary to the plain grammatical signification of the language thereof."

Arizona.

An Arizona act analogous to a workmen's compensation act, imposing an absolute liability for actual damages in case of injury to employee in certain hazardous employments, was sustained in Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. v. Mendez, 166 Pac. 278.

California.

The previous decisions sustaining the California workmen's compensation act have been followed in several recent cases. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 457, Ann. Cas. 1917E 390, 156 Pac. 491; Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 163 Pac. 60; North Pac. Steamship Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 163 Pac. 910; Northern Redwood Lumber Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 166 Pac. 828.

Illinois.

A number of recent cases follow the previous decisions upholding the workmen's compensation act of Illinois. Strom v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. 271 Ill. 544, 111 N. E. 555; Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 11, 113 N. E. 173; Parker-Washington v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 498, 113 N. E. 976; Von Boeckmann v. Corn Products Refining Co. 274 Ill. 605, 113 N. E. 902; Vaughan's Seed Store v. Simonini, 275 Ill. 447, 114 N. E. 163; Chicago Rys. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 534; Casparis Stone Co. v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 77, 115 N. E. 822.

In Keeran v. Peoria, etc. Traction Co. 277 Ill. 413, 115 N. E. 636, it was said: "The workmen's compensation act is an entire departure from the common law in regard to the relation of master and servant. It does not rest on the theory of negligence, but on the theory that the injuries to workmen and deaths caused by accidents in any business should be regarded as a part of the expense of the business and should be borne by the business. We have held the act constitutional in many decisions, beginning with Deibeikis v. Link-Belt Co. 261 Ill. 454 [104 N. E. 211, Ann. Cas. 1915A 241]. It is elective, and results in two systems in the law of the state by which the rights of employers and employees are governed. Under the act for the amount which a workman may recover for a particular injury is fixed by law. He may recover this amount regardless of the cause of the injury, the fault of his employer or his own negligence, so long as it arose out of and in the course of his employment. This valuation applies to all injuries which come within the provisions of the act and to all persons who come within its provisions, and it is not an unreasonable classification which applies the rule uniformly to all persons affected by the act. The act is elective both for employers and employees. It is apparent that the legislature considered the law of negligence as applied to the relation of master and servant as unsatisfactory in its results and sought by this act to secure to injured workmen and their dependents a more certain, prompt, and inexpensive relief than the common-law action afforded, by imposing upon the employer, as incident to his business, the burden of providing for the loss suffered by his employees from injuries received in his business according to a certain definite scale. The burden was not, however, imposed absolutely. The system was submitted to each employer and employee for acceptance or rejection. The employers who accepted the provisions of the act assumed the definite liabilities it imposed upon them in consideration of their exemption from their common-law liability, while the employees who accepted surrendered their common-law rights in consideration of the definite remedy given by the act. The provisions of the act become a binding contract as to all who accept them. So far as employers and employees under the act are concerned, all accidental injuries to workmen arising out of and in the course of their employment are to be paid for by the employer in whose service the injury occurred, or the employer negligently causing the injury, at the rate fixed in the schedule established by the act. This provision constitutes part of the contract entered into by the election to accept the provisions of the act. It is competent to enter into such an agreement, and no constitutional rights are violated by its enforcement."

Indiana.

In Hagenback v. Lippert, 117 N. E. 53, the court sustained the validity of the workmen's compensation act of Indiana.

Iowa.

The Iowa workmen's compensation act was held to be valid in an exhaustive discussion in Hunter v. Galfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145. The validity of the same act was declared in Hawkins v. Bleakly, 243 U. S. 210, Ann. Cas. 1917D 637, 37 S. Ct. 255.

The New York workmen's compensation act which had been sustained in several earlier cases in that jurisdiction was upheld by the Federal Supreme Court in New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1.

Recent cases have affirmed the previous holdings in favor of the validity of the Ohio workmen's compensation act. Fasseg v. State, 95 Ohio St. 232, 116 N. E. 104; State v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. 117 N. E. 232.

Oklahoma.

Sustaining the Oklahoma workmen's compensation act, the court said in Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. 162 Pac. 938; "The class of industries embraced by the act are of such a nature as to authorize regulation of their conduct and management by the state, and the obligations of both employer and employee to accept the conditions imposed by the statute grow out of the interest which the public has in the proper adjustment of the relations existing between them and of the right to regulate the industry in which they are both engaged; and, while it may be urged that the relation existing between them is one of contract, the state may impose, as one of the conditions thereof, that the employee shall accept a fixed sum for injuries received in the course of his employment as defined by the act for the same reason it may impose liability upon the employer in cases where he is free from negligence. The unsatisfactory and unscientific method of awarding damages with all of the economic results attendant upon the administration of those laws has been deemed sufficient to justify interference by the state in occupations classed as hazardous, and to warrant the substitution of a new and more scientific plan intended to bring about better results, and to transfer the burden of losses occasioned in the prosecution of such industries in a large number of cases from the injured employee or his dependent ones, to the industry itself, and to effectually bring about such a change it was necessary to withdraw from the employee his right of action as regulated and determined by the rules of the common law for future injuries, and in so doing the legislature simply abolished the common-law rule of liability in such cases. If it may abolish the common-law defenses that were available, it may, with equal authority, declare that purely accidental injuries should no longer be actionable. The power to do both exists where it is deemed wise and for the public good."

Pennsylvania.

The Pennsylvania workmen's compensation act is valid. Anderson v. Carnegie Steel Co. 255 Pa. St. 33, 99 Atl. 215.

Texas.

The conflict shown by the earlier note in the decisions of the court of civil appeals as to the validity of the workmen's compensation act of Texas has been resolved by a decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the act. Middleton v. Texas Power, etc. Co. 18 S. W. 556.

Washington

In several recent cases the validity of the Washington workmen's compensation act has been reaffirmed. Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, Ann. Cas. 1917D 642, 37 S. Ct. 260; Raymond v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 233 Fed. 239, 147 C. C. A. 245; Stertz v. Industrial Ins. Commission, reported ante, this volume, at page 354.

West Virginia.

Recent cases have reiterated the previous holding in West Virginia in favor of the validity of the workmen's compensation act of that state. Watts v. Ohio Valley Electric R. Co. 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659; Rhodes v. J. B. B. Coal Co. 90 S. E. 796.

STATE EX REL. ANDERSON

v.

GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 7, 1916.

134 Minn. 21; 158 N. W. 715.

Statutes — Retroactive Operation — Statute of Limitation.

A statute of limitation operates prospectively, unless a legislative intent to give it a retrospective operation is clear.

[See 4 Ann. Cas. 166; Ann. Cas. 1912A 1041; 111 Am. St. Rep. 455.]

Same.

The postponement of the time when a limitation statute becomes effective evidences an intent to make it of retrospective operation.

Workmen's Compensation Act as Retroactive.

Where the amending statute materially changes the statute amended, making desirable a postponement of its operation to permit an adjustment to changed provisions, the argument that the limitation was intended to be retrospective is less cogent; and when such limitation, if retrospective, is radical and harsh, and the changes in the substantive provisions of the statute furnish an adequate reason for a postponement, such postponement should not be held to show an intent to make the statute retrospective. And it is held that chapter 209, Laws 1915, approved April 21, 1915, and effective July 1, 1915, amending the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 (Laws 1913, c. 467), and providing a limitation of one year after injury in which a workman may commence his action, the effect being, if the act is retrospective, to require accrued causes of action to be brought within seventy days after the passage of the statute, was not retrospective.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Certiorari to District Court, Winona county: GRANGER, Judge.

Action by A. A. Anderson, plaintiff, against General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Lamberton & Looby and Brown, Abbott & Somsen for relator.

Watson & Abernethy for respondent.

[22] DIBELL, C.—This was a proceeding in the district court by A. A. Anderson under the Workmen's Compensation Act against the General Accident Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, the insurer of the Bay State Milling Company, his employer. There was judgment for the insurance company.

The judgment is before us upon a writ of certiorari issued on the relation of Anderson.

Anderson was in the employ of the Bay State Milling Company of Winona on April 11, 1914, and on that day was injured under circumstances giving him a right to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 (Laws 1913, p. 675, c. 467). The proceeding for compensation was brought in November, 1915, a year and eight months after his injury. The act of 1913 contained no limitation upon the time within which a claim for compensation might be made. On April 21, 1915, a year and ten days after the accident, the act of 1913 was amended and the following section was added:

"Sec. 20A. LIMITATION.—The time within which the following acts shall be performed under Part 2 of this act shall be limited to the following periods respectively:

"(1) Actions or proceedings by an injured employee to determine or recover compensation; one (1) year after the occurrence of the injury." Laws 1915, p. 294, c. 209, § 8.

[23] The concluding section of the 1915 act is as follows:

"This act shall take effect on and after the first day of July, A.D. 1915."

The court held that the relator's cause of action was barred by the limitation quoted. The correctness of this holding is the single question for decision.

1. A statute of limitation is construed to operate prospectively, unless a legislative intent to give it a retrospective operation is clear. Powers v. St. Paul, 36 Minn. 87, 30 N. W. 433; Burwell v. Tullis, 12 Minn. 572; Walker v. People, 202 Ill. 34, 66 N. E. 827; Thoeni v. Dubuque, 115 Ia. 482, 88 N. W. 967; Rothford v. Union R. Co. 25 R. I. 70, 54 Atl. 932; Thomas v. Higgs, 68 W. Va. 152, 69 S. E. 654, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1039; 1 Wood, Limitations, §§ 12, 12b, 12c; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d ed.) 174; 25 Cyc. 991; 33 Cent. Dig. Lim. of Act. §§ 16-31; 12 Dec. Dig. Lim. of Act. § 6. It is not construed to bar a remedy upon a cause of action accrued at its passage, unless the legislative intent to bring such result is expressed or necessarily implied from the language used. "The general rule of construction applicable to all statutes is that they are not to be construed as retroactive unless it clearly appears from their language that they were so intended. A statute ought never to be so construed as to cut off an existing right if it be reasonably susceptible of any other construction." Mitchell, J., in Powers v. St. Paul, 36 Minn. 87, 30 N. W. 433.

2. The postponement of the time when a statute shall become effective evidences an intent to make it of retrospective operation. Burwell v. Tullis, 12 Minn. 572; Stine v. Bennett, 13 Minn. 153. If such is not the intent, why the postponement? In the case last cited the court said: "No reason is apparent why the lawmakers should depart from the ordinary course of legislative action by postponing the operation of the law, except it be that parties interested might have notice of the passage of the law, and proceed to exercise their existing rights before its operation should prevent them from doing so." In Duncan v. Cobb, 32 Minn. 460, 21 N. W. 714, involving a statute limiting the time in which a foreclosure might be made, the operation of the statute being postponed for a year, the court said that "the apparent purpose of the legislature in allowing a year to elapse before the act should become operative, [24] was . . . to afford opportunity to all having existing rights of foreclosure to pursue the remedy before the bar of the statute should intervene." In speaking of a limitation statute affecting actions on judgments, Judge Sanborn, in Wrightman v. Boone County, 88 Fed. 435, 31 C. C. A. 570, said: "The second section of the act provides that it shall not take effect until one year after its passage.

. . . A construction that the act has no application to judgments rendered before its enactment would render this provision nugatory." And see Wrightman v. Boone County, 82 Fed. 412; Eaton v. Supervisors of Manitowoc County, 40 Wis. 668.

3. If the amending statute of April 21, 1915, had done nothing but give a limitation, the postponement of its operation might well enough be conclusive of an intent to give a retrospective operation. It did much more than prescribe a limitation. It was a revision of the act of 1913. The title of the 1913 act and 13 of its 36 sections were amended and three sections were added. Some of the changes were formal; others were substantial. The rates of compensation were changed. The provisions as to dependents and partial dependents were rewritten. The statute was made applicable to minors. There were changes in procedure. Before the amended act could become efficiently and justly operative, it was necessary that those interested adjust themselves to it. This furnished a sufficient legislative reason, a very apparent and a persuasive reason, for the postponement of its operation. Indeed, the act of 1913, our first compensation act, was not effective for six months after its passage, and this for no reason other than that there might be an appropriate adjustment to the changed relation between employer and employee and adequate preparation for it. If the operation of the 1915 act had not been postponed, it would have been immediately effective. It would have operated prospectively but not retrospectively. Powers v. St. Paul, 38 Minn. 87, 30 N. W. 433; Birmingham v. Lehigh, etc. Coal Co. (N.J.) 95 Atl. 242. And see cases cited in paragraph 1 preceding. It would not have barred or limited a remedy upon a cause of action accrued. The basis of the claim that it was intended to operate retrospectively is that the postponement evidences the legislative intent to that effect, the purpose being to enable those whose causes of action had accrued to present them in the interval. There is no other evidence of such intent. [25] The argument is legitimate, but there were wholly adequate reasons why the operation of the act should be postponed, though it contained no statute of limitation. The reason of the postponement is sufficiently explained without adverting to the limitation. A change from no express limitation upon the time in which to present a claim for an accrued cause of action to a limitation of 70 days, that is, from April 21 to July 1, would be radical. It would be harsh. It might result in an employee losing his remedy without actual fault. The Workmen's Compensation Act is remedial and liberal and was intended to protect the employee. There was no pressing need for so stringent a limitation upon accrued causes of action. It would at once meet an argument on behalf of the workman that it unconstitutionally deprived him of a fair opportunity to present his claim. We should not ascribe to the legislature an intent to make such limitation. We hold that the act of 1915 is not retrospective.

Our attention is directed in support of the conclusion which we have reached to our prior holdings that the right to compensation is determined by the statute in force at the time of the injury. State v. District Ct. 131 Minn. 96, 154 N. W. 661; State v. District Ct. 132 Minn. 249, 156 N. W. 120. These holdings are not significant upon the question before us. They involve no question of the prospective or retrospective operation of a limitation statute. They involve questions of substantive rights under the compensation acts. We do not forget that a statute of limitation concerns the remedy and not the right.

Judgment reversed.

NOTE.

Workmen's Compensation Act as Retrospective in Operation.

Applying the rule that a statute will be deemed to be prospective in the absence of language clearly indicating a contrary intent. It is held that a workman's compensation act has no application to an injury occurring before the act took effect. Arizona, etc. R. Co. v. Clark, 207 Fed. 817, 125 C. C. A. 305; Moriarty v. Miller, 99 Neb. 14, 157 N. W. 329; Sexton v. Newark Dist. Tel. Co. 84 N. J. L. 85, 86 Atl. 451.

In Salem Hospital v. Olcott, 67 Ore. 448, 136 Pac. 341, it was said: "The act took effect, as already stated, not prior to November 4, 1913, the date of the election at which it was approved by the people. 'June 30th next following the taking effect of this act' cannot mean anything else than June 30, 1914. It is only the workman who sustains personal injury after this last-mentioned date and is otherwise qualified that is entitled to the benefits of the act, and it is only for such workmen that the commission is authorized to provide hospital accommodations under section 23 of the act. Until after June 30, 1914, there cannot be anyone who may enjoy the bounty of the statute."

In State v. District Ct. 128 Minn. 221, 150 N. W. 623, the court said: "We are clear that the statute was intended to apply to relations of employer and employee existing at the time of its passage and continuing thereafter, and we so hold. But this does not render it obnoxious to the constitution, as impairing the obligations of the contract, arising from such relation. As remarked in the Mathison case and held by the courts generally, no person has any vested right to a rule of law or form of procedure, except perhaps when some form of redress permitted by existing law is expressly stipulated for in the contract." But in State v. Creamer, 85 Ohio St. 349, 97 N. E. 602, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 694, it was said: "As to the suggestion that this statute impairs the obligations of contracts it is sufficient to say that it can of course not affect contracts in existence and unexpired at the time it is put into operation by the employer."

An amendment of a workmen's compensation act in a matter of substantive right does not apply to an injury occurring before the amendment became effective. Thus an amendment providing for the maturing of the instalments of compensation and the payment of a lump sum does not apply to a claim pending at the time it was enacted. Texas Employers' Ins. Assoc. v. Bryan (Tex.) 198 S. W. 342; Martin v. Cape, 49 Quebec Super. Ct. 347; Jennings v. Brissette, 25 Quebec K. B. 21. So a provision for notice of injury is substantive, and an amendment relating thereto does not affect a claim under a prior accident. Schmidt v. O. K. Baking Co. 90 Conn. 217, 96 Atl. 963, wherein the court said: "The Act of 1913 was in force when this claimant's injuries were received, when the thirty days provided by it for notice thereof to be given to his employer had run, when notice was in fact given to his employer, and when the attempt to enforce his claim was begun. Whatever right of compensation he might have had thus became fixed, and the extent of it determined, or, rather, the elements to be considered in its determination became fixed. Whatever inchoate right, arising from his injuries, he may have lost by noncompliance with the conditions precedent to a definite and enforceable claim, was then lost. Whatever that loss was, it could not be restored to him by subsequent legislation. Any attempt to do so would be to deprive his employer of a right vested in it under its contract."

Since the claim of a dependent accrues at the death of the workman, an amendment enacted after the injury but before the death applies to such a claim. State v. District Ct. 131 Minn. 96, 154 N. W. 661; State v. District Ct. 132 Minn. 249, 156 N. W. 120. As to the time as of which the fact of dependency is to be determined, see the notes to Lee v. Ship Bessie, Ann. Cas. 1913E 477, and Blanton v. Wheeler, etc. Co. reported post, this volume, at page 747.

An amendment imposing a time limit on proceedings to secure compensation does not apply to a proceeding based on a prior accident. State v. District Ct. (Minn.) 164 N. W. 812; Birmingham v. Lehigh, etc. Coal Co. (N. J.) 95 Atl. 242; Baur v. Essex County, 88 N. J. L. 128, 95 Atl. 627. And see the reported case. In the case first cited it was said: "Relator asks us to adopt the rule that the holders of claims accruing prior to the 1915 statute are granted the period fixed by that statute after the statute went into effect in which to present their claims. In other words, that the time which elapsed before the statute became operative is disregarded and the cause of action is to be deemed to have accrued at the time the limitation statute became effective. This rule has been adopted by creditable authority. The fact is, a new statute of limitation enacted in general terms, applied literally, would often bar existing rights of action without a fair chance to present them. Such a result would often be harsh and would sometimes render the statute unconstitutional. To avoid such a result and to give the statute a construction that will enable it to stand, courts have adopted rules of construction which in fact modify the literal meaning of the statute. The rules of construction adopted by different courts are not harmonious. One rule is to construe the statute as applying only to causes of action arising after its passage, unless a contrary intent is made to appear. A second rule is to construe the statute as applying only to such existing actions as have already run a portion of the statutory time but which still have a reasonable time left for prosecution before the statutory time expires. A third rule is to construe the statute as affecting existing causes of action but as commencing to run at the time when the statute takes effect, so that pre-existing causes of action not already barred are treated as if accruing at the time of the enactment of the new statute. The last rule is that adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States. Lewis v. Lewis, 7 How. 776, 12 U. S. (L. ed.) 909; Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 737. See also 1 Wood, Limitations (4th ed.) p. 76; 25 Cyc. 994. . . . The first rule is, however, the rule adopted in this state. State v. General Acc. F. etc. Assur. Corp. 134 Minn. 21, 158 N. W. 715, and cases there cited."

In Texas Employers' Ins. Assoc. v. Bryan (Tex.) 198 S. W. 342, it was held that an amendment creating a new tribunal did not divest jurisdiction of a pending proceeding.

An amendment as to a matter of procedure such as the mode of review applies to a pending proceeding. People v. McGoorty, 270 Ill. 610, 110 N. E. 791.

v.

WILKINSON.

Rhode Island Supreme Court—July 6, 1916.

39 R. I. 447; 98 Atl. 103.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Procedure — Review of Facts.

On appeal from a judgment dismissing the petition for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Laws 1911-12, c. 831), where the trial justice made no findings of fact upon the evidence adduced, the supreme court has jurisdiction only to determine the proposition of law on which dismissal was had, and cannot determine the facts.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916B 475; Ann. Cas. 1918B 647.

Scope of Act — Injury Received in Another Jurisdiction.

A carpenter hired in the state of Rhode Island, and while engaged in the master's work in the state of Connecticut, was injured. He sought recovery under Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Laws 1911-12, c. 831). Article 2, § 21, declares that an employee shall, after injury, at reasonable times during the continuance of his disability, if requested by his employer, submit himself to an examination by a physician or surgeon authorized to practice medicine under the laws of the state, and declares that, if the employee refuses to submit to such examination, his right of compensation shall be suspended, and compensation during the period of suspension shall be forfeited. Article 2, § 1, in broad terms gives employees compensation for personal injuries by accident arising out of and in the due course of employment, while article 3, § 16, declares that proceedings shall be brought either in the county where the employer or employee lives or has his usual place of business, and that changes of venue may be granted. Pub. Laws 1915, c. 1268, provides for a report of injuries. It is held that, as the act was obviously intended to furnish a comprehensive scheme for the compensation of injured employees, it governed injuries received by the employee, hired in the state, while at work for the master without the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Providence and Bristol counties: TANNER, Judge.

Petition for compensation under workmen's compensation act. William T. Grinnell, petitioner, and Edward Wilkinson, respondent. Judgment for respondent. Petitioner appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

George A. Breaden and Edward W. Bradford for appellant.

Ernest P. B. Atwood for appellee.

[447] PARKHURST, J.—This is a petition for compensation under Public Laws, Chap. 831 (1912), commonly known as the "Workmen's Compensation Act." The petitioner alleges and the answer admits that the parties were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The petitioner was employed by respondent as a carpenter and his employment commenced at Providence, in the course [448] whereof he was directed by his employer to go without the State, to New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, to complete work already commenced by him at Providence. While so engaged at New Haven he claimed to have received a splinter in his finger, on the 20th day of May, 1915, and that as a result of receiving said splinter in the middle finger of his right hand, blood poisoning set in from which he has never recovered. The petitioner claims that he personally brought the attention of his employer to his injury at the hospital, within a period of thirty days from the occurrence of the accident. The petition was heard before the Presiding Justice of the Superior Court at Providence and denied for the reason substantially that the statute does not apply because the injury was received outside the state. The matter is before this court on an appeal duly taken by the petitioner from the decision of the Presiding Justice.

The question to be decided is whether our statute gives to an employee whose contract of service is within its scope the right to recover compensation for injuries resulting from an accident in the State of Connecticut.

The petitioner in his reasons of appeal says that the decree appealed from "is against the evidence and the weight thereof." But the Presiding Justice, ruling as above against the petitioner and dismissing the petition solely on the point of law stated, made no findings of fact upon the evidence adduced before him; this court therefore has before it upon this appeal only the question of law involved in the decision above referred to; it has no jurisdiction under the act to try and determine the facts of the case. Petitioner's counsel offered no argument upon this point; the argument on this point on behalf of the respondent by his counsel is disregarded for the reasons stated.

Since acts relating to workmen's compensation are of comparatively recent date in this country, the precise question raised in this case has been presented to the courts [449] of this country in comparatively few instances, and quite recently.

The Presiding Justice in his rescript dismissing this petition cites only four cases, viz.: In re Gould, 215 Mass. 480, Ann. Cas. 1914D 372, 102 N. E. 693; Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620; Hotez v. Marine Co. 144 N. Y. S. 355, and Tomalin v. Pearson, 100 L. T. N. S. 685, also found in 2 B. W. C. C. 1. Of these cases Johnson v. Nelson is a Minnesota case decided January 8, 1915, and simply holds, substantially, that the plaintiff was an employee whose contract of service related only to work in Wisconsin and was carried out in that state where he was injured, and that both he and his employer were subject to the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act of Wisconsin, and that his right of recovery was governed thereby; that the sole remedy of the plaintiff was under the Wisconsin Act, and that he could not recover in Minnesota. This case has no bearing upon the question here under consideration.

The case of Hotez v. International Mercantile Marine Co. 83 Misc. 25, 144 N. Y. S. 355 (1913), was for a marine tort where the complainant charged negligence attempted to be imputed to the owner of a vessel through a subordinate officer. The case was in tort for negligence, and it was held that the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York did not cover the case of torts committed without the State, and that the action could not be maintained as a common law action under the evidence. This case has no application to the case at bar.

The case of Tomalin v. Pearson, 100 L. T. N. S. 685, 2 B. W. C. C. 1, in the court of appeal for England relates to the English Workmen's Compensation Act, and holds that an employee injured in work done at Malta under contract with a British employer has no right of recovery, under the English Act, which by its terms as interpreted by the English Court covers only injuries received within the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. This construction is based principally upon the fact that there is no express language in the act to cover injuries suffered outside the United Kingdom, except in case of a limited class of seamen; [450] and it appears to be held that this express extension to a limited class of seamen is evidence of an intention on the part of Parliament to limit the effect of the act otherwise as above stated. See also Hicks v. Maxton, 1 B. W. C. C. 150; Schwartz v. India Rubber, etc. Co. [1912] 2 K. B. 299, where the English Act is held not to apply to foreign injuries.

The leading case in this country up to 1913 was In re Gould, 215 Mass. 480, Ann. Cas. 1914D 372, 102 N. E. 693, decided September 12, 1913, and it was doubtless upon this authority that the Presiding Justice relied in his decision, and he is, at first sight, apparently supported thereby. Since that time, however, certain other cases have been decided which in the opinion of this court more closely apply to our act and which we shall later discuss.

Gould's case, supra, was a petition under the Massachusetts Act; the petitioner was a citizen resident of Massachusetts and made a contract of service with a Massachusetts corporation and accepted the benefits of the act. "In the course of his employment he received the injury out of which the claim arises in the State of New York. He was principally employed in Massachusetts, but at times incidentally worked in New York and other States." After discussing certain incidental questions of practice which are not here material, the court proceeds to discuss the construction of the act, and while conceding that the Legislature has power if it sees fit to give the act such scope as to cover injuries received outside the State, finds no express words giving it such scope, which is deemed to be significant; and then proceeds to examine its provisions in detail to see whether there is any intent to be gathered therefrom to make the act apply to such injuries. At page 484, the court says:

"A consideration of the act in detail fails to disclose any plain intent to that end. On the contrary, several provisions indicate solely intrastate operation. Part II, § 19, provides that the employee who has received an injury shall submit himself on request to an examination 'by a physician or surgeon authorized to practice medicine under the laws of the Commonwealth.' It hardly can be inferred from this [451] language that the Legislature intended that physicians or surgeons from Massachusetts should journey to the place of injury, or that those authorized to practice under the laws of other states should make the examination. Part III of the act, which relates to procedure, and which as has been pointed out creates a wholly new method of procedure, deals only with boards and courts within this Commonwealth. No provision is made for enforcing rights as to injuries occurring outside the State. Part III, § 7, as amended by St. 1912, c. 571, § 12, requires that the hearings of the committee on arbitration 'be held in the city or town where the injury occurred.' Obviously, this cannot relate to injuries received outside this Commonwealth. Section II, as amended by St. 1912, c. 571, § 14, provides that in the event of resort to the court copies of the papers shall be presented 'to the Superior Court for the county in which the injury occurred or for the county of Suffolk.' The words 'for the county of Suffolk' may be presumed to be inserted for convenience, as the offices of the Industrial Accident Board are in Suffolk and courts are continually in session in that county, and not in order to make provision for injuries occurring outside the State. Part III, § 18, requires the employer, within forty-eight hours, not counting Sundays and legal holidays, after the accident resulting in personal injury, to make a report 'in writing to the Industrial Accident Board.' Part IV, § 18, authorizes the directors of the Massachusetts Employees' Insurance Association, created by the act, to make and enforce reasonable rules and regulations for the prevention of injuries on the premises of the subscribers, and for this purpose the inspectors of the association shall have free access to all such premises during regular working hours.' This section is in furtherance of that part of the purpose of the act as set forth in its title for the prevention of industrial injuries. But it cannot be operative outside of Massachusetts. . . ."

From these various provisions of the Massachusetts Act the court finds an intent to confine the operation of the act to [452] accidental injuries happening in the State, and that it is not applicable to injuries arising out of the State. On page 488, the court says: "If employees and employers from different States carry their domiciliary personal injury law with them into other jurisdictions, confusion would ensue in the administration of the law, and at least the appearance of inequality among those working under similar conditions. If such a result had been intended by the General Court it cannot be doubted that it would have been disclosed in unambiguous words."

These remarks do not seem to be applicable to the case before the court, but seem to be used arguendo, in the general discussion of the scope and intent of such Acts generally. In this State we have found no difficulty such as that last referred to in the administration of the law; for in the case of Pendar v. H. & B. American Mach. Co. 35 R. I. 321 (1913) 87 Atl. 1, L.R.A.1916A 428, a case of an injury which occurred in Massachusetts to a citizen of Rhode Island who was employed in Massachusetts by a corporation which had taken the benefit of the act in that State we held that: "Where an accident occurred in a foreign jurisdiction, under whose laws plaintiff waived his right to bring a common law action to recover by failing to give notice in writing to his employer at the time of the hiring that he claimed his right to bring such action, plaintiff cannot bring in this State an action at common law to recover for the injury." See also Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620 (1915); Albanese v. Stewart, 78 Misc. 581, 138 N. Y. S. 942; Schweitzer v. Hamburg-Amerikanische, etc. 149 App. Div. 900, 134 N. Y. S. 812; Schweitzer v. Hamburg-Amerikanische, etc. 78 Misc. 448, 138 N. Y. S. 944.

Returning now to the specific provisions of the Massachusetts Act above referred to in the quotation from Gould's case, supra, upon which the court principally relies to support its finding that the Massachusetts Act was intended to apply solely to injuries received within that State, we find only two of these provisions which are the same in substance as are certain provisions of the act of this State. The first of these is the provision that the employee "shall, [453] after an injury, at reasonable times during the continuance of his disability, if so requested by his employer, submit himself to an examination by a physician or surgeon authorized to practice medicine under the laws of the State," etc. (Pub. Laws 1912, Chap. 831, Art. II, § 21, p. 436.)

We do not find that this provision is important in determining the intent of our law, bearing in mind at all times that our law nowhere in terms excludes the consideration of injuries occurring out of the State, but in broad and general terms gives to the employee compensation for "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment." (Art. II, § 1.) The provision for examination by a physician or surgeon is for the benefit and protection of the employer, and the act further provides: "If such employee refuses to submit himself for any examination provided for in this act, or in any way obstructs any such examination, his rights to compensation shall be suspended and his compensation during such period of suspension may be forfeited." The provisions here referred to are general and apply to any time after the injury, during the pendency of proceedings, and during the operation of the decree, "during the continuance of his disability." It is not impossible for such examination to be made, at the request of the employer, even in another State; it will probably happen in most cases that a resident of this State injured elsewhere will come home for treatment and for the prosecution of his remedy under the law, and will be subject to examination here. At all events when the case arises it will be disposed of according to the act; and we do not propose further to discuss this provision until it shall be necessary, except to repeat that in our opinion it is not of importance in determining the general intent of the act. (See Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392, where there is a similar provision in the law; but no inference of intent to confine the act to injuries arising in the State is drawn.)

The next provisions of the Massachusetts Act, referred to in Gould's case, supra, relate to procedure, requiring that [454] hearing "be held in the city or town where the injury occurred;" that papers shall be presented "to the Superior Court for the county in which the injury occurred," etc. These provisions in our opinion furnish the best ground in support of the decision in Gould's case; there are no such provisions in the Rhode Island Act, which provides (Art. III, § 16, p. 444). "Sec. 16. Proceedings shall be brought either in the county where the accident occurred or in the county where the employer or employee lives or has a usual place of business. The court where any proceedings is brought shall have power to grant a change of venue." By the general provisions of the act original jurisdiction of these proceedings is vested in the Superior Court. From the provisions last quoted it will be seen that there is no difficulty about the jurisdiction, and it would almost seem that the General Assembly in making this provision had taken pains to provide for jurisdiction in cases where the injury occurred out of the State. In our opinion no restriction of the scope of the act is to be found in this regard.

The provision regarding reports of injuries is found in Public Laws, January, 1915, Chapter 1268, p. 261, et seq., and in some respects is similar to the provision of the Massachusetts Act referred to in Gould's case, supra. We do not regard it as of the slightest importance in determining the construction and scope of the act as a whole. The other provisions referred to in Gould's case are not found in our act. We do not regard the decision in Gould's case as a precedent which we should follow, partly because of the differences between the act there discussed and our act, as above shown; partly because we do not agree with certain reasoning therein set forth. We prefer the broader view set forth in certain cases hereafter cited from Connecticut, New Jersey and New York.

The Workmen's Compensation Act of Connecticut (Laws of 1913, c. 138 of Public Acts; see also 2 Bradbury's Workman's Compensation, p. 1144) in its general purpose, [455] scope and provisions, with minor differences in details, is very similar to the Rhode Island Act. The same question here involved arose under the act and was decided in June, 1915, in the case of Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 372, L.R.A. 1916A 436. The case was a proceeding for compensation from the defendant, a Connecticut corporation, for the death of an employee, a citizen of Connecticut, who was in the employ of the defendant on a towboat and whose death occurred by drowning in Raritan Bay, New Jersey, when the tug on which he was employed foundered. After disposing of certain contentions advanced by defendant that the petitioner's claim was cognizable only in the admiralty courts, or under the Federal Employer's Liability Act, and some points of practice, the court in its opinion says (p. 374): "We come then to the next question, whether our compensation act provides for compensation for injuries received outside our State and arising out of and in the course of the employment. The respondent insists that our act has no extraterritorial effect. That is not the precise question to be determined, but, rather, whether our act provides for compensation arising out of a contract of employment authorized by our act, for injuries suffered without our jurisdiction. If our act authorizes such a contract, recovery may be had; otherwise, not.

"Unless the intention to have a statute operate beyond the limits of a State is clearly expressed or reasonably to be inferred from the language of the act, or from its purpose, subject-matter, or history, the presumption is that the statute is intended to have no extraterritorial effect. A like presumption should control the operation of a contract based upon a statutory authority.

"We find no clearly expressed intention in our act that the contract authorized should operate without the State. If found in the act, it must be found as an inference reasonably to be inferred from the language of the act, read in the light of its purpose, subject-matter, and history. In our search for such an intention it is all important that we do [456] not forget the remedial character of the act, and that we construe its provisions broadly and liberally 'in order to effectuate its purpose.' Hotel Bond Co.'s Appeal, 89 Conn. 143, 93 Atl. 245.

"The remedy provided by our compensation act is substitutionary in character, furnishing what was purposed to be a more humanitarian and economical system as a substitute for one deemed wasteful to industrial enterprises and commerce, and unfair to employees. Its intent was to afford its protection to all Connecticut employers and employees who might voluntarily choose to make its provision for compensation for injury a part of their contracts of employment. It assumed that accident is incident to employment, and purposes to charge its cost in the case of every injury not caused by the wilful and serious misconduct or intoxication of the injured employee to the industry in which it occurred. It intended that the employee should know what compensation he or his dependents would receive in the event of injury, and that payment should be made speedily by a procedure at once simple and inexpensive. It intended that the employer should know his liability in this regard, and so might include it among the items charged to operation. If our act intends its contracts of employment to include compensation for injuries occurring only within our jurisdiction it manifestly defeats its own ends. In that case the employer may not charge to the industry the compensation for injuries occurring without the State, and the employee or his dependents may not collect the same. Neither employer nor employee can know what portion of this period of employment will be subject to the provisions of the act, and no provision for insurance of this liability will be practically possible, since it may not ordinarily be known what part of the service will be in and what part out of the State, or in what jurisdiction the service will be performed, in industries and commercial enterprises engaged in intrastate and interstate employment. The State boundary is not the limit of very many businesses. To subject [457] them to the laws of the many jurisdictions in which they may be engaged will be especially burdensome to them, and involve them probably in greater expense and liability and far greater difficulties than under the old system. Equally hard will it prove to the employee since he must pursue his remedy in the State of the accident, or the federal court applying that State's law, and thus he may be brought under any one of many different compensation acts, with whose provisions he cannot hope to be familiar, some acts contractual in character, some compulsory, some optional, and some ex delicto, and he may find he has forfeited the benefit of the foreign act through failure to comply with its provisions. A reading of the several acts now in force convinces us that these difficulties are not imaginative, but imminent actualities.

"Is it reasonable to infer that our legislature, inaugurating a new system, based upon humanitarian and economical considerations, should intentionally frustrate the object of the new system, and cast a multitude of employers and employees into a maelstrom of trouble, uncertainty, and liability? On the other hand, is it not reasonable to infer that the Legislature, having bottomed the right to compensation upon contract, deemed unimportant the place of injury, since it must be presumed to have known that it, and not the place of injury, would govern the recovery. Such a construction of the act would lift insuperable burdens from industry and commerce and workmen, and give to each his course and the ascertained fruits of the contract of his will. Whether the contract shall include injuries in a jurisdiction other than where the contract was made is determined by the expressions or implications of each act.

"Section 1, pt. A, of our act recites that, 'in an action to recover damages for personal injury,' certain defenses shall not be available. Here is no limitation to injuries received within the State. We through comity, enforce action for injuries received outside the State when not against our law or public policy. The natural construction of this language makes it include every action wherever it originates.

[458] Section 1, pt. B, recites that when employer and employee have accepted part B, the employer shall not be liable to any action for damages for personal injury sustained by his employee in the course of his employment, but the employer shall pay compensation on account of such injury as provided by the act. Do not the words 'any action' mean what they say? And have we any more right to insert after them 'within the State' than 'within or without the State?' In this section the acceptance of the act is by its express terms a renunciation and waiver of all rights and claims arising out of injuries sustained in the course of the employment, except as specified. It seems to us plain that the rights and claims waived are not merely those arising in Connecticut, but anywhere.

"In Section 8, pt. B, compensation is required to be paid for 'any injury' which incapacitates for more than two weeks. There is no warrant for construing any injury to consist of one arising within the State.

"By Section 20 every employer who has accepted part B 'shall keep a record of such injuries sustained by his employees in the course of their employment . . . and send each week to the commissioner such report of said injuries as the commissioner may require.' It cannot be that the record intended was solely of the injuries happening within the State. Obviously it was intended to embrace all injuries occurring to such employees everywhere; any other construction would do violence to the ordinary meaning of the word used and to the manifest purpose in keeping the record.

"Similarly the notice of injury of Section 21, and the voluntary agreement of Section 22, relate to every injury, and not merely those occurring within the State.

"Under Section 29 any employer may enter into a substitute system of compensation with his employees in lieu of the compensation of the act. The Legislature had the undoubted power to make the substitute system apply to injuries without as well as those within the State. Is it likely that the Legislature intended a substitute system [459] applicable to its employees when employed within the State, and inapplicable when employed elsewhere? How could the employer engaged in intrastate and interstate employment take advantage of the substitute system? If the agreement of this character had to be confined to the injuries received in the State, neither employer nor employee would undertake it. Practically the provision for a substitute system would be nugatory.

"Certain sections of the act are referred to as indicating that the act has relation exclusively to intrastate injuries. Thus Section 7, which requires the employer to furnish medical and surgical aid, and Section 23, which requires the injured employee to submit himself to examination by a reputable physician, are said necessarily to refer to Connecticut practitioners. We see no practical reason why these sections may not refer to the practitioner without the State as well as within it. Unless this limitation be read in the section, the language used does not express the limitation."

The opinion then proceeds to discuss certain questions as to hearings before commissioners and courts, not contained in the Rhode Island Act, which are not material here; and proceeds, page 379:

"In legislative acts inaugurating a new system not infrequently are found contradictory provisions, and it becomes the duty of the court to reconcile them so far as it can. It does this whenever it is possible in such way as to sustain the act and carry out its purposes. This we believe to be our present duty. In a sense the injury may be said to have been sustained in the place of the contract, and if appeal is taken, in cases of injury, occurring without the State, to the county of the contract, the terms of the act will be reasonably satisfied. The precise question we are considering has been the subject of discussion in two cases. One under the New Jersey Act, a contractual optional act very similar to our own, where the trial court, in Deeny v. Wright, etc. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. J. 121, construed the contract [460] under the New Jersey Act as we construe these contracts. The other under the Massachusetts Act, where the Supreme Court construed their act as confined to accidents within the State. In re Gould, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D 372. We must accept the construction accorded the Massachusetts Act by its Supreme Court. It may be well, however, to point out that the court does not state that its act is contractual in character. That, as we have indicated, is of final importance in the conclusion we reach concerning our own act. Then, too, under the Massachusetts Act, the employee is merely the beneficiary under a contract between the employer and the insured; with us the employer and employee enter into a contract relation. In its reference to and comment upon certain sections of their act the court says that there must be found within the act from 'unequivocal language,' or 'plain and unmistakable words,' that the act was intended to relate to injuries without the Commonwealth. We have adopted a broader rule. We read our act in the light of the purpose, subject-matter, and history of the act to determine whether it expressly or by reasonable inference intended to include in its contract injuries without our jurisdiction. This is our ordinary rule in the interpretation of statutes. The Massachusetts court states that: 'The subject of personal injuries received by a workman in the course of his employment is within the control of the sovereign power where the injury occurs.'

"And it argues that, if the act had intended employers and employees from different states to carry their domiciliary personal injury law with them into other jurisdictions, it would have expressed its intent in unambiguous words. This argument concerns a proceeding to enforce an ex delicto claim, not one for compensation by way of contract. It is also argued that, if an act is given extraterritorial force, similar effect must be given to like laws of other States. If contracts of employment cover compensation for injuries outside the State, recovery for these will be governed by the usual rules for the construction and enforcement of all [461] contracts. We should give similar effect to contracts of like character to those before us, though made under a compensation act of another jurisdiction, provided they did not conflict with our law or public policy, and the machinery provided for the ascertainment and collection of the compensation could be used in our jurisdiction.

"Where, as with us, the determination of the award is committed to a board or commission under a specified procedure, there will be serious obstacles to the enforcement of the contract in a foreign jurisdiction. Bradbury's Workman's Compensation Law (Ed. 1914) p. 52. If it should be necessary to so rule, no hardship would result. The parties in interest would be relegated to the place where they had elected to make their contract and no questions of conflict of laws could arise. At the base of this question is the character of the compensation. Mr. Bradbury, repudi-ating his earlier view, stoutly maintains that, if the act be contractual, the contracts arising will, unless a contrary intent appears, be found to cover injuries without as well as within the State. We think his later conclusion sound and one which will prove beneficial alike to employer and employee."

Also in June, 1915, the Supreme Court of New Jersey passed upon the question whether the act of that state applies where the accident occurs in another state, in the case of Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392. In this case the petitioner was employed in New Jersey by the defendant, a New Jersey corporation, as a brakeman on a train which went into Pennsylvania, and was injured in Pennsylvania; his wages were paid in New Jersey; it was held that his contract of service was a New Jersey contract; both parties were subject to the New Jersey Act. It was held that the act covered the case, and the petitioner could maintain his proceeding. The New Jersey Act is, in its general features and scope very similar to the Connecticut and Rhode Island Acts; the provision requiring the employee to submit to medical examination in the state by a physician authorized [462] to practice medicine in the state is almost the same in essential terms as in the Rhode Island, and differs lightly from the Connecticut Act. (See Laws of New Jersey, 1911, Chap. 95, § 17, p. 141.) After disposing of certain preliminary questions and deciding that the liability of the employer under the act was contractual, and discussing a certain previous decision not directly in point, the court said, page 393: "We are now dealing with the simpler question, whether a New Jersey court will enforce a New Jersey contract, according to the terms of a New Jersey statute. The question hardly calls for an answer. The place where the accident occurs is of no more relevance than is the place of accident to the assured, in an action on a contract of accident insurance, or the place of the death of the assured in an action in a contract of life insurance."

It is notable that these two cases should each have been independently decided by the courts of Connecticut and New Jersey in June, 1915, and have reached the same conclusion upon the same point in the consideration of statutes essentially similar.

The latest case which has come to our attention is Post v. Burger, 216 N. Y. 544, Ann. Cas. 1916B 158, 111 N. E. 351 (January, 1916), a New York case, where the same question arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York. The case follows substantially the same line of argument and arrives at the same conclusion as the cases of Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. supra. and Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. supra, both of which it cites with approval. See also Deeny

v. Wright, etc. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. J. 121; 1 Bradbury Workman's Compensation, p. 50, 52 et seq., cited with approval in the Kennerson case, supra, p. 378, and in the Post case, supra, p. 354.

We are of the opinion that the reasoning of the cases above cited from New York, New Jersey and Connecticut is quite applicable to the case at bar; that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Rhode Island the relation of employer and employee is contractual and the terms of the act are to [463] be read as a part of every contract of service between those subject to its terms; that on principle and in reason and in view of the purpose, scope and character of the act it should be construed and held to include injuries arising out of the State as well as those arising within it; and that the weight of authority upon acts similar to our own gives full support to our conclusion. Gould's case, supra, stands alone so far as any cases have come to our attention and is only deemed to be authoritative on the particular statute therein considered, which we regard as different from ours in many important respects.

The Superior Court was in error in dismissing the petition in this cause for the reasons above set forth; the appeal is sustained, the decree of the Superior Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Superior Court for a trial upon its merits.

NOTE.

Workmen's Compensation Act as Applicable to Injury Received in Another Jurisdiction.

Scope of Note, 625.

In General, 625.

Effect on Common-law Rights, 627.

Scope of Note.

The earlier cases discussing the applicability of a workmen's compensation act to an injury received in another jurisdiction are collated in the notes to In re Gould, Ann. Cas. 1914D 372, and Post v. Burgher, Ann. Cas. 1916B 158. This note reviews the recent cases.

In General.

It is generally held that a compulsory workmen's compensation act has no extra-territorial force, so that under such an act, in case of an injury received outside the jurisdiction where the contract of employment was made, no compensation can be recovered in that jurisdiction. Hicks v. Maxton, 1 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 150; Tomalin v. Pearson Ann. Cas. 1913B.—40.

[1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 61; Schwartz v. Indiana Rubber, etc. Co. [1912] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 299; Vincent v. La Cie De Chenun, etc. 45 Quebec Super. Ct. 353; North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury (Cal.) 162 Pac. 93; Kruse v. Pillsbury (Cal.) 162 Pac. 891, L.R.A.1917E 645. The contrary ruling is however made as to an optional act whose binding force rests in the assent of the parties. Jenkins v. Hogan, 177 App. Div. 36, 163 N. Y. S. 707; Gooding v. Ott, 77 W. Va. 487, 87 S. E. 862, L.R.A.1916D 637; Foughty v. Ott (W. Va.) 92 S. E. 143. And see the reported case.

In Jenkins v. Hogan, supra, it was said: "The claimant's employer, at the time the claimant received the injury, was a stevedore having its office in the city of New York, and engaged in loading and unloading vessels in New York harbor on both the New York and New Jersey shores, and was insured under the compensation statutes of both those states by the insurance carrier herein. The claimant was a longshoreman, and at the time of receiving the disabling injuries, May 15, 1916, was at work unloading a vessel at a pier at West New York, state of New Jersey. His family resided at Hackensack, N. J., where he had voted during the last ten years. The claimant, in order to be conveniently situated as to his work, and because he could not live so far away as Hackensack and follow his occupation, and not intending to return to Hackensack, hired a furnished room in New York city in December, 1915. From this room he went to his work each morning, returning at night, visiting his family every week or two, usually on Sundays, unless then employed. On April 28, 1916, the foreman of his employer came to claimant's said room and engaged him to go to work temporarily at said pier at West New York. Claimant commenced work there the next morning, and continued at work there until he was injured. Following the receiving of the injury he presented a claim for compensation under the New York statute. The insurance carrier appeared at the hearing before the New York state industrial commission and contested the jurisdiction of the commission. The objection of the insurance carrier was overruled and awards made, June 29th, of four weeks' compensation, and July 31st of five weeks' compensation, each at $15 per week. July 18, 1916, an appeal was taken by the employer and insurance carrier from the award first made. . . . The decision in this case as to the liability of the employer under the Workmen's Compensation Law is apparently controlled by that of Post v. Burger, 216 N. Y. 544 [111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B 158], in which case the employer and employee were residents of this state, and the contract of employment was made here, and the employee was injured while working without the state, the court holding that the New York Workmen's Compensation Law applied, and that: "The act, in view of its humane purpose, should be construed to intend that in every case of employment there is a constructive contract between the employer and employee, general in its terms and unlimited as to territory, that the employer shall pay as provided by the act for a disability or the death of the employee as therein stated. The duty under the statute defines the terms of the contract."

In Gooding v. Ott, 77 W. Va. 487, 87 S. E. 862, L.R.A.1916D 637, the court said: "A distinction has been noted in some of the authorities between cases arising under compulsory statutes and those controlled by statutes, as in New Jersey, and we think in this state, which are optional. Where the statute compels submission by the employer and employee, there is no contract, as a general rule, enforceable outside of the state. But where, as in New Jersey and in this state, the statute makes acceptance optional, and the parties freely enter into the contract of employment with reference to the statute, the statute should be read into the contract as an integral part thereof, binding the parties, and enforceable in any jurisdiction the same as any other contract. Such is the holding, and we think the correct holding with reference to workmen's compensation statutes generally, of the New Jersey cases of Deeny v. Wright, etc. Lighterage Co. [36 N. J. L. J. 121]."

In Gardner v. Horseheads Constr. Co. 171 App. Div. 66, 156 N. Y. S. 899, the rule was confined to cases where the employment outside the jurisdiction is a mere incident to an employment therein. It appeared that the injured employee had been for several years in the service of a New York corporation, engaged continuously in jurisdictions other than New York. Being injured in Pennsylvania, compensation was sought in New York. The court said: "In this case the decedent had not been employed by the appellant in the state since 1912. His employment had not been continuous, but had been from time to time for certain jobs which were being performed entirely without the state. The contract of employment did not contemplate any work by him within the state; no such work was done. The statute in question is intended to regulate the relations between the employer and employee in hazardous employments within the state, and to protect the employee within the state from the ordinary risks of the employment, and to charge those risks upon the ultimate consumer. The mere fact that an employee is engaged by a resident of the state to go out of the state for service, and no service in the state is contemplated or done, cannot bring the employment within the act. Ordinarily a statute has no extraterritorial effect. But where the regular service of the employee is being performed in the state, and, as an incident to it, he goes over the state line temporarily, we have held that such temporary absence from the state does not relieve the employer from liability under this statute. The relations between the decedent and the company with reference to the work at Ford City depended upon the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, and the protection there given to the employer and the employee. The mere fact that the contract was made in the state, if it was made in the state, is not material here, when we understand that the contract related solely to work to be performed outside of the state. It follows, therefore, that the employment of the decedent was outside of the state of New York, and that he was not an employee, or engaged in an employment within the state at the time of his death."

In Hagenback v. Leppert (Ind.) 117 N. E. 531, a workman employed in Indiana sought to recover in that state for an injury received in Illinois, under a statute containing the following provision: "Every employer and employee under this act, except as provided in section 19, shall be bound by the provisions of the act whether injury by accident or death resulting from such injury occurs within the state or in some other state or in a foreign country." The court said: "The language of the foregoing sections is clear and definite. The acceptance of the act is not compulsory, but voluntary. There is nothing in the record to indicate or even suggest that either party gave notice of exemption as provided in section 3; and it is therefore conclusively presumed that they accepted the provisions of the act. Having elected to accept the act, every provision thereof became a part of the contract of service. By the terms of the statute the element of tort is eliminated; all remedies at common law or otherwise are excluded, and the employee's right to compensation arises out of the contract. This right, being contractual, accompanies the employee wherever he goes and abides with him until the contract of service is terminated."

It has been held that compensation may be recovered under the workmen's compensation act of the jurisdiction where the injury is received though the contract of employment was made elsewhere. Douthwright v. Champlin, 91 Conn. 524, 100 Atl. 97; Davidheiser v. Hay Foundry, etc. Works, 87 N. J. L. 688, 94 Atl. 309. So in Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620, wherein it appeared that a workman employed in Minnesota was injured in Wisconsin, it was held that recovery should be sought under the Wisconsin act. But in Barnhart v. American Concrete Co. 167 N. Y. S. 475, the court refused to allow compensation to the dependents of a resident of New Jersey, who while in the employ of a New Jersey corporation was killed in New York.

A release given in the jurisdiction where the contract was made bars a proceeding for compensation in the jurisdiction where the injury occurs. Leach v. Mason Val. Mines Co. (Nev.) 161 Pac. 513.

Compensation cannot be allowed under the workmen's compensation act of a jurisdiction if the contract of employment was made and the injuries occurred elsewhere. Lehmann v. Ramo Films, 92 Misc. 418, 155 N. Y. S. 1032; McCarthy v. McAllister Steamboat Co. 94 Misc. 692, 158 N. Y. S. 563. In the case first cited it was said: "The defendant has demurred to this complaint and raises the question of jurisdiction. Section 18 of chapter 95, Laws of 1911, of the state of New Jersey, provides that in case of a dispute or failure to agree upon a claim for compensation between employer and employee either party may submit the claim to the judge of the court of common pleas of such county as would have jurisdiction in a civil case. It will thus be seen that the forum is provided under such law. This action, being a statutory one, must be strictly construed. The mere fact that the complaint alleges that personal service could not be obtained on the defendant is no ground for bringing the action in this court."

Effect on Common-law Rights.

In case a workman injured in one jurisdiction is by his election or by the terms of the workmen's compensation act, precluded from seeking a recovery in that jurisdiction other than as allowed by the act, he may not sue at common law in another jurisdiction to recover for the injury. Piatt v. Swift, 188 Mo. App. 584, 176 S. W. 434; Albanese v. Stewart, 78 Misc. 581, 138 N. Y. S. 942; Wasilewski v. Warner, 87 Misc. 156, 149 N. Y. S. 1035; Verdicchio v. McNab, etc. Mfg. Co. 178 App. Div. 48, 164 N. Y. S. 290; Pendar v. H. & B. American Mach. Co. 35 R. I. 321, 87 Atl. 1, L.R.A.1916A 428. But where a workman is not bound by the compensation act of the jurisdiction where he is injured, or there is no such act in that jurisdiction, he may sue in another jurisdiction though its workmen's compensation act is exclusive. Hamm v. Rockwood Sprinkler Co. 88 N. J. L. 564, 97 Atl. 730; Reynolds v. Day, 79 Wash. 499, 140 Pac. 681, L.R.A.1916A 432. In the case last cited it was said: "The hostility of our law is not directed against the remedial purpose of the common law. It extends that purpose to cases not reached by the common-law action. The rule of the common law is contemned not because it furnishes a remedy, but because the remedy is deemed inadequate. This is far from a declaration of policy which would refuse that remedy where that remedy is the only alternative. There is nothing in the employers' liability act so hostile to the common-law remedy as to deny any remedy where the circumstances will permit the application of no remedy save that of the common law. The assertion that our law declares a policy 'utterly antagonistic and opposed in its every notion and theory to the common law' is more rhetorical than exact. It is true only in a qualified sense. Our law is not opposed to the common-law theory of recompense for injury. It is only opposed to the common-law assumption that a suit at law furnishes adequate recompense. Such a policy is certainly not contrary to the giving of any remedy merely because the only remedy possible is deemed inadequate. Our statute was never intended to declare that, because workmen injured in this state receive compensation without suit, it is against the public policy of this state that workmen injured outside of the state, and where the common law prevails, should receive any compensation."

v.

INDUSTRIAL BOARD OF ILLINOIS ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—June 22, 1916.

274 Ill. 11; 113 N. E. 173.

Constitutional Law — Construction in Favor of Validity.

When the constitutionality of a statute is questioned, it is the duty of the courts, and also a rule of construction, to adopt such construction as will make the statute constitutional if its language will permit.

Presumption of Validity.

There is a strong presumption in favor of the validity and constitutionality of an act of the legislature.

Same.

Courts should not declare acts of the legislature unconstitutional unless satisfied of their unconstitutionality beyond a reasonable doubt.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Election to Accept Act — Time for Election.

Workmen's Compensation Act approved June 28, 1913, and going into effect July 1, 1913 (Laws 1913, p. 337), providing that every employer enumerated in section 3, par. 6, shall be conclusively presumed to have filed notice of election to come under the act unless and until notice to the contrary is filed with the industrial board, and that every employer who has elected to come under the act shall be bound by it until January of the next succeeding year, but may elect to withdraw from the operation of the act after the end of such year by filing notice with the board at least sixty days prior to the end of the year, is held to have given employers not affirmatively filing notice to come under the act at least until November, 1913, to withdraw from the same by giving notice. [See Ann. Cas. 1915C 308; Ann. Cas. 1918B 715.]

Validity of Workmen's Compensation Act.

Such act so construed is not unconstitutional as being, in effect, compulsory by giving an unreasonably short time—from June 28th to July 1st—for election by employers whether or not to come under the act.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916B 1286; Ann. Cas. 1918B 611.]

Statutes — Construction — All Parts Considered.

In arriving at the meaning and intent of a legislative enactment, every part thereof, as well as the title, must be taken into consideration.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Beneficiaries — Nonresident Alien.

The Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913, entitled "An act to promote the general welfare of the people of this state by providing compensation" for workmen, and by section 5 defining the term "employee," as used in the act, to include aliens, applies to nonresident alien dependents claiming as beneficiaries thereunder; for the general welfare of the people of the state might well be promoted by providing compensation for accidental injuries or death suffered by aliens, as well as citizens, in the course of employment within the state, since many alien dependents reside in the state, and the people of the state would be interested in not having aliens, as well as citizens, become charges upon the community by reason of injuries suffered in employment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Review of Facts on Appeal.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913, § 19, par. "f," providing that the decision of the industrial board, acting within its powers, in the absence of fraud, is conclusive, but that the supreme court shall have power to review questions of law involved therein, the decision of the board upon questions of fact is conclusive, if founded upon competent or legal evidence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916B 475; Ann. Cas. 1918B 647.]

Same.

Under this section the circuit court by certiorari may review the decision of the industrial board for errors of law.

Same.

Whether legal evidence is offered to support the decision of the industrial board as shown by the record of proceedings, where such evidence is agreed upon or reported by stenographer, is a question of law reviewable by certiorari.

Dependency — Sufficiency of Evidence.

In proceedings under the 1913 Workmen's Compensation Act evidence is held to support a finding of the board that deceased left parents, to whose support he had within five years contributed.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913E 480; Ann. Cas. 1918B 749.]

Nature and Purpose of Compensation Act.

The general purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 is to provide a method by which injuries received by employees in certain classes of occupations may be quickly adjusted so that something shall be received according to fixed rules for determining compensation in said cases.

Applicability of Rules by Legal Procedure.

A proceeding for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 is not a proceeding at law, and is not altogether governed by the rules of legal proceedings.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915A 741.]

Who Is Workman — Casual Employee — Burden of Proof.

Under such act it is not part of claimant's prima facie case to show he was not within the class of casual employees excepted by section 5, par. 2, thereof; such exception being matter of defense.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 28; Ann. Cas. 1916B 793; Ann. Cas. 1918B 793.]

Objection First Made on Appeal.

Such defense cannot be considered for the first time on appeal.

Notice of Claim — Time for Giving.

In proceedings for compensation under the 1913 Workmen's Compensation Act, evidence of formal notice of claim and correspondence in regard to settlement is held to show claim made within six months after accident as required by section 24; the statute being silent as to how such claim shall be made.

[See Ann. Cas. 1917D 867.]

Evidence Admissible. — Verdict of Coroner's Jury.

In such proceedings the verdict of the coroner's jury impaneled to inquire into the death is proper evidence, since such proceedings take the place of the ordinary action on the case for negligence, in which such evidence was proper.

[See generally, 4 Ann. Cas. 1020; Ann. Cas. 1917B 892.]

Error to Circuit Court, Cook county: TORRISON, Judge.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Casimo Landolina claimant, and Victor Chemical Works, defendant. Claim allowed by Industrial Board. Decision affirmed by Circuit Court. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion.

AFFIRMED.

Lewis A. Stebbins and Burton P. Sears for plaintiff in error.

Craig A. Hood, Simon T. Sutton and Harry A. Goldsmith for defendants in error.

[13] CRAIG, C. J.—August 4, 1914, one of the defendants in error, Casimo Landolina, as administrator of the estate of Filippo Landolina, deceased, filed with the Industrial Board of Illinois his application for adjustment of claim against the plaintiff in error, the Victor Chemical Works, under the Workmen's Compensation act, asserting that his brother, Filippo Landolina, was killed September 6, 1913, in an accident arising out of his employment by the plaintiff in error, and that claim for compensation was made in the plaintiff in error within six months thereafter under the Workmen's Compensation act. An arbitration committee was appointed as provided in the act, a hearing was had, evidence was taken, and said committee on August 26, 1914, entered its award against plaintiff in error and in favor of the defendant in error for $6 per week for four hundred and sixteen weeks from September 6, 1913. Plaintiff in error filed a petition with the Industrial Board to review the award of the arbitrators, and said board on September 12, 1914, confirmed the award. No additional evidence was taken before the Industrial Board. The plaintiff in error thereafter filed its petition for a writ of certiorari with the circuit court of Cook county, and on April 3, 1915, said writ was ordered to issue to said Industrial Board to send up the record of said proceedings, and on April 20, 1915, a certified copy of all proceedings had before said board was returned to the circuit court pursuant to said writ. Thereafter, on November 24, 1915, the attorneys for the administrator moved to quash the writ of certiorari, and upon a hearing on said motion and in inspection by the court of the record of the Industrial Board the court entered an order quashing the writ of certiorari and awarding a procedendo, [14] with costs. On motion of the plaintiff in error the court granted a certificate that the cause was one proper to be reviewed by this court and signed and sealed a bill of exceptions. A writ of error was sued out from this court.

It is assigned as error that the circuit court of Cook county erred in quashing the writ of certiorari and awarding the writ of procedendo for the reasons (1) that the Workmen's Compensation act of 1913 is unconstitutional; (2) that said act of 1913 does not apply to non-resident alien dependents; (3) that the evidence produced before the arbitrators, which was passed upon by the Industrial Board and is contained in the record, did not show that the deceased had contributed to the support of his parents;

(4) that it was not affirmatively shown that the deceased was not a casual employee; and (5) that it was not shown that a proper claim for compensation had been made. These contentions will be considered in their order.

First—As to the constitutionality of the act, this court has held the Workmen's Compensation act of 1911, which is similar to and of the same general effect as the act of 1913, to be constitutional. Deibeikis v. Link-Belt Co. 261 Ill. 454, Ann. Cas. 1915A 241, 104 N. E. 211; Crooks v. Tazewell Coal Co. 263 Ill. 343, Ann. Cas. 1915C 304, 105 N. E. 132; Dietz v. Big Muddy Coal, etc. Co. 263 Ill. 480, 105 N. E. 289. Plaintiff in error claims, however, that the act of 1911 was held constitutional by this court because it was elective and not compulsory; that the act of 1913, while in terms elective, the same as the act of 1911, is in effect compulsory, for the reason that the time given for election by employers as to whether or not they would accept or reject the provisions of said act is unreasonably short. The act was passed by the legislature and was approved by the Governor on June 28, 1913, and went into effect the first day of July following, by reason of the provisions of the constitution. Without discussing the reasoning of this court in the cases above referred to in which the act of 1911 was held constitutional, and assuming, for the sake of argument, that the act of [15] 1911 was held constitutional because it was elective and that the act of 1913 should be held constitutional for the same reason, we think it is true, as contended by plaintiff in error, that where the act is made elective a reasonable time must be given by the act in which to exercise the election. Is the act, however, subject to the objection made?

Section 1 of the act (Laws of 1913, p. 337) provides: "That any employer in this State may elect to provide and pay compensation for accidental injuries sustained by any employee arising out of and in the course of the employment according to the provisions of this act." Paragraph (a) of the same section provides: "Election by an employer to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of this act shall be made by the employer filing notice of such election with the Industrial Board." Paragraph (b) provides: "Every employer within the provisions of this act who has elected to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of this act shall be bound thereby as to all his employees covered by this act until January 1 of the next succeeding year and for terms of each year thereafter: Provided, any such employer may elect not to provide and pay the compensation herein provided for accidents resulting in either injury or death and occurring after the expiration of any such calendar year by filing notice of such election with the Industrial Board at least sixty days prior to the expiration of any such calendar year, and by posting such notice at a conspicuous place in the plant, shop, office, room, or place where such employee is employed, or by personal service, in written or printed form, upon such employee, at least sixty days prior to the expiration of any such calendar year." Section 2 provides: "Every employer enumerated in section 3, paragraph (b), shall be conclusively presumed to have filed notice of his election as provided in section 1, paragraph (a), and to have elected to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of this act, unless and until notice in writing [16] of his election to the contrary is filed with the Industrial Board and unless and until the employer shall either furnish to his employee personally or post at a conspicuous place in the plant, shop, office, room or place where such employee is to be employed, a copy of said notice of election not to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of this act; which notice of non-election if filed and posted as herein provided, shall be effective until withdrawn; and such notice of non-election may be withdrawn as provided in this act."

It is the contention of counsel that plaintiff in error not having taken affirmatively action by filing a rejection of the act with the Industrial Board before July 1, 1913, was by the express terms of section 2 of the act conclusively presumed to have elected to have accepted the same and was bound thereby and could not escape from its terms until January 1, 1914, and then only by filing a notice of rejection by November 1, 1913. Before said date the accident from which this case arose occurred, September 6, 1913, at a time, therefore, before plaintiff in error could possibly have rejected the act and at a time when it had been arbitrarily forced into the position of having elected to accept the same. We do not so understand the meaning and intent of this act. When the constitutionality of a statute is questioned it is the duty of the courts, and also a rule of construction, to adopt such construction as will make the statute constitutional if its language will permit. There is a strong presumption in favor of the validity and constitutionality of an act, and courts should not declare acts of the legislature unconstitutional unless satisfied of their unconstitutionality beyond a reasonable doubt.

The main fault found with the act is section 2 above set out. The act was passed and went into effect on July 1, 1913. Either employers or employees could elect not to come within the provisions of the act. In the first sentence of the first section it is provided that any employer [17] may elect to provide and pay compensation, etc., according to the provisions of the act, and paragraph (a) following, provides that such election "shall be made by the employer filing notice of such election with the Industrial Board." So far there is required an affirmative action on his part. Paragraph (b) of section 1, immediately following paragraph (a) above set out, provides that "every employer within the provisions of this act who has elected to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of this act shall be bound," etc., until January 1 of the next succeeding year. Undoubtedly this provision would apply to all employers who had actually filed notice with the Industrial Board of their election to be bound by the act. Section 2 provides that every employer "shall be conclusively presumed to have filed notice of his election as provided in section 1, paragraph (a), and to have elected to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of this act, unless and until notice in writing of his election to the contrary is filed with the Industrial Board," etc. No time is set in this section for filing such notice of election not to be bound by the act, and as far as the provisions of the section are concerned the notice could be given by the employer any time after the act went into effect. The act went into effect July 1, 1913, and no one would be under the act until after that date, hence those employers who would come under the act by virtue of the provisions of section 2 would be under the act from July 1, 1913, to some date subsequent to July 1, 1913, when they could give notice of their election not to be bound thereby. Such employers had some period within which to file notice not to be bound by the terms of the act. There is a distinction between those employers mentioned in paragraph (b) of section 1 who affirmatively file notice with the Industrial Board of their election to come within the act, and those employers mentioned in section 2 who are presumed to have filed notice of their election to come within the act and hence are [18] within the act unless and until notice in writing of an election to the contrary is filed with the Industrial Board. The former are only allowed to withdraw from the provisions of the act by filing notice sixty days before the expiration of a calendar year. The latter could file notice to the contrary at least prior to November 1, 1913.

Paragraph (b) of section 1 provides that every employer who has elected to come within the act shall be bound until January 1 of the next succeeding year and for terms of every year thereafter. We think that it was not the intention of the legislature to permit an employer who has either affirmatively filed his notice to come within the act or as to whom the act has become self-executing by reason of the provisions of section 2, to file the notice of withdrawal with the Industrial

Board at any time in any year thereafter. We think, however, that any employer who had actually filed notice of his election to come within the provisions of the act could only withdraw from the same by filing a notice sixty days before the first of January in some succeeding year, and that any employer to whom the act was self-executing, as mentioned in section 2, would only be under the act, after it went into effect in July 1, 1913, until such employer filed a notice of his election to the contrary, and such employer would have up to sixty days prior to January 1, 1914, to give such notice and withdraw from the act. After that, the provision of the act providing for yearly terms would operate uniformly on all employers and require all of them to give sixty days' notice of withdrawal from the act prior to the first of January of some succeeding year. It is a familiar maxim that ignorance of the law excuses no one, and in this case plaintiff in error had over a month in which to learn the law and to file notice of its election prior to the accident, and it has made no claim that this was not sufficient time. As we do not think the act was mandatory or compulsory any more than the act of 1911, its constitutionality must be considered [19] as settled by the cases heretofore cited in which the act of 1911 was construed.

Second.—Plaintiff in error contends, conceding the parents of the deceased were dependent upon him for support, that the said parents were aliens and nonresidents of the United States and were citizens of and residing in Italy, and the act has no application to nonresident alien dependents claiming as beneficiaries under the act. It is conceded that it is within the power of the legislature to give or not to give nonresident alien dependents the right to take as beneficiaries under the act, but it is claimed that the act does not give such right. It is first insisted that the title of the act confine its operation to citizens of this State. The act is entitled "An act to promote the general welfare of the people of this State by providing compensation for accidental injuries or death suffered in the course of employment within this State," etc. The case of Dred Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. 393, 15 U. S. (L. ed.) 691, and Boyd v. Nebraska, 143 U. S. 135, 12 S. Ct. 375, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 103, are cited, which held that the words "people of the United States" mean the same thing as "citizens of the United States;" also the case of Matter of Silkman, 84 N. Y. S. 1025, 88 App. Div. 102, in which the court held that the phrase "people of the State of New York" does not include aliens, and intimated that the phrase "people in the State of New York" would so have included them.

In arriving at the meaning and intent of a legislative enactment every part thereof, as well as the title, must be taken into consideration. The words in the title "to promote the general welfare of the people in this State" do not necessarily mean that it is the intent and purpose of the act to limit compensation that may be paid for accidental injuries or death suffered in the course of employment to citizens of the State. The general welfare of the people of the State, or citizens of the State, might well be promoted by providing compensation for accidental injuries or death suffered by aliens, as well as citizens, in the course [20] of employment within the State. There are many alien employees within the State to whom the act should apply, and we can perceive no reason why it should not apply to them as well as to citizens. In many cases those depending upon them reside within the State, and the people or citizens of the State would be interested in not having aliens, as well as citizens, become charges upon the community by reason of injuries received in the course of employment. Moreover, the title, alone, is not the sole criterion but the terms of the act itself must be considered. Section 5 provides that the term "employee," as used in the act, shall be construed to mean "every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, including aliens, and minors who are legally permitted to work under the laws of the State, who, for the purpose of this act, shall be considered the same and have the same power to contract, receive payments and give quittances therefor, as adult employees, but not including any person whose employment is but casual or who is not engaged in the usual course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer: Provided, that employees shall not be included within the provisions of this act when excluded by the laws of the United States relating to liability of employers to their employees for personal injuries where such laws are held to be exclusive." By the terms of the act we think that alien dependents are included.

In Mulhall v. Fallon, 176 Mass. 266, 57 N. E. 386, 79 Am. St. Rep. 309, 54 L.R.A. 934, where this same question was raised, it was held that a mother who had never been a resident of the State of Massachusetts and who was a citizen and resident of Ireland was entitled to recover in the courts of Massachusetts in an action for negligence causing the death of her son. In that case it was said: "One or two cases may be found where a general grant of a right of action for wrongfully causing death has been held to confer no rights upon nonresident aliens. (Deni v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. St. 525, 59 [21] Am. St. Rep. 676, 37 Atl. 558; Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164; but compare Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 108 Pa. St. 250, 56 Am. Rep. 200.) On the other hand, in several States the right of the non-resident to sue is treated as too clear to need extended argument. (Philpott v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 85 Mo. 164; Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Higgins, 85 Tenn. 620, 4 S. W. 47; Augusta R. Co. v. Glover, 92 Ga. 132, 18 S. E. 406; Luke v. Calhoun County, 52 Ala. 115.) . . . In all cases the statute has the interest of the employees in mind. It is on their account that an action is given to the widow or next of kin. . . . We cannot think that workmen were intended to be less protected if their mothers happened to live abroad or less protected against sudden than against lingering death. In view of the very large amount of foreign labor employed in this State we cannot believe that so large an exception was silently left to be read in."

In the case of Guianos v. De Camp Coal Min. Co. 242 Ill. 278, 89 N. E. 1003, this court held as to the right of alien beneficiaries to recover, as follows: "It is further insisted that the deceased was an alien,—a citizen of Greece,—and that this suit is for the benefit of his parents, brothers and sisters, who are not citizens of this country but reside in Greece, and that there should be no recovery under our statute in favor of these nonresident aliens. Counsel admits that in Kellyville Coal Co. v. Petraytis, 195 Ill. 215, 63 N. E. 94, 88 Am. St. Rep. 191, this court, after reviewing the authorities, held the contrary, but insist that we should reverse that ruling because of the recent ruling of the United States Supreme Court in Maiorano v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 213 U. S. 268, 29 S. Ct. 424, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 792. In that case the deceased was killed in Pennsylvania, and the Supreme Court of that State has consistently held that under its statute non-resident alien relatives could not recover. The United States Supreme Court, in deciding that case, followed the general rule of that court that the [22] construction of a State statute by the highest court of such State must be accepted by the United States courts. Manifestly, under that decision, if this case were taken to the United States Supreme Court that court would follow the ruling of this court on this question." We think it is the plain meaning and intent of the act not to except alien beneficiaries from its provisions.

Third—It is insisted that there is no evidence that the deceased had ever contributed to the support of his parents within four years or that they were beneficiaries under the act. Under paragraph (f) of section 19 of the act the decision of the Industrial Board, acting within its powers, in the absence of fraud, is conclusive. The circuit court may review the decisions of the Industrial Board by certiorari for errors of law, only. Whether legal evidence is offered to support the decision of the Industrial Board as shown by the record of proceedings, where such evidence is agreed upon or preserved by a stenographic report, is a question of law, but if there is competent or legal evidence to support the decision of the Industrial Board it is not within the province of the courts to pass on its sufficiency. We have examined the evidence in the record on this point. The administrator, Casimo Landolina, a brother of the deceased, testified that the father of the deceased was living at Caccamo, Italy, and was sixty-three years of age; that the mother was fifty-four years of age and was living with his father; that there are some younger children, all under twenty years of age, the oldest about seventeen; that the deceased contributed to the support of this family in the old country prior to his death; that the family lived upon a farm of about four acres; that he had seen a receipt for a post-office money order for $40 which the deceased showed to him. Charles Costello testified that he knew the deceased in Italy; that he and the deceased both came from the same province; that he knew him at the time he arrived in this country; that at the request of the deceased [23] he went with him to act as an interpreter, because the deceased could not speak English, and assisted him to get a money order for $40, which he put in a letter addressed to his father, Giovanni Landolina, Caccamo, Italy; that the witness saw him address the envelope, seal it and mail it, and the money order was in it. James Barto testified that he saw the deceased put money in a letter which he sent to his father in Italy; that the witness, at the request of the deceased, wrote a return address on the envelope. There was other evidence, consisting of declarations of the deceased at the time he sent the money to his father and his purpose in sending it, and that his parents depended upon him for support, which was objected to and which objection should have been sustained. The arbitration committee received this evidence, and the chairman stated that the committee was not bound by the rules of evidence. The arbitration committee is allowed by the law to inspect premises, books and records and make such inquiries and investigations as it shall deem necessary. The committee reports to the Industrial Board, and either party desiring a review of the report and decision of the arbitrators may file either an agreed statement of facts or a correct stenographic report of the proceedings. In this case the arbitrators heard witnesses, which was within their power, but it requires no argument to show that when the arbitrators hear evidence there must be evidence that is competent and legal, as tested by the usual rules for producing evidence in any legal proceeding, to sustain their finding, otherwise they could make an award on other incompetent evidence or on no evidence at all, and this was not contemplated by the law. Such evidence must also be preserved and incorporated into the record of the proceedings, as provided in the act and as above pointed out. If books and records are examined, the contents relied upon must be competent and properly authenticated and must be set out in the record of the proceedings. While a view or inspection of premises might be [24] helpful to the arbitrators in making a decision, there should be evidence of the fact, unless all parties agreed that the arbitrators might decide a claim before them from such view or inspection, alone. In short, there must be some competent evidence to sustain the decision of the arbitrators and of the Industrial Board, and if founded on hearsay or other improper or insufficient evidence it is the duty of the circuit court, on certiorari, to remand the proceeding to the Industrial Board for proper proceedings. We think, however, there was sufficient competent evidence to sustain the finding of the Industrial Board that the deceased left parents and that he had within five years contributed to their support.

Fourth—It is claimed that it was not shown by the plaintiff in error that the deceased was not a casual employee. The second paragraph of section 5 of the act defines as employees, in addition to those in the preceding paragraph, every person in the service of another, etc., "but not including any person whose employment is but casual or who is not engaged in the usual course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer." In considering this question recourse must be had to the provisions of the act and its general intent and purpose. Section 15 of the act provides that the Industrial Board, which is created by section 13, shall have jurisdiction over the operation and administration of the act. Section 16 provides that the board may make rules and orders for carrying out the duties imposed upon it by law, and that the process and procedure before the board shall be as simple and summary as reasonably may be, and that the board, or any member thereof, shall have the power to administer oaths, subpoena and summon witnesses, and to examine and inspect such books, papers, records, places or premises as may relate to questions in dispute. Section 18 provides that "all questions arising under this act, if not settled by agreement of the parties interested therein, shall, except [25] as otherwise provided, be determined by the Industrial Board," and section 19 provides that any disputed questions of law or fact upon which the employer or employee or personal representative cannot agree, shall be determined by the board. Paragraph (a) of the same section provides for the appointment of a committee of arbitration, which was done in this case. Paragraph (b) provides for the hearing by the committee of arbitration and that such committee shall file its decision with the Industrial Board, which shall send to each party a copy thereof, and that either one of the parties, within fifteen days after receiving a copy of such decision, may petition the Industrial Board for a review, and shall within twenty days of filing such decision file with the board either an agreed statement of facts on the hearing before the committee of arbitration or a correct stenographic report of the proceedings of such hearing. Paragraph (c) provides that if a petition for review and agreed statement of facts or stenographic report is filed as provided in the preceding paragraph, the Industrial Board shall promptly review the decision of the committee of arbitration and the facts as they appear from said statement of facts or stenographic report, and shall also, if desired, hear the parties together, with such additional evidence as they may wish to submit, etc.

It will be seen that the general purpose of the act is to provide a method by which injuries received by employees in certain classes of occupations may be quickly adjusted, so that something shall be received according to fixed rules for determining compensation in said cases. It would seem to be the duty of both parties, under the act, either to agree upon a statement of facts or at least to submit all questions of law and fact for determination, and if the employer desires to raise the question as to whether or not the employee is a casual employee and not within the terms of the act he should submit evidence on that question. We have held that a plaintiff relying on a statute for recovery [26] need only negative the exceptions in the enacting clause, and it is for the defendant to show, by way of defense, that the case falls within an exception in some other clause of the statute. (Toledo, etc. R. Co. v. Lavery, 71 Ill. 522, citing 1 Chitty's Pl. 223; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Carter, 20 Ill. 391.) Under this rule, in a suit at law governed by the strict rules of procedure it would be the duty of the defendant to show, by way of defense, that the case fell within an exception. But this is not a proceeding at law and is not altogether governed by the rules of legal proceedings. In suits at law by employees against employers to recover damages for injuries sustained in the course of employment, the employee, as plaintiff, is compelled, under the law and the rules of procedure, to make out a case, and must affirmatively show sufficient to entitle him to recover by reason of some fault or negligence of the employer. Since the enactment of the law in question compensation is to be paid by the employer if the employee is killed in the course of his employment irrespective of the negligence of the employer, and the main thing is to determine the amount of compensation which must be paid. The statute provides that if the parties cannot agree as to the facts of the case it is their duty to bring in all matters of dispute, and under the terms of the act it would seem to be the duty of the employer to allege and prove, as a matter of defense, that the employment of the employee was but casual. We do not think the plaintiff in error can raise this question for the first time on appeal. It was its duty to raise this point before the board of arbitrators or the Industrial Board, and if plaintiff in error relied on such fact as a defense it was its duty to show it. On the hearing before the arbitrators the chairman of the board asked the attorney for plaintiff in error, at the beginning, if there was any dispute as to both the deceased and the employer being under the act, and he replied, "No, there is no dispute as to that."

[27] Fifth—It is claimed that the record fails to show that the claim for compensation was made within six months after the accident, as is provided in section 24 of the act. The proof shows that the accident occurred September 6, 1913. The attorney for the administrator testified that he prepared a written claim for compensation under the act and gave it to a constable to serve on the plaintiff in error on March 5, 1914. He also produced a carbon copy of such written claim, and further testified that the superintendent of the plaintiff in error admitted that the constable had served the notice. This was not denied. The statute provides that no proceedings for compensation under the act shall be maintained unless claim for compensation has been made within six months after the accident. It also appears that the parties had corresponded through their attorneys in endeavoring to make a settlement of the matter. The statute is silent as to how such claim shall be made, and we think the proof sufficiently shows that a claim for compensation was made upon plaintiff in error within six months.

It is also claimed that the verdict of the coroner's jury empaneled to inquire into the death of the deceased was improperly admitted in evidence. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation act take the place of the ordinary action on the case against an employer for damages for causing the death of or injury to an employee. In actions for causing death by negligence we have held such evidence proper. Foster v. Shepherd, 258 Ill. 164, Ann. Cas. 1914B 572, 101 N. E.

411, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167; Devine v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. 270 Ill. 504, Ann. Cas. 1917A 887, 110 N. E. 780, and cases cited.

Perceiving no error sufficient to justify a reversal, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Residence of Beneficiary as Affecting Right to Compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act.

For a discussion of the earlier cases on the effect of the residence of a beneficiary on his right to compensation under the workmen's compensation act, see the note to Krzus v. Crow's Nest Pass Coal Co. Ann. Cas. 1912D 862.

The reported case holds that under the workmen's compensation act of Illinois the beneficiary of one who is killed during the course of his employment may recover for the latter's death although the beneficiary is a nonresident of Illinois. A contrary result has been reached in recent cases under the New Jersey and New York acts. De Biasi v. Normandy Water Co. 228 Fed. 234 (New Jersey act); Gregutis v. Waelark Wire Works, 86 N. J. L. 610, 92 Atl. 354; State Industrial Commission v. McCormick, 167 N. Y. S. 564.

In Gregutis v. Waelark Wire Works, supra, it appeared that one Gregutis, an Italian subject, was killed in New Jersey, while employed by the defendant. He left a father, mother, three sisters and a brother, all residents of Italy. It was held that under the New Jersey workmen's compensation act none of the relatives named could recover for his death. The court said: "The scheme of the act is to give compensation in lieu of damages to certain dependents, and not to next of kin as such. The legislature saw fit, as a matter of public policy, to exclude nonresident aliens from such benefits, and we think that the power of the legislature to give or withhold a right of action in such case, and to declare to whom and in what amount compensation shall be made, cannot be doubted."

In State Industrial Commission v. McCormick, 167 N. Y. S. 564, it was held that under the New York workmen's compensation act the right to compensation of a beneficiary residing in a foreign land was limited to those who, for the period of one year prior to the accident, had been supported in whole or in part by the employee.

STATE EX REL. CITY OF DULUTH

v.

DISTRICT COURT OF ST. LOUIS COUNTY ET AL.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 7, 1916.

134 Minn. 28; 158 N. W. 791.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Persons within Act — Municipal Employee.

A fireman of the city of Duluth was killed while in the performance of his duty. His dependents are entitled to recover under the workmen's compensation act.

[See Ann. Cas. 1917D 4.]

Effect of Receipt of Other Benefits.

The fact that deceased was a member of the Duluth Firemen's Relief Association and that his dependents draw benefits therefrom, does not bar recovery of compensation nor reduce the amount thereof.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Certiorari to District Court, St. Louis county: DANCER, Judge.

Action by Dorothea S. P. Granzow, plaintiff, against City of Duluth, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

John E. Samuelson and Leonard McHugh for relator.

Abbott, McPherran, Lewis & Gilbert for respondents.

[29] HALLAM, J.—1. Frederick E. Granzow, an assistant chief of the fire department of the city of Duluth, was killed while in the discharge of his duty. His widow and ten-year-old daughter commenced proceedings to recover under the compensation act (G. S. 1913, §§ 8195-8231). This case involves the question whether a member of the Duluth fire department is an employee within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We hold that he is, for the same reason which induced us to hold in State v. District Court of St. Louis County, supra, page 26, 158 N. W. 790, that police officers of the city are within the act.

2. One other question is raised here as follows: Deceased was a member of the Duluth Firemen's Relief Association, a voluntary relief association organized to provide for the relief of sick or injured members, and the widows and orphans of deceased members. The association receives its money from three sources: (1) From a tax of one-tenth of one mill; (2) from a portion of the insurance premiums collected in Duluth, which are required by law to be paid to the association, and (3) from the voluntary contributions of its members. Membership in the association is optional with firemen. Only those who are members and who contribute are entitled to benefits for themselves or their families. The widow and daughter now draw benefits from the association.

The receipt of funds from the association does not bar them from receiving benefits under the compensation act, nor does it reduce the amount thereof. The act does not so provide, either expressly or by implication.

The source of revenue of the Relief Association, so far as it depends on the bounty of the state, may be withdrawn at any time Gibbs v. Minneapolis F. Dept. Relief Assoc. 125 Minn. 174, Ann. Cas. 1915C 749, 145 N. W. 1075. So far as it depends on contributions made by the members, it is something the member has purchased for himself with his own funds, and is akin to life and benefit insurance. It is well settled, in death by wrongful [30] act cases, that the fact that the deceased had life insurance does not diminish the amount of damages which his widow and next of kin may recover. 4 Sutherland, Damages (3d ed.) § 1265; Evans v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 133 Minn. 293, 158 N. W. 335; Nashville, etc. R. Co. v. Miller, 120 Ga. 453-455, 47 S. E. 959, 67 L.R.A. 87; 1 Ann. Cas. 210. This is on the principle that where one through his own providence has purchased and maintained insurance on his life, the proceeds thereof should inure to his beneficiaries and not to the one who has caused his death. A similar principle is applicable here. True, under the compensation act there may be recovery, though the death of the employee was not caused by any wrongful act of the employer. At the same time, we are of the opinion that the fireman who joins and contributes to the funds of this association should be held to have purchased the protection which the association affords, for the benefit of himself and his family, and not for the benefit of his employer. See In re Nichols, 217 Mass. 3, 104 N. E. 566, Ann. Cas. 1915C 862.

NOTE.Receipt of Insurance or Other Benefit as Affecting Right to Compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act.

The holding of the reported case, that the receipt of funds from a relief association does not affect the right to recover compensation under the Minnesota workmen's compensation act, rests on the principle that by contributing to the funds of the association a member thereof purchases the right to benefits. The decision in Ross v. Erickson Constr. Co. 89 Wash. 634, 155 Pac. 153, L.R.A.1916F 319, indirectly supports this view. It was held in that case that a recovery under the workmen's compensation act was not a bar to a recovery on an accident insurance policy, the latter right resting on an independent contract.

The English Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 provides that in fixing the amount of the weekly compensation regard shall be had to payments, allowances or benefits which the employee may receive independent of compensation under the act. Thus, where one employed by the civil service commissioners as an attendant at a lunatic asylum, received an injury out of and in the course of his employment which incapacitated him from further work, it was held in Considine v. McInerney, 114 L. T. N. S. 1138, 9 B. W. C. C. 390, that the payment of a gratuity and a pension by the asylum authorities was to be regarded, in a subsequent action under the workmen's compensation act, in fixing the amount of weekly payments. Earl Loreburn said: "The Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 directs the arbitrator that 'in fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to any payment, allowance, or benefit which the workman may receive from the employer during the period of his incapacity.' In the present case the workman receives a pension from his employers, for the asylum board and the treasury have been regarded by both sides as one and the same. He had no legal right to claim it, but he had an expectation practically amounting to a certainty of obtaining it at the age of sixty, and even before sixty if he should get a medical certificate that he was incapable from infirmity of mind or body. He got the certificate and received a pension at the age of forty-eight on a lower scale than he would have received at the age of sixty. It was granted by the treasury under statutory powers. There is no doubt that the incapacity was due to an injury by accident which brought him within the workmen's compensation act. In fixing the amount of the weekly payment which the workman was to receive under that act the arbitrator had regard to this pension. The court of appeal decided that he was not entitled to have regard to it. And that raises the point which we have to settle. With all respect to the court of appeal, I think the arbitrator was right. This payment came from the employer. The employer was not obliged by statute to pay it, and in my opinion it would have made no difference had he been so obliged. It is an error to say that the workman contributed toward the pension. It came wholly out of the employer's pocket. Under this act the employer is the person required to pay compensation (sect. 1), and it is in ease of this burden on the employer that the arbitrator is directed that regard shall be had to any payment, allowance or benefit which the workman may receive from him (sched. 1, 3)."

Where an injured fireman received, under the Provisional Order Confirmation Act, 1891, a weekly pension from the fund toward which he had contributed, it was held that that sum was to be regarded in fixing the amount of the weekly payment under the workmen's compensation act. Watts v. Manchester Corp. (1917) 1 K. B. (Eng.) 791, (1917) W. N. 84, 33 Times L. Rep. 238, 86 L. J. K. B. 669, 116 L. T. N. S. 578, wherein it was said by Warrington, L. J.: "In the year 1902, the applicant became a fireman in the fire brigade of the Manchester corporation. On the 30th Oct. 1915 he met with an 'accident arising out of and in the course of' his employment which caused him to break his thigh, and which has incapacitated him from further service in the fire brigade. At the date of the accident his wages were £2. 14s. a week. He is now earning £1. 5s. a week from another employer. He claims one-half the difference of 14s. 11d. per week. The corporation contend that the pension he receives in consequence of his incapacity should be taken into consideration and offer 8s. a week. The learned county court judge has held that the pension should not be taken into consideration, and has awarded the applicant 14s. 11d. a week. He has further made an alternative award in case he should be held to be wrong in law in excluding the pension from consideration, and in that event he has found that 10s. a week would be the proper amount of his award. The pension scheme is constituted by the corporation under the Police Act, 1890, and the Fire Brigade Superannuation Manchester Order Confirmation Act, 1891. By the fireman's contract of service a deduction of three per cent per annum is made from his wages. A document from the chief accountant of the city treasurer's department that was put in appears to show that the pensions are contributed from three sources: One, dividends on invested capital; two, the three per cent deductions from pay; and, three, a payment by the corporation from the city rate. This corporation contribution forms from seventy to eighty per cent of the whole, and makes good whatever balance may be needed beyond that which is available from items one and two. The learned county court judge attached considerable importance to the fact that a portion of the income was derived from investments. I do not myself attribute importance to this. It seems to me to have arisen when in 1891 the fire brigade was separated from the police for the purpose of superannuation, and the share of the fire brigade in the then investments was adjusted at the sum of £2960: (see the Provisional Order Confirmation Act, art. 1 (2.)). There is nothing to show to what extent these investments were the result of corporation moneys. The pension is clearly a term of his service, and upon superannuation or incapacity the fireman becomes entitled to a pension in accordance with the scale. The applicant contends that it should be disregarded as irrelevant to the compensation under the workmen's compensation act. The corporation contends that some regard should be had to it. Not necessarily for deduction as a concrete figure, but as a relevant fact and within the words of clause 3 of sched. 1. It was argued for the applicant that the case was within the principle of McDermott v. Steamship Tintoretto, 103 L. T. N. S. 769, [1911] A. C. 35, but I do not think it is so. The payments made there under the merchant shipping act were not in respect of the incapacity during the period covered by the compensation act. In this case the payment of the pension falls upon the city rate of the corporation in consequence of the incapacity and during the period in respect of which the compensation is payable from the same source. It is just because otherwise the corporation would be contributing twice at the same time towards the same incapacity that I think regard ought to be had to the pension. The Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 is a general act applicable to the whole community. I regard the Fire Brigade Superannuation Confirmation Act 1891 as one to some extent in pari materia. It is desirable that employers should be encouraged to institute schemes of this kind. If a proper and just regard is not given to the payments made under such a scheme it will discourage their institution. The words of clause 3 of sched. 1 are clearly wide enough to include this pension; it is a 'payment, allowance, or benefit' which the workman receives from the employer during the period of his incapacity, and I see nothing in the dicta or in the case of Considine v. McInerney, 114 L. T. N. S. 1138, (1916) 2 A. C. 162, which oblige me to say that this pension should be wholly disregarded." See also Bullen v. London United Tramways, 121 L. T. J. (Eng.) 415, 8 W. C. C. 103.

Section 30 of the New York Workmen's Compensation Act (Consol. Laws, ch. 67) provides as follows: "No benefits, savings or insurance of the injured employee, independent of the provisions of this chapter, shall be considered in determining the compensation or benefits to be paid under this chapter, except that, in case of the death of an employee of the state, a municipal corporation or any other political subdivision of the state, any benefit payable under a pension system which is not sustained in whole or in part by the contributions of the employee, may be applied toward the payment of the death benefit provided by this chapter."

COX

v.

GEORGE TROLLOPE & SONS

England—Court of Appeal—July 19, 1916.

[1916] 2 K. B. 682.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Average Weekly Earnings — Computation.

That a workman had been in the service of an employer but seven weeks when he was injured and that the service in question was in the winter when shorter hours were worked make it proper to compute his "average weekly earnings" on the average earnings of others in the same employment and not on his actual earnings in that employment.

[See note at end of this case.]

[682] Appeal from an award of the judge of the City of London Court sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

The applicant was employed by the respondents, a firm of builders [683] and contractors, as a scaffolder at a wage of 8½d. an hour. He entered their employ on December 10, 1915, and met with an accident on January 27, 1916, by which he was totally incapacitated. It was admitted that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and the sole question was what was the amount of the compensation to which he was entitled. Owing to absence due to illness and to occasional holidays the period during which he was actually employed by the respondents was seven weeks, and his average weekly earnings during that period amounted to 11. 7s. 8½d. It appeared from the evidence that scaffolders were usually employed for short periods by different employers, but that they could generally obtain employment throughout the whole year. The hours of work were fifty hours per week in the summer as against forty-four hours per week in the winter. The applicant put his wages as a scaffolder for fifty-two weeks at an average of 11. 18s. per week, but in cross-examination he admitted that he would probably lose three weeks during changes or other incidents of employment, and that in that case his average weekly earnings would be 11. 15s. 10d.

The question depended on the construction of Sched. I. pars. 1 (b) and 2 (a), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.¹

[684] The judge of the City of London Court held that it was impracticable within the proviso to par. 2 (a) of the schedule to compute fairly the rate of remuneration of the applicant with reference to his earnings during the seven weeks, having regard to the fact that the average during the twelve months previous to the accident was the dominant principle to be applied, and that the average weekly earnings varied in summer and winter. He therefore awarded compensation at the rate of 17s. 11d. a week by reference to the average weekly earnings of a person in the same grade employed in the same class of employment and in the same district.

The employers appealed.

Ellis Hill for appellants.

Rigby Swift, K.O. and E. F. Lever for respondent.

Mackrell, Maton, Godlee & Quincey, solicitors for appellants.

Leonard Bingham, solicitor for respondent.

[686] LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—The applicant here admittedly met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and was totally incapacitated. The question is, what is the amount to which he is entitled by way of compensation? The workman was a scaffolder, which I suppose is a recognized term for a man who is specially skilled in erecting scaffolds, as distinguished from carpenters or builders. The time during which he is engaged on any particular job will vary with the size of the building, but generally speaking the job does not last long. In the present instance the workman had been employed by the appellants for seven weeks. Those seven weeks were during the winter, when the days were short. The payments to scaffolders are 8½d.

"(1.) The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . .

"(b) Where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity not exceeding fifty per cent of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound.

"(2.) For the purposes of the provisions of this schedule relating to 'earnings' and 'average weekly earnings' of a workman, the following rules shall be observed:—

"(a) average weekly earnings shall be

per hour. The man's earnings would therefore depend entirely upon the number of hours he was at work.

Two views were put before the learned county court judge. One view was that as this man had been engaged by the same employer for seven weeks at the date of the accident, all that had to be done was to add up his total earnings from that employer for the seven weeks and divide by 7 and so get his average weekly earnings under the Act. And it was also said that only where it was impracticable to do that simple addition and division sum any method outside par. 1 (b) of the schedule could be resorted to. It is said, therefore, that the learned county court judge was wrong in saying that it was impracticable to compute the compensation as directed in par. 1 (b), and that he was therefore not at liberty, as he thought he was, to decide the case with reference to par. 2 (a). In my opinion these two paragraphs, difficult as they both are to construe, have been construed by this Court for a number of years now, certainly for more than eight years, in a manner which it is not open for us now to depart from.

The material words of par. 1 (b) are these: [His Lordship read them and continued:] If the schedule had stopped there it would have been a short answer in this case to have said "the workman [687] has been engaged for seven weeks by the same employer, and that is sufficient." But then you have to go to par. 2, which gives certain rules for computing "earnings" and "average weekly earnings." As has been said more than once in this Court, the dominant principle, the dominant rule, in these cases is to be found in the opening words of par. 2 (a): "average weekly earnings" (these are the crucial words) "shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." That cannot, it seems to me, mean that they are to be computed simply by an arithmetical computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated. Provided that where by reason of the shortness of the time during which the workman has been in the employment of his employer, or the casual nature of the employment, or the terms of the employment, it is impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of remuneration, regard may be had to the average weekly amount which, during the twelve months previous to the accident, was being earned by a person in the same grade employed at the same work by the same employer, or, if there is no person so employed, by a person in the same grade employed in the same class of employment and in the same district."

calculation. What you have to do is something much more difficult than the mathematical computation. The mathematical computation is the only thing that has to be made, I agree, if the man has been twelve months with the same employer. There you are told to do the sum without having regard to anything more or less than the earnings during the twelve months; and the average weekly earnings thus arrived at are to be taken as final and conclusive. When, however, the employment is for less than a year the average weekly earnings are to be ascertained or computed "in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." There are several provisos to that, but the only one that is material is in clause (a): "Provided that where by reason of the shortness of the time during which the workman has been in the employment of his employer, or the casual nature of the employment, or the terms of the employment, it is impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of remuneration, regard may be had"—not "must be had:" it is an enabling clause—"to the average weekly amount which, during the twelve months previous to the accident, was being earned by a person in the same grade employed at the same work by the same employer, or, if there is no person so employed, by a person in the same grade employed in the same class of employment and in the same district."

These two paragraphs were elaborately and carefully considered by this Court in Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441. I do not propose to read again my judgment in that case, or the judgment of Fletcher Moulton, L.J.; but it is quite clear that I did not think that a mere [688] mathematical calculation was all that could be required. I instanced the case of an agricultural labourer who happens during the portion of the year when the accident takes place to be earning comparatively high wages, as for instance in the middle of harvest, and I said that it was not the test simply to look at what he was earning at the date of the accident, but that if he had not been in the employment for twelve months or for a period sufficiently long to give the normal rate of remuneration you must work on the second part of clause (a). Fletcher Moulton, L.J., seems to me to take precisely the same view.

The view which I expressed there was repeated in Cue v. Port of London Authority [1914] 3 K. B. 892, Ann. Cas. 1916C 877, and I do not desire in any way to resile from that. Very shortly after the decision in Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441, the matter came before the Scottish Courts in Carter v. Lang [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1198, 1 B. W. C. C. 379. The Lord President in that case examined our decision in Perry

v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441, and adopted the language and the principles which we there endeavoured to lay down, and said [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1203, 1 B. W. C. C. 385: "The first observation I have to make is that I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls and Moulton, L.J. [1908] 1 K. B. 451, 456 in the remark which they both make that the leading proposition in these somewhat complicated sub-sections is the one at the beginning—that the average weekly earnings shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated. In other words you are as far as possible to cut yourself loose from what I may call the circumstances of the moment"—that is the date of the accident—"and to take a broad view of the matter in order to get truly at what the workman was in the habit of earning week by week." That is merely putting in other words what I endeavoured to say in Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441.

There have been other cases in which the same point has been raised. I am not aware of any decision which cuts down or qualifies the view which I have taken. Certainly the case of Godden v. Cowlin [1913] 1 K. B. 590, which was called to our attention, is in no way [689] inconsistent with that. That was the case where a carpenter who had been in Canada for some years came back and took a short job with his old master. I say "a short job" because it was common knowledge that he was going back to Canada and that he had taken a passage by a particular steamer which was sailing a few months later. In those circumstances the learned county court judge held that the period of nine weeks during which he had been employed was a sufficient period for the purpose of computing compensation. This was based entirely upon the fact that to the knowledge of both parties the engagement was not one in which the possibility of a twelve months' employment existed, but was one which was only to last until the workman started back for Canada. I do not think that there is a single word in that case which has any bearing upon the present case; certainly it has not any bearing adverse to the view which I have taken.

Whose duty is it to say whether it is impracticable to compute the compensation by reference to the workman's actual earnings in the employment? I think it is the business of the county court judge; and if he has not misdirected himself upon that point it is not for us to interfere. If Mr. Ellis Hill's contention on behalf of the employers was right, there was an error of law on his part; but I do not think that this was so, and in my opinion we ought not to interfere.

I do not think that it is necessary to base my judgment upon one ground which rather impressed the learned county court judge. He seems to have thought that twelve months is the prima facie period to which regard has to be had in every case. That may be so: I am not prepared to say that it is not; but I do not think that it is necessary to consider whether that is so or not. I prefer to base my decision upon the words at the beginning of par. 2 (a) as being the dominant guiding words. That, I think, is quite sufficient to justify what the learned judge did here. He gave the man the benefit of the good season as well as the winter season and avoided saying that because this accident happened in the winter compensation could only be computed on the footing that the average earnings of the winter were the earnings of the twelve months. I think if the contrary view were taken the result would be sometimes very unfair to the man and sometimes very unfair to the master, [690] and, more important still, that it would not be in accordance with the language of the Act itself.

In my opinion the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree. I think that the case is governed by authority. I do not mean by that there is a direct decision upon the point, but that the reasoning in the cases to which reference has been made applies here. Under those circumstances I think that it is quite unnecessary to consider what conclusion I might have come to if I had not been assisted by the authorities.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree. I also think that the case is completely concluded by the observations made by the Master of the Rolls and Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in the case of Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441, to which we have been referred, and also by the very carefully considered judgments of the Lord President and Lord McLaren in Carter v. Lang [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1198, 1 B. W. C. C. 379, delivered very shortly after the decision in Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441, and after a thorough investigation of the judgments in that case. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Meaning of Phrase "Average Weekly Earnings" in Workmen's Compensation or Similar Act.

Introductory.

The purpose of the present note is to review the recent cases construing the phrase "average weekly earnings" in a workmen's compensation or similar act. The earlier cases on the subject are collected in the notes to White v. Wiseman, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1021, and Shipp v. Frodingham Iron, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914C 183.

In General.

Under the English Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 (6 Edw. VII, c. 58) the "average weekly earnings" of the injured applicant for compensation is the basis of computation, and the phrase is defined by the act as follows: "Average weekly earnings shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated. Provided that where by reason of the shortness of the time during which the workman has been in the employment of his employer, or the casual nature of the employment, or the terms of the employment, it is impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of remuneration, regard may be had to the average weekly amount which, during the twelve months previous to the accident, was being earned by a person in the same grade employed at the same work by the same employer, or, if there is no person so employed, by a person in the same grade employed in the same class of employment and in the same district." Sched. 1, par. 2a. See Snell v. Bristol [1914] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 291, Ann. Cas. 1916B 519, 7 B. W. C. C. 236, 83 L. J. K. B. 353, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 101, [1914] W. N. 47, 110 L. T. N. S. 563; Cue v. Port London Authority [1914] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 892, Ann. Cas. 1916C 887, 7 B. W. C. C. 447, 83 L. J. K. B. 1445, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 487. And see the reported case.

Where a workman has been in the employment of the same master for a period of three years next preceding the injury and in the same grade of employment, the quantum of compensation and the basis for computation is the reproduction of the actual earnings of that period regardless of the employee's absence due to "illness or other unavoidable cause" and not affected by his average earnings. Greenwood v. Nall [1915] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 97, 8 B. W. C. C. 503, 113 L. T. N. S. 612, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 346, [1915] W. N. 244, 31 Times L. Rep. 476, 59 Sol. J. 577, following the ruling laid down by the same court in Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 441, 77 L. J. K. B. 236. But where an employee has not been in the same employ for three years next preceding the injury, the basis of compensation under section 1 of the act in case of death from his injury, is 156 times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment. Gill v. Grainger [1916] 2 I. R. 354, wherein it was held that where an employee had worked for twenty-six weeks before the accident occurred from which he died, the "average weekly earnings" were to be computed by dividing the total amount actually earned by the deceased by twenty-six, and the trial court could not in the computation leave out of account certain weeks in which small sums were earned. So it was held in Gill v. Fortescue, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 577, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 471, that in computing the average weekly earnings of a workman under Schedule 1 regard should be had only to his earnings in the period of continuous employment next preceding the injury, and it appearing that the claimant had worked but 119 weeks in the three preceding years, and when not employed by the defendant had worked for other persons, it was held that the employment could not be said to be continuous during the preceding three years and that the average weekly earnings must be arrived at by dividing the sum earned during the three years by the number of weeks of actual employment.

Under section 3 of the English Act of 1906, the average weekly earnings of a workman who is partially incapacitated by an injury received in the course of his employment is arrived at, by ascertaining the difference between the amount of his average weekly earnings before the accident and the average weekly amount which he earns or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident. Heathcote v. Haunchwood Collieries [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 140, wherein it was held that if the applicant was able to get employment in his own occupation after the accident, at the same rate of compensation that he received before the accident, he was not entitled to any benefits under the act; notwithstanding the fact that he was actually employed at the time in another occupation at a lower wage. See also Bevan v. Energy Colliery Co. [1912] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 63, [1912] W. C. Rep. 126, 81 L. J. K. B. 172.

The phrase "average weekly earnings" as used in the Canadian compensation acts is given a construction similar to that given to the English act. Re Barrie, etc. Coal Co. 7 Alberta L. Rep. 138, 28 West. L. Rep. 701, 6 West. W. Rep. 651, 17 Dominion L. R. 385; Kopyi v. Jacobs Asbestos Min. Co. 46 Quebec Super. Ct. 466. But it has been held that an offer by the employer to re-employ an injured workman at better wages than he was earning at the date of the accident did not prove that his wages had not been reduced in consequence of the accident.

Grand Trunk R. Co. v. McDonnell, 21 Quebec K. B. 532, 5 Dominion L. Rep. 65.

The ability of the workman to do the exact work for which he had been employed at the time of the injury is not the sole measure of disability, as regard must be had to the nature of the injury or disfigurement as well as the age of the applicant. Frankfort General Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 150. See also Giachas v. Cable Co. 190 Ill. App. 285.

In Massachusetts the "average weekly wages" of an injured workman are by an express provision of the workmen's compensation act determined by dividing the earnings of the injured employee during the period of twelve calendar months immediately preceding the date of injury by 52; but if the employee lost more than two weeks time during that period then the earnings for the remainder of the twelve calendar months must be divided by the number of weeks remaining after the time so lost has been deducted. Bartoni's Case, 225 Mass. 249, 114 N. E. 663, L.R.A.1917E 765. But where an employee was not engaged under such circumstances as to make it practicable to compute his average weekly earnings in that manner then, as under the English act, regard may be had to the average weekly amount earned by a person in the same grade employed in the same class of employment and in the same district. Gove's Case, 223 Mass. 187, 111 N. E. 702.

In California the average annual earnings of an injured workman "consist of three hundred times the average daily earnings" of the employee in the same employment, whether for the same employer or not during substantially the whole of the year immediately preceding his injury.

In Frankfort General Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 150, it was said: "The petitioner contends that the average daily earnings should have been computed by dividing his earnings for the year by 312, the number of working days in the year. Section 17a (1) bases the annual earnings upon the average daily earnings 'which he earned as such employee during the days when so employed.' The petitioner argues that 'the days when so employed' means the number of working days during which he might have worked or might have been expected to work. The respondents, on the other hand, claim that the phrase refers to the number of days during which the employee was actually engaged in work. We think the latter is the fair and reasonable interpretation of the language used. The basis of computation is the individual days upon which the workman is employed in the year during which he may have been in the employment. For this purpose each day stands by itself, and his average daily wage is the average for the year, figuring the number of days on which he earned wages. To the argument that this would produce an unjust result where the employee worked only two or three days a week, it may be said that the provision of the statute deals only with cases where the employee has worked 'during substantially the whole of the year.' It may well be questioned whether an employment which falls far short of the normal number of working days is an employment during substantially the whole of a given period."

In Kansas the average annual earnings are deemed to be fifty-two times the average weekly wage. McCracken v. Missouri Valley Bridge, etc. Co. 96 Kan. 353, 150 Pac. 832.

Under the New Jersey Act of 1911 compensation is based on the wages which the decedent received at the time of the accident, and it has been said that while this provision may result in injustice to the employer when the employee's earnings are unusually high at the time of the injury, or a corresponding injustice to the workman when his earnings are unusually low, it is a defect which is in the power of the legislature only to correct. Huyett v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 88 N. J. L. 688, 92 Atl. 58. And see Davidheiser v. Hay Foundry, etc. Works, 87 N. J. L. 688, 94 Atl. 309.

It has been held that where payment was made by the hour, and at the time of the injury the decedent was employed at twenty-five cents an hour, a finding by the trial judge that his weekly wage within the would be fifteen dollars a week was proper, it appearing that the regular working in that community and in that employment was six days of ten hours each. Scha v. De Grottola, 85 N. J. L. 444, 89 Atl. See also Smolenski v. Eastern Coal Co. 87 N. J. L. 28, 93 Atl. 85; Conner v. Public Service Electric Co. 89 N. J. L. 97 Atl. 792.

What Included in Term "Earnings"

An employee's earnings include, for the purpose of computing his average weekly earnings under the English Act of 1906, not only weekly wages received from his employer also all sums received as an incident of employment from persons other than the employer with whom he has business relations. Helps v. Great Western R. Co. 88 L. J. B. 1006, [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 196 Times L. Rep. 366, 61 Sol. J. 490, aff'd [1918] A. C. 141, wherein it was held where an accident occurred to a rail porter within the course of his employment the tips received in addition to his wages formed part of his "average weekly earnings," the rule of the employer in effect at the time of the injury being to the effect that no servant of the company was allowed to "solicit" gratuities from passengers. The court holding that, while there was a prohibition against actively soliciting tips, no complaint was made by the company of tips received by their servants without solicitation, which practice was notorious and well known to everybody; and therefore the money so received must be brought into account in computing his "average weekly earnings." To the same effect see Penn v. Splers [1908] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 766, 14 Ann. Cas. 335, 98 L. T. N. S. 541, 77 L. J. K. B. 542, 24 Times L. Rep. 354.

So under the New York compensation act the average weekly wages are computed by including the tips of such employees as porters of sleeping cars, waiters in restaurants, attendants at hat stands, bell boys and others serving patrons at hotels, as it is clear that the compensation paid by the employer is based on the assumption that the expected tips form a part of the wages of the employee. Sloat v. Rochester Taxicab Co. 177 App. Div. 57, 163 N. Y. S. 904.

Under the English Act (Sched. 1, clause 2b), where a workman enters into concurrent contracts of service with two or more employers under which he is to work at one time for one employer and at another time for another, his average weekly earnings are computed as if his earnings under all the contracts were earned in the employment of the employer for whom he was working at the time of the accident. Lloyd v. Midland R.

ployed as a night watchman concurrently by six different employers and was found murdered on the premises of the defendant, the average earnings of the deceased were not to be based on what he had earned in the service of the employer on whose premises he was killed, but were to be computed from his combined earnings from all his employers. See also In re Gillens, 215 Mass. 96, 102 N. E. 346, L.R.A.1916A 371. Compare Hathaway v. Argus Printing Co. [1901] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 96, 3 W. C. C. 177.

In a claim for compensation under the English act it appeared that the applicant managed a herd of cattle, in which work he was assisted by his two sisters who lived with him in a house provided by his employer, and to whom he paid a certain amount weekly, though not under any specific agreement with them. It was held that in computing the "average weekly earnings" the sum paid weekly by the plaintiff to his sisters could not be deducted; since there was no agreement express or implied that he should employ his sisters, and still less that he should pay them. Roper v. Hussey-Freke [1915] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 222, 8 B. W. C. C. 604, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 377. It has been held that where a claimant received a stated sum per week as wages besides his board, the value of the board was to be added to the weekly wage in computing his earnings. Baur v. Essex County Ct. 88 N. J. L. 128, 95 Atl. 627. See also State v. Sibley County Dist. Ct. 128 Minn. 486, 151 N. W. 182.

In Squizzato v. Brennan [1916] 51 Quebec Super. Ct. 301, it was held that in computing the average weekly earnings of an employee who prior to the accident received a wage of two dollars a day, the sum of sixty cents which was retained daily by the employer for a workmen's pension should not be deducted.

Section 14 of the New York Workmen's Compensation Law provides that the average weekly wages of an employee at the time of the accident should be determined as follows: If the injured employee shall have worked in the employment in which he was working at the time of the accident during substantially the whole of the year immediately preceding his injury, his average annual earnings shall consist of three hundred times his average daily wage. If he shall not have so worked, the basis for computation shall be the average daily wage which an employee of the same class working substantially the whole of such immediately preceding year in the same or in a similar employment in the same or a neighboring place, shall have earned when so employed. If either of the foregoing methods of arriving at the annual average earnings cannot reasonably and fairly be applied, such annual earnings shall be such sum as, having regard to the previous earnings of the injured employee, and of other employees of the same or most similar class, shall reasonably represent the annual earning capacity of the injured employee in the employment in which he was working at the time of the accident. In Fredenburg v. Empire United Ry. Co. 168 App. Div. 618, 154 N. Y. S. 351, it appeared that the claimant had worked for the defendant as a motorman for several years at the rate of thirty cents an hour, but about a month prior to the injury was put in charge of an express car at the rate of $3.50 a day, which last employment though uncertain as to its duration was assured for at least six months from the time he entered on it. It was also stated by the company's secretary that it was the custom of the defendant to pay an employee who had been in the service of the company as long as the claimant thirty-five cents an hour for the service he performed before he was put on the express car. It was held that this tended to fix the average daily wage of such an employee as well as of other employees in the same position and therefore the finding of the commission that the average weekly wages of the claimant was at the rate of $3.50 per day was fully warranted. In Kilberg v. Vitch, 171 App. Div. 89, 156 N. Y. S. 971, it was held under the same section that the average weekly wages of a minor, when injured in the course of his employment, may include a probable increase of his earning capacity under normal conditions.

Periodical Employment.

Under Schedule 1 of the English Act of 1906 in the calculation of average weekly earnings the question has often arisen whether absence from work and consequent loss of earnings are to be included or excluded. The rule seems to be that absence from work by the employee by reason of his illness or other "unavoidable cause" is not to be taken into account. But absence from work due to causes incidental to the employment such as a recognized lack of continuity in the particular employment, or absence due to trade depression is not to be excluded as absence due to an "unavoidable cause." Griffiths v. Gilbertson, 8 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 548, 113 L. T. N. S. 628, 84 L. J. K. B. 1312, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 359, [1915] W. N. 253. In a concurring opinion by Warrington, L. J., in that case it was said that the rule was not affected by the fact that the slackness or trade fluctuation may have been due to the war; that an event affecting the whole of the industries of the country could not be said to be such an abnormal incident of the employment as to prevent the period from being excluded, since war is no more an abnormal circumstance than is some extraordinary depression of trade. And see the opinion of Cozens-Hardy, M. R., in Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 441, 77 L. J. K. B. 236.

Where the nature or grade of the work is such, that the period of employment is usually for six weeks during a year, the average weekly earnings are to be computed on that basis, i. e., the total earnings of the six weeks divided by fifty-two, and then half of the quotient as the weekly payment during the incapacity. Gill v. Fortescue, 6 B. W. C. C. 577, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 471. See also Williams v. Hollings, C. A. [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 540, 9 B. W. C. C. 47.

In Andreyewski v. Wolvern Coal Co. 182 Mich. 298, Ann. Cas. 1916D 724, 148 N. W. 684, it appeared that the injured workman had been for ten years employed in a mine which was operated only about 211 days in each year. It was held that his average weekly earnings were to be ascertained by dividing by fifty-two his average annual earnings during the period of the employment. And see Robbins v. Original Gas Engine Co. 191 Mich. 122, 157 N. W. 437; Linestead v. Louis Sands Salt, etc. Co. 190 Mich. 451, 157 N. W. 64; De Mann v. Hydraulic Engineering Co. 192 Mich. 594, 159 N. W. 380.

In High v. York Mfg. Co. (Me.) 100 Atl. 9, L.R.A.1917E 277, the question arose where the working week consisted of fifty-eight hours which was divided into five and one-half days, work being done only half a day on Saturday, whether compensation was to be determined by dividing the weekly wage by five and one-half or by six in order to ascertain the average daily wage. It was held that the division must be made by six.

Grade of Employment.

Where the actual earnings of the injured employee cannot be used as the basis of computation and the calculation is made from the earnings of others similarly employed, average earnings cannot be computed by merely taking the average earnings of men in the same class and disregarding the fact that the particular workman in question may be above or below the average of men in his grade of employment. If the injured man is a superior workman, evidence may be given of that fact with the view of increasing the compensation to be awarded; but the limit of remuneration on which compensation is based is the maximum earned by a man employed in the same work by the same employer. Cue v. Port of London Authority [1914] 3 K. B. (Eng.) Ann. Cas. 1916C 887, 7 B. W. C. C. 447, 83 L. J. K. B. 1445, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 481. So it is an essential element in the computation of the average weekly earnings to take into consideration the personal qualifications of the employee. Snell v. Bristol [1914] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 291, Ann. Cas. 1916B 516, 7 B. W. C. C. 236, 83 L. J. K. B. 353, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 101, [1914] W. N. 47, 110 L. T. N. S. 563, wherein it was held that where the claimant was employed as a casual laborer and was engaged by some employers as a preferred employee at a higher compensation than was given to the average employee doing the same grade of work, but was not so employed by the defendant, it was error for the trial court to consider solely the average earnings of workmen doing the same grade of work without regard to the particular qualification of the plaintiff to earn more than the average workman.

The Wisconsin act (§ 2394) provides that where the specified methods for ascertaining the average earning cannot reasonably and fairly be applied, then the average annual earning for basis of compensation shall be fixed in the light of the employee's previous earning at the sum received by other employees of the same or most similar class engaged in the same or similar employment in the same neighboring locality. West Salem v. State Industrial Commission, 162 Wis. 57, 155 N. W. 929. In that case it appeared that a workman being summoned as a member of a posse to make an arrest was shot and killed by the man sought to be arrested. It was held that the village was liable to his dependent, not on the basis of his average earnings as a plumber which was his regular occupation, but on the basis of the average earnings in "the same or a similar" or the "most similar employment" to that which the deceased was engaged at the time of the injury, namely, that of a policeman of the village.

Under the Illinois act it was held in Erickson v. American Well Works, 196 Ill. App. 346, that compensation should be based on the wages he was earning at the time of his death though he had been earning that wage but a short time, it appearing that the wage in question ($3 per day) was not above that earned in similar employment by men of like capacity.

CHICAGO DRY KILN COMPANY

v.

INDUSTRIAL BOARD OF ILLINOIS
ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—December 21, 1916.

276 ILL. 556; 114 N. E. 1009.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Injury Arising Out of Employment — Watchman.

A watchman employed in a planing mill, whose employees would, independent of election, fall within Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1913, p. 339, § 3b), and be entitled to compensation, if injured while protecting the property at the plant from suspected persons, receives an injury arising out of an employment within such section, and is entitled to compensation.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 4; Ann. Cas. 1914B 498; Ann. Cas. 1916B 1293; Ann. Cas. 1918B 768.]

Review of Findings of Industrial Board.

The decision of the industrial board that an employee was injured by accident arising out of the employment, if there is competent or legal evidence to support it, cannot be reviewed, as it is not the court's province to pass upon weight or sufficiency of evidence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Circuit Court, Cook county:
TORRISON, Judge.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. W. W. Jackson, claimant, and Chicago Dry Kiln Company, defendant. Claim allowed by Industrial Board. Award affirmed by Industrial Board. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Adams, Crews, Bobb & Wescott for plaintiff in error.

George E. Gorman for defendants in error.

[557] CRAIG, C. J.—Defendant in error W. W. Jackson (hereinafter called the applicant) was an employee of plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the company) as a night watchman. The company was engaged in drying lumber and operating planing mills, its plant covering several blocks in the city of Chicago. There were also on the premises of the company several buildings occupied by tenants, one of the building being occupied by Anderson & Shumaker as a blacksmith shop. Applicant's duties required him to watch the property of the company, and in so doing to make the rounds of the premises of the company and the premises of the respective tenants, including Anderson & Shumaker, every hour. In so doing he was required to walk about four blocks and was required to "pull" eleven "boxes" located in various parts of the premises of the company, one being in the shop of Anderson & Shumaker. The applicant had been employed as watchman for the company about five years, and on May 29, 1914, went to work as usual about six o'clock P.M. In making his rounds, when he arrived at the blacksmith shop he found three men there,—Hard, King and Miller, employees of Anderson & Shumaker. King asked permission to leave his motorcycle in the blacksmith shop. Applicant apparently was not acquainted with King but was assured by the other two that he was an employee, and gave his consent. King tossed him a dime, which fell to the ground, and the applicant picked it up. Applicant went on about his duties, and in making the next round of the premises returned to the blacksmith shop about seven o'clock. King was inside. Applicant again returned to the blacksmith shop about eight o'clock. At this time the door of [558] the blacksmith shop was locked and King was outside in the street or alley with his motorcycle. Applicant unlocked the blacksmith shop and went inside and hid the lock, with the intention, as he stated, of changing the lock or putting another one on the door. He returned to the blacksmith shop again about nine o'clock. King, who in the meantime had become intoxicated, demanded the lock from applicant, and upon applicant's refusal to give it to him struck at the applicant, who punched or struck at King with a cane which he carried and broke it. During the scuffle applicant, in trying to get away through the door and prevent King from getting the lock, as he claimed, caught his foot on the sill and fell and received the injuries complained of, which consisted of a fracture of the neck of the thigh bone.

Commencing June 6, 1914, a week after the accident, the company paid the applicant compensation at the rate of $7.50 a week for a period of forty-one weeks and then refused to continue making further payments. He then filed his application for an adjustment of claim with the Industrial Board. A committee of arbitration was appointed, as provided by the act, which heard the evidence of both parties and rendered its decision finding that the applicant was entitled to recover from the company $7.50 a week for a period of 416 weeks and was entitled to a pension of $10 a month thereafter during life. The company filed with the Industrial Board its petition for review of the decision of the committee on arbitration, alleging that the applicant was not totally disabled or incapacitated, that the alleged injuries did not arise out of the course of his employment, and that his present alleged incapacity did not result from the alleged accident. The Industrial Board rendered its decision finding that both the parties to the proceeding were at the time of the accident operating under and subject to all the terms and provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act; that the accident for which compensation was claimed arose out of and occurred in the [559] course of the applicant's employment; that his wages for the purpose of the proceeding were $15 per week, and that he was then totally and permanently disabled. The board confirmed the decision of the committee of arbitration, except that it ordered that after the expiration of the 416 weeks, for which the applicant was to be paid at the rate of $7.50 a week, he should receive from the company an annual pension of $249.60, payable in installments of $20.80 per month, for the remainder of his life, being eight per cent of the total amount which would have been due him had death resulted from the accident. The company then filed a praecipe with the clerk of the circuit court of Cook county for a writ of certiorari to the Industrial Board, which was issued and served upon the secretary of the board. On July 8, 1916, the court entered a judgment approving and confirming the finding of the Industrial Board and certified that the cause was one proper to be reviewed by the Supreme Court, and the company sued out this writ of error.

Two points are raised in the briefs: (1) The injury the applicant received did not arise out of and in the course of his employment in a business or enterprise under the Workmen's Compensation act; (2) the injury of the applicant did not arise out of the course of his employment.

It appears that the company had never elected to come under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act and would not be subject to its provisions unless the company was engaged in one of the occupations or businesses enumerated in paragraph (b) of section 3 of the act. (Laws of 1913, p. 339.) It is conceded by counsel for the company that the business of the company in operating drying kilns and a planing mill is one of the occupations which would involuntarily come under the act, and as we understand the argument of counsel there is no question that one of the employees engaged in the planing mill, for example, would be entitled to recover compensation under the act in [560] case of injury. The claim is that the duties of employment of the applicant in this case are not of such a nature as to entitle him to compensation under the act in case of an injury. Under the holding of this court in the recent case of Vaughan's Seed Store v. Simonini, 275 Ill. 477, 114 N. E. 163, the mere fact that an employer is engaged in some occupation or business which might be under the act does not entitle a person working for the employer to recover compensation for injuries where he is injured in the course of his employment in another business conducted by the employer or in some employment remote from and having no connection with the hazardous occupation. As to whether the employee claiming compensation for injuries under the act is engaged in a line of employment that entitles him to such compensation depends to some extent on the particular facts of each individual case. In Suburban Ice Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 630, 113 N. E. 979, where a teamster was in the employ of a concern engaged in making ice and in delivering ice and fuel and whose duty it was to handle ice and coal and care for the horses used by the company on premises adjacent to the ice plant, it was held that his duties were of such a nature and so related to and connected with the occupation of the company as to bring both employer and employee within the provisions of the workmen's compensation act.

It is stated by counsel for the company in the argument that "if a watchman, being engaged in protecting the property of his employer from thieves, is injured no one would contend the injury did not arise out of the employment." It seems to be conceded by counsel for the company that the duties of the applicant required him, among other things at least, to guard the property of the company against fires and trespassers. Such an employment is not without its hazards and dangers. It must be assumed that the duties of the applicant were necessary to the protection of the company's property or he would not have been employed [561] for that purpose, and in such employment he would run the risk of being subject to assault and injury in protecting the property of the company,—and that was, in fact, what happened in this case according to the finding of the Industrial Board. In the case of Anderson v. Balfour [1910] 2 Ir. R. 497, a game-keeper was attacked by poachers and wounded. It was held that he was entitled to recover under the Workmen's Compensation act of Great Britain, from which the Illinois act was taken. In the case of Nisbet v. Bayne [1910] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 689, Nisbet was employed as a cashier, and in the performance of his duties, while carrying a large sum of money and going by train to his employer's colliery, was shot and killed. The court held that the risk of being attacked by reason of carrying large sums of money was incidental to his employment and that the murder was an accident which arose out of his employment. To the same effect is Challis v. London, etc. R. Co. [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 154.

A number of cases are cited by counsel for the company. Without commenting upon them, it is sufficient to say that it was held by the court in each of those cases that the employee was not entitled to recover compensation for the reason that the injuries complained of did not arise out of and in the course of his employment but by reason of something that happened outside such employment. In this case the Industrial Board found to the contrary, and, as above pointed out, the facts and circumstances under which the action arose seem to entirely justify the conclusion arrived at by the board that the applicant, as a watchman and in the course of his employment as such watchman, was injured while performing the duties as such for the company.

The second point urged for reversal, that the injury to the applicant did not arise out of and in the scope of his employment, is based upon the assumption that the applicant received his injury by reason of doing something outside of the scope of his employment,—that is, undertaking [562] to watch the motorcycle of King and that King gave him a dime for so doing. Whether the applicant was injured by reason of guarding his employer's property as he was hired to do and which injury would be one arising out of or in the scope of his employment, or was injured by reason of having undertaken to guard the motorcycle of King, which was something outside of his employment, was a question of fact to be determined from the evidence by the Industrial Board. If there is competent or legal evidence to support the decision of the board it is not within the province of the court to pass upon its weight or sufficiency. (Parker-Washington Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 498, 113 N. E. 976; Armour v. Industrial Board, 273 Ill. 590, 113 N. E. 138.) If the applicant had undertaken to watch the motorcycle for the owner thereof and had received his injuries in attempting to prevent someone from stealing it, or otherwise because of his undertaking to watch the motorcycle, a different question would arise. But such is not the case. There was evidence to sustain the finding of the Industrial Board, which was, in effect, that even though the applicant had agreed to watch King's motorcycle and such agreement was outside the scope of applicant's employment, such agreement had terminated at the time the accident occurred, as the testimony showed conclusively that King had taken the motorcycle from the blacksmith shop and had it out in the street at the time of the accident, and that the alleged understanding between applicant and King with reference to watching the motorcycle had no bearing upon the case, and that the altercation between King and the applicant in which applicant was injured came about by reason of applicant becoming suspicious of the movements of King and taking measures to keep him out of the blacksmith shop.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the circuit court will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Review of Facts on Appeal under Workmen's Compensation Act.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases passing on the right of an appellate court to review findings of fact in a case arising under a workmen's compensation act. For a discussion of the earlier cases on this subject, see the note to In re Buckley, Ann. Cas. 1916B 474.

General Rule.

It is generally held that findings of fact by a board or commission on a claim under a workmen's compensation act are conclusive; and the appellate court will not review such findings of fact except to determine whether there is any evidence to support the award. It may reverse an award if there is an absence of any evidence to support it, but it is not a trier of facts.

Thus it was said in Massachusetts Bonding, etc. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 168 Pac. 1050, that an award may be reviewed and annulled if the commission exceeded its powers in making it or if it was procured by fraud, or if it is unreasonable, or if the findings of facts on which it was made do not support it, but on no other grounds. It should not be set aside for errors of procedure only or for insufficiency of the evidence, where there is substantial evidence to support the findings.

So it was said in Swanson v. Latham, 92 Conn. 87, 101 Atl. 492: "The trial court does not retry the facts. It decides the appeal upon the findings as made by the commissioner, unless the appeal assigns as error the finding or omission to find any facts, and the court finds that facts have been found or omitted, which, if found, in accordance with the evidence, would affect the result. The right of the trial court to correct the finding of the commissioner is similar to that exercised by us upon a proper appeal over the finding of a trial court. And our authority upon appeal from the decision of the trial court, or upon a reservation in a compensation case, does not differ from that exercised by us in the ordinary appeal for errors in the finding of the trial court."

Similarly it was said in Sanderson's Case, 224 Mass. 558, 113 N. E. 355: "The industrial accident board have found that the injury arose out of the employment and it is expressly provided by section 11, part III, of the act as amended by St. 1912, § 14, that the decree entered in the superior court 'shall have the same effect and all proceedings in relation thereto shall thereafter be the same as though rendered in a suit duly determined by said court' except that there shall be no appeal upon findings of fact. The findings of fact made by the industrial accident board are equally conclusive with the findings of a judge, or the verdict of a jury, and are not to be set aside if there is any evidence to support them. Pigeon's Case, 216 Mass. 51, Ann. Cas. 1915A 737, 102 N. E. 932. The industrial accident board in the determination of questions of fact is permitted to draw such inferences from the evidence and all the circumstances as a reasonable man could draw, but its findings cannot properly be based merely upon conjecture or speculation." See to the same effect Haskell, etc. Car Co. v. Brown (Ind.) 117 N. E. 555.

In Rhyner v. Hueber Bldg. Co. 171 App. Div. 56, 156 N. Y. S. 903, the court said: "The appellant contends that the method of computing the deceased's wages was incorrect. We think the conclusion reached by the commission was correctly worked out. Of course, we are unable to say what mental processes the commission employed in arriving at the figures given in their decision; but it seems to us that, under the evidence, the figures given might, very properly, have been the result of the method of computation pointed out in subdivision 3 of section 14. But here again a finding of fact, based upon evidence, is presented to us, and we are powerless to criticize, modify, or revoke. It is not well for this court to fall into the habit of discussing the facts, even for the purpose of showing that the findings of fact are reasonable and meet with our approbation. We cannot, except by usurpation, invade the realm of facts, for it was the clear intent of the legislature that 'the decision of the commission shall be final as to all questions of fact.' Of course, if there are no facts, and the decision is arbitrary, unfair, and unreasonable, a question of law arises, and we may right the wrong. Gardner v. Horseheads Constr. Co. 171 App. Div. 66, 156 N. Y. S. 899, handed down herewith. But it is wholly improbable that the commission will make any such decision. The commission is the sole judge and the 'final' judge of the facts, and this court is not only forbidden to trespass upon the jurisdiction of the commission in this field, but, by section 20 of the act, it is circumscribed, even, in its review of questions of law. It was the purpose of the legislature to create a tribunal to do rough justice—speedy, summary, informal, untechnical. With this scheme of the legislature we must not interfere; for, if we trench in the slightest degree upon the prerogatives of the commission, one encroachment will breed another, until finally simplicity will give way to complexity, and informality to technicality."

In Parker-Washington Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 498, 113 N. E. 976, it was said: "The industrial board held, in effect, in its finding, that plaintiff in error was paving certain streets, for which the crushed stone was being hauled for a foundation. The contract which plaintiff in error entered into with the Bessmer Teaming Company for this hauling stated, in terms, that the Parker-Washington Company had a contract for paving those streets. Paragraph (f) of section 19 of the workmen's compensation act makes the decision of the industrial board, if it acts within its powers, in the absence of fraud, conclusive upon the courts. The circuit court and the supreme court, in reviewing a proceeding of this kind, can only review questions of law. Whether legal evidence is offered to support the decision of the board, where such evidence is properly preserved for review here, is a question of law, but if there is competent or legal evidence to support the decision of the board, it is not within the province of the courts to pass upon its weight or sufficiency. Munn v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 70, 113 N. E. 110; Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 11, 113 N. E. 173. As there was evidence in this record justifying the finding of the industrial board that the plaintiff in error was engaged in construction work, even though this evidence was controverted, we cannot inquire into this question of fact."

If the facts proven are capable as a matter of law of sustaining the inferences of fact drawn from them by the board, its findings are conclusive, in the absence of fraud, and an appellate court is not at liberty to interfere with them. This is but an application to workmen's compensation cases of the comprehensive and fundamental principle universal in courts of law, that whether there is any competent evidence is for the court to determine, but whether the evidence is sufficient is a question for the jury; the function of the board being in that respect those of a jury in actions at law. Papinaw v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 189 Mich. 441, 155 N. W. 545.

The commission cannot act arbitrarily on the information it receives, or in direct violation of the conceded facts. Its duty is to base its determination on the facts of the case and the reasonable inference to be drawn from the general situation. When its findings are without evidence, and in direct conflict with the undisputed facts, and all reasonable inferences which may be drawn from them, its determination may be reversed as an error of law. Gardner v. Horseheads Constr. Co. 171 App. Div. 66, 156 N. Y. S. 899. And see Carrol v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 218 N. Y. 435, 113 N. E. 507, reversing 169 App. Div. 450, 155 N. Y. S. 1; Matter of Saxon, 221 N. Y. 179, 116 N. E. 983. While a finding of facts by the board will stand if there is any evidence on which it can rest, it must be founded on evidence and cannot rest on surmise, conjecture or speculation. Gorski's Case, 227 Mass. 456, 116 N. E. 811.

While the findings of fact are conclusive and cannot be reviewed on appeal, the legal conclusions of the board based on their findings are subject to the supervision of the appellate court. Eugene Dietzen Co. v. Industrial Board, 279 Ill. 11, 116 N. E. 684.

The question when an injury occurred, like any other question of influence in determining whether a claim should be allowed by the industrial board, is, ordinarily, a question of fact to be determined by the board from all the evidence before it, and its determination thereof, where it has any evidence for its support, will be conclusive on the appellate court. In re McCaskey (Ind.) 117 N. E. 268.

The fact that other persons testified differently from the claimant does not authorize interference with the decision of the board. Bloomington, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 454, 114 N. E. 939. The credibility of a witness is a question of fact and rests with the commission and is beyond the appellate court to review. Benjamin v. Rosenberg, 187 N. Y. S. 650.

The office of the writ of certiorari is to bring before the circuit court for review the decision of the industrial board on questions of law only. Forschner v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 99, 115 N. E. 912.

Application of Rule.

INJURY ARISING OUT OF OR IN COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT.

If there is competent evidence in the record which standing alone fairly tends to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of employment, a reviewing court may not question its sufficiency, but whether there is any evidence in the record which fairly tends to establish that fact is a question of law for the determination of the court. Northern Illinois Light, etc. Co. v. Industrial Board (Ill.) 117 N. E. 95.

The question whether an accident arose out of the claimant's employment is practically eliminated by the rule of law which prevents the appellate court from weighing the evidence and compels it to affirm the award of the industrial board, unless it can say that the board had no evidence, either direct or circumstantial, furnishing any ground on which a reasonable mind might predicate the inference drawn by the board. Haskell, etc. Car Co. v. Brown (Ind.) 117 N. E. 555. The finding of the industrial accident board that the death of an employee resulted from an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment is, as in the analogous case of the verdict of a jury or the finding by a court in an action at law, conclusive; and the conclusion may be reached not only by direct evidence of facts but by reasonable inferences from them. In re Uzzio (Mass.) 117 N. E. 349. And see Sanderson's Case, 224 Mass. 558, 113 N. E. 355.

The powers of the appellate court to review are limited to a determination from the facts recited in the decision of the industrial board, whether that body acted within its powers in making the award. If the injury which caused the employee's death arose out of and in the course of his employment, then the board acted within its powers, and if no fraud is alleged, its decision is conclusive upon the circuit court and this court. Munn v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 70, 113 N. E. 110. In that case the facts on which the board based its conclusion were stated by the court as follows: "It was the duty of the deceased to operate the elevator, fire the boilers that were in operation in the building, and keep the hall and stairways swept and clean. His work was to begin at 7 o'clock in the morning and ended in the afternoon at 6 o'clock. One of the tenants in the building in which the deceased was employed was the Standard Film Exchange, who in the conduct of its business accumulated large amounts of what is known as 'film scraps.' These film scraps were put in bags by the film company and set outside of the door and the deceased was in the habit of taking them away. . . . On or about 7 o'clock in the evening, the 10th of November, 1914, Casparson was seen in the basement of the building attempting to extinguish a fire in the coal in and about the boiler and engine room. In this attempt he became suffocated by the fumes or smoke from a fire in the boiler room, collapsed, and fell on the floor. He was carried out, and in a short time was restored and went back into the boiler room and adjusted and moved some boxes in which there were possibly some film scraps. Bags of film scraps were found at various places in and about the basement of the building the next day after the fire, some of which, from appearances in the room, may have been taken from the boiler room after the fire. The deceased said to some witnesses who testified in the case, in substance, that someone had set fire to the film scraps and that he must get what remained out of the rooms or he would possibly lose his job. The deceased returned to his home and died early the next morning from the inhaling of poisonous gases or from suffocation, the result of the fire in the boiler room." In deciding that the findings of the board were not inconsistent with the facts, it was said: "The recital of facts states that about 7 o'clock in the evening Casparson was seen in the basement 'attempting to extinguish a fire in the coal' in the engine and boiler room, and all he did after he entered the boiler room the second time was to adjust and move some boxes, 'in which there were possibly some film scraps,' but nowhere is there any finding that the fire originated in or was caused by film scraps, much less in the film scraps brought into the room by Casparson in his own private interest. Nor does it appear from the recital of facts that Casparson's presence an hour after his day had ended under the terms of his employment was caused by his employment by the film company to remove its scraps. The mere fact that at the time of the accident Casparson's day's service, according to the terms of his employment, had ended, is not sufficient to authorize a reversal of the finding that the accident arose out of and was received in the course of his employment. The industrial board found that upon his return to the boiler room the second time he put in some coal. An employee should not be penalized for working overtime if he wishes to do so or for endeavoring to save his master's property. Dragovich v. Iroquois Iron Co. 269 Ill. 478, 109 N. E. 999; Ruegg on Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation (8th ed.) 346. The circuit court and this court are bound by the decision of the industrial board if there is any legal evidence to support it. . . . It is not claimed this court can weigh and determine the preponderance of the evidence, but the claim, in substance, is, that the facts recited show, without contradiction, that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment. Without further adverting to the facts recited by the board upon which it based its decision, we do not think the conclusion contended for by plaintiffs in error is warranted."

It has been held that a finding by the industrial accident board that injuries sustained by the manager of a store, while answering a telephone call from his daughter, arose out of and in the course of his employment would not be set aside if there was any evidence on which it could rest; that if it was his duty to answer telephones, then the circumstances that the call happened to be one which interested him personally would not prevent his conduct in attending to the call from being service arising out of and in the course of his employment. Cox's Case, 225 Mass. 220, 114 N. E. 281.

PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where substantial testimony is given before the commission to justify its inference and finding that the injury sustained by a workman was the proximate cause of his death, the finding is conclusive on appeal. Santa v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 165 Pac. 639.

Where there is conflicting medical testimony as to whether a workman's injuries resulted in his death, it is a question of fact for determination by the board, and an appellate court has no jurisdiction to review its action. Waterman v. Riehl (Ind.) 117 N. E. 272.

A finding by the industrial board on an application for increased compensation that the claimant developed a disease of the spine as the result of the accident, although the original award was made on a claim of having sustained a hernia, has been held to be conclusive on appeal. Squire-Dingee Co. v. Industrial Board, 281 Ill. 359, 117 N. E. 1031, wherein the court said: "The further argument is made that there was no sufficient evidence in the record as to this disease being caused by the injury in question to justify the industrial board in finding that it was so caused. The evidence shows clearly that Dombkowski was a man in excellent health before this injury and that the disease in question was very apt to be caused by a weakened condition of certain portions of the system attacked by it. The evidence also shows that from the first Dombkowski complained of pain in his back and hips; that originally he did not complain so much of this pain because of the acute suffering caused by the double hernia; that that trouble, in a measure, apparently overshadowed the pain from the injury to his back. This court has repeatedly held that the burden of proof rests upon the complainant before a recovery can be had. Armour v. Industrial Board, 273 Ill. 590, 113 N. E. 138; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 336, 113 N. E. 629; Savoy Hotel Co. v. Industrial Board, 279 Ill. 329, 116 N. E. 712. We have also held that the industrial board must not surmise, conjecture, or guess, but that it may draw an inference from the proved facts so long as it is a legitimate inference; that, if it is guided by the facts, then it is not guessing, but inferring, and, if there is material for it to do that, the industrial board is the judge as to the conclusion which should be reached, and not the courts. Peoria R. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Board, 279 Ill. 352, 116 N. E. 651. On the record before us we think the industrial board was justified in finding that the disease of the spine was the result of the accident; that such a conclusion is a legitimate inference from the facts proved by competent evidence in the record. That being so, that finding is conclusive on the courts."

In Bimel Spoke, etc. Co. v. Loper (Ind.) 117 N. E. 527, it was said: "Under the first and second assignments of error appellant seeks to present the question that there is a total failure of evidence to show that the accident to the deceased described in the findings of the board was a proximate, contributing cause of his death, and contends that the undisputed evidence shows that he died from peritonitis. Ultimate facts need not be proven by any particular kind or class of evidence. If there are facts and circumstances proven in the case from which the essential ultimate facts may reasonably be inferred, and the court or board whose duty it is to pass upon such facts has drawn therefrom the essential ultimate facts, this court will not disturb such finding, though other and different facts might be inferred therefrom by other minds equally as fair and reasonable. We deem it unnecessary to set out the evidence in detail. The deceased had complained of some abdominal trouble, and had taken treatment therefor shortly before the fatal accident, but had continued to work regularly. He was working when injured in the manner set forth by the industrial board, and there is no claim that he was at that time participating in the use for sport with the air hose. His injury occurred on the evening of the 28th, and he died on the 30th of September, at 9:30 P.M. The testimony shows that immediately after the accident he suffered pain, became sick, was taken home, called a physician immediately, a consultation of physicians was held, and an abdominal operation performed on September 29th, the day after the accident. There was inflammation of the bowels and abdominal walls, pus and serum were found in the abdominal cavity, and a diseased condition in the region of the gall bladder of a character which indicated the parts had been affected before the accident; that the conditions found would not likely have resulted from a sudden jerking or wrenching of the body if there had been no diseased condition prior to the day of the accident. One of the physicians testified that in his opinion the conditions found at the autopsy might have resulted from an accident which later caused his death; that the diseased condition of the intestines began before the accident occurred. The facts are sufficient to bring the case within the rules of law already declared by this court. In re Bowers, 116 N. E. 842. There is evidence tending to support the finding of facts."

WILFUL MISCONDUCT.

A finding of the commission or board on the question of wilful misconduct of an employee seeking recovery under the act will not be disturbed if it is supported by evidence. Thus in North Pac. Steamship Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 163 Pac. 910, the petitioner contended that the commission was without jurisdiction to make the award, since the uncontradicted evidence showed that the decedent's death was caused by his own wilful misconduct. The court stated the facts and its conclusions as follows: "The words 'wilful misconduct,' or phrases of similar import, are found in many workmen's compensation statutes. We need not undertake the difficult, perhaps impossible, task of giving an accurate and comprehensive definition of the term. As is true, generally, of inquiries turning upon standards of human conduct, each case must turn upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances. Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35. Certain it is, however, that 'wilful misconduct' means something more than negligence—more, even, than gross negligence. In the Great Western Power Company case we held that a workman was guilty of wilful misconduct where he had deliberately and intentionally violated a reasonable rule established for the very purpose of protecting men in his occupation from the danger of serious injury. In the present case it is claimed that Bolger deliberately violated a proper command of his superior officer, the captain, and that his death was the direct result of this disobedience. The testimony shows that, when the engines stopped and the vessel had struck or was about to strike, the captain ordered the crew to take to the boats. Two boats were available, and were launched, one, a 'working boat,' near the bow, and the other, a lifeboat, near the stern. Bolger's station was at the lifeboat. Most of the evidence indicates that the captain and some of the men took their places in the working boat, while Bolger and others went into the lifeboat. There is, however, some testimony that Bolger was with the captain in the working boat. At any rate, Bolger, for some reason which is not disclosed by the evidence, left the boat in which he was, and went back to the steamer. While he was still absent from his comrades, the lifeboat was cast off, and when Bolger was next seen he was on the Eureka, appealing to the men in the boats to save him. A high sea was running, and it was not possible to approach near enough to get Bolger off. The wilful misconduct asserted is the failure of Bolger to obey the captain's order to take to the boats. Of course, he did, in the first instance, heed the command by going into the boat. But the order of the captain may fairly be interpreted as an order to abandon the vessel once for all. This does not, however, answer the whole question. Did the evidence compel an inference that Bolger's act in returning to the ship was a deliberate and intentional defiance of his superior's command, in reckless disregard of his own safety? The situation was obviously one of great peril, and any competent mariner must have realized the necessity for a prompt leaving of the vessel. But when Bolger returned to the Eureka the lifeboat was still attached to the main vessel. We do not know the purpose of his return. It may conceivably have been a legitimate purpose, and one that might have been accomplished in a few moments. The entire episode, from the order to lower the boats to the final abandonment of the ship, occupied but a brief time. Bolger may well have thought that he could do what he set out to do on the vessel, and get back before the occupants of the boat should cast off. Some allowance may be made for errors of judgment in times of sudden emergency and stress. There can be no presumption that a man recklessly imperils his own life. In view of all the facts, we think the commission took no unreasonable view of the evidence when it found that Bolger was not guilty of wilful misconduct. His actions were not those of one intending to refuse compliance with the captain's order to get into the boat. On the contrary, he showed his purpose of doing as he was bid. He was remiss, perhaps, in not following out the directed course as speedily as he might have done, but it cannot be said as a matter of law that his brief delay amounted to wilful misconduct. This view of the commission's conclusion derives some additional support from the testimony of one witness, who stated that, when Bolger left the boat to return to the ship, the captain was in the same boat and made no objection to Bolger's return. This is some evidence to indicate, either that the captain did not regard Bolger's return as a violation of his orders, or that Bolger was justified in thinking that the captain assented to his conduct. . . . Under section 12, (a), (3), of the workmen's compensation act (St. 1913, p. 283), liability exists only where the injury is not 'caused by the intoxication or the wilful misconduct of the injured employee.' The commission found that Bolger's injury was not so caused. But its finding is subject to review here if totally unsupported by the evidence. Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35. The commission is, however, the body charged with the determination of issues of fact, and its findings of fact are not reviewable where they find support under any rational view of the evidence."

In affirming an award in Ramlow v. Moon Lake Ice Co. 192 Mich. 505, 158 N. W. 1027, L.R.A.1916F 955, it was said: "A further contention is made that the conduct of Ramlow was unreasonable, amounting to wilful and intentional misconduct within the meaning of section 2, part 2, of the compensation act (Pub. Acts Extra Sess. 1912, No. 10). This is based upon the claim that deceased, when asked by his attending physician if he was an alcoholic, replied that he was not; that, had he answered truthfully that he was, the treatment would have been different, and the attack might have been averted. Touching the habit of deceased in this respect, his foreman testified that he had known the deceased for twenty-three years, and that he had worked with him off and on for about sixteen years, and that the deceased 'used to take a drink once in a while, and sometimes quite often,' but that 'he never saw him in a state when he thought he had been drinking while on duty, and that his drinking did not interfere with his work, and that during the sixteen years he had known him he had not known him as a drinking man.' There is nothing in the record to show that the deceased understood to what extent a person must be addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors to become an alcoholic, neither is there anything to show that he knew that the question propounded had any bearing upon the treatment of his injury. We cannot say as a matter of law that the record discloses any wilful or intentional misconduct concerning his answer to the doctor's question. The extent to which he was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors was a question of fact, and, the same having been determined by the board, it is not within our power to review it."

But where the evidence fails wholly to support a finding of the industrial accident commission that the workman was not guilty of misconduct, the award may be set aside. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 31 Cal. App. 701, 162 Pac. 1040, wherein it was held that an employee who was killed while attempting to operate an elevator contrary to the express warning and instructions of the employer, was guilty of wilful misconduct as a matter of law.

INCAPACITY.

The extent of disability occasioned by an injury is not capable of exact measurement, and the percentage of such disability is a matter to be determined by the commission in the exercise of its sound discretion, based upon a fair view of all the circumstances. Its conclusion on this matter is the determination of a question of fact, and is not subject to review by the courts unless palpably contrary to the undisputed evidence. Frankfort Gen. Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 160.

In Lahey v. Blair [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 78, it appeared that an employee injured his foot in the course of his employment, and after being incapacitated for a period of about two years his doctor amputated a toe of the foot, contrary to the advice of an expert. In an application for full compensation for total incapacity it was held that the incapacity was due to the amputation and not to the accident, expert testimony having been given that the amputation was unnecessary. On appeal from the decision of the arbitrator, it was held in affirming the award that the arbitrator having found as a fact that the condition of the applicant was not due to the accident but to the operation that was performed, the only question for the appellate court, was whether there was sufficient evidence on which the arbitrator could come to that conclusion. And see Rouse v. Hutchinson [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 299.

DEPENDENCY.

Whether one person is dependent on another within the meaning of that term as used in the workmen's compensation acts is usually held to be a question of fact, so that a finding thereon will not be reviewed if there is any evidence to sustain it. Rhyner v. Hueber Bldg. Co. 171 App. Div. 56, 156 N. Y. S. 903; Matter of Bylow, 179 App. Div. 555, 166 N. Y. S. 874. And see Poccardi v. State Compensation Com'r (W. Va.) 91 S. E. 663. The fact that the oral testimony of an applicant is, on the question of dependency, inconsistent with his application card does not require a finding against the truth of the testimony. Northern Redwood Lumber Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 156 Pac. 828.

So in Com. Edison Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 74, 115 N. E. 158, wherein it appeared that the father and sister of a deceased workman testified before the coroner's jury that the decedent did not contribute to their support, but testified before the board that he did so contribute, and gave as an excuse for their former testimony that they were excited at the time, it was said in affirming the award of the board: "No question is made as to the competency of this testimony, but it is claimed it was untrue and should not be believed because it was at variance with the testimony of the same witnesses before the coroner's jury. . . . This court has power to review only questions of law. There was legal evidence tending to prove deceased had contributed to the support of his father within four years previous to the time of his injury, and we have said where this is so it is not within our province to pass upon its sufficiency."

In Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, reported ante, this volume, at page 627, it was insisted by the petitioner that there was no evidence on which the board could base its findings that the deceased had ever contributed to the support of his parents, or that they were beneficiaries under the act. The court said: "Under paragraph (f) of section 19 of the act the decision of the industrial board, acting within its powers, in the absence of fraud, is conclusive. The circuit court may review the decisions of the industrial board by certiorari for errors of law only. Whether legal evidence is offered to support the decision of the industrial board as shown by the record of proceedings, where such evidence is agreed upon or preserved by a stenographic report, is a question of law, but, if there is competent or legal evidence to support the decision of the industrial board, it is not within the province of the courts to pass on its sufficiency. We have examined the evidence in the record on this point. The administrator, Casimo Landolina, a brother of the deceased, testified that the father of the deceased was living in Caccamo, Italy, and was sixty-three years of age; that the mother was fifty-four years of age, and was living with his father; that there are some younger children, all under twenty years of age, the oldest about seventeen; that the deceased contributed to the support of this family in the old country prior to his death; that the family lived upon a farm of about four acres; that he had seen a receipt for a post-office money order for $40 which the deceased showed to him. Charles Costello testified that he knew the deceased in Italy; that he and the deceased both came from the same province; that he knew him at the time he arrived in this country; that at the request of the deceased he went with him to act as an interpreter, because the deceased could not speak English, and assisted him to get a money order for $40, which he put in a letter addressed to his father, Giovanni Landolina, Caccamo, Italy; that the witness saw him address the envelope, seal it, and mail it, and the money order was in it. James Barto testified that he saw the deceased put money in a letter which he sent to his father in Italy; that the witness, at the request of the deceased, wrote a return address on the envelope. . . . We think, however, there was sufficient competent evidence to sustain the finding of the industrial board that the deceased left parents, and that he had within five years contributed to their support."

In Muncie Foundry, etc. Co. v. Coffee (Ind.) 117 N. E. 524, the court said: "It was the duty of the board to determine from the evidence, as a matter of fact, whether the wife was living with the husband at the time of his death. W. C. A. § 38. This court will not disturb the finding on the ground that the evidence is conflicting. A finding of the board will be reversed only where there is no evidence on which the finding can stand. There is no evidence that appellee had disposed of the household goods, and therefore the presumption prevails that at the time of his death their home at Mound City was still intact; and the board was justified in finding that they were living together within the meaning of the statute. Having found as a matter of fact that she was living with her husband at the time of his death, it follows as a matter of law that she was totally dependent on him for support."

In the case of In re Carroll (Ind.) 116 N. E. 844, it was said: "It is perhaps more accurate to say that questions of dependency are mixed questions of fact and law, since the ultimate question of what constitutes a dependency is a law question. It is the exclusive province of the board to determine the facts and to draw legitimate inferences therefrom. It is the province of the board also in the first instance to determine from such facts and inferences whether dependency exists: but, as such latter process involves a law question, the action of the board in such respect is reviewable by this court, when an appeal is taken under section 61 of the workmen's compensation act. In each case, the burden is on the claimant to establish by evidence, direct, circumstantial, or both, the facts showing dependency. . . . Here the facts have been submitted to us. We have said that ordinarily it is the exclusive province of the industrial board to deduce inferences from proven facts. An analysis of these facts might lead to certain conclusions under which dependency here becomes a question of law. Thus, if such facts establish conclusively the existence or the nonexistence of dependency, or if they are insufficient to establish such a state, then dependency becomes a law question; or if such facts, of themselves and unaided by inference, are not sufficient to establish anything on the subject of dependency, and if they are reasonably susceptible of only harmonious inferences—that is, inferences all tending to indicate a state of dependency or the opposite—then also dependency becomes a law question, as under such circumstances this court may draw the inferences that arise inevitably from the facts, and having done so, it ultimately becomes the province of this court to determine dependency as a law question. It is our judgment that the facts here, when aided by all proper deductions, are not sufficient to establish that either the wife or the children were wholly dependent on the deceased employee for support. Such is our opinion as matter of law." And see Bloomington-Bedford Stone Co. v. Phillips (Ind.) 116 N. E. 850.

SHAUGHNESSY

v.

NORTHLAND STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Washington Supreme Court—January 24, 1917.

94 Wash. 325; 162 Pac. 546.

Master and Servant — Negligence — Safe Appliances — Maritime Employee.

Where a stevedore returning to work in the hold of a ship was required to pass down the ladder from a hatchway so located that he had to take hold either of the hatch coaming, or of a rope just above it, which rope was apparently firmly fixed to stanchions, and on his taking hold of such rope one of the stanchions pulled loose, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the master was free from negligence in having the rope less secure than it appeared to be.

Contributory Negligence.

In such case, it could not be said as a matter of law that the servant was guilty of contributory negligence in using the rope for support.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Right of Election.

Neither the master nor the servant has any right of election whether he will come under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1911, p. 345 [Rem. Code 1915, §§ 6604—1 to 6604—32]), if engaged in the kind of work which falls thereunder, and neither can exempt himself from the burdens imposed, nor waive the benefits.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915C 308; Ann. Cas. 1918B 715.]

Scope of Act.

The workmen's compensation act is applicable only to those relations of employer and employee which are in the legislative control of the state, untrammelled by the laws of the United States.

Maritime Employees as within Act.

Where a servant was injured while working in the hold of a ship lying in the navigable waters of Puget Sound, the question of his compensation is subject to controversy in admiralty in the federal courts, regardless of state law, although he was assisting only in unloading the ship, and not in its navigation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Since an employer whose employees are engaged in maritime service is not required to contribute to the accident fund of the state, his employees so engaged cannot lawfully claim compensation from that fund.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Rem. Code 1915, § 6604—1, withdraws from private controversy all phases of workmen's compensation to the exclusion of every other remedy, proceeding, or compensation, and all civil actions and civil causes of action for personal injuries, and all jurisdiction of the courts of the state thereover is abolished. Section 6604—2 provides that the act shall apply to all inherently hazardous work within the jurisdiction of the state, and that the term "extrahazardous" embraces work about steamboats, tugs, and ferries. Section 6604—27 provides that if any employer shall be adjudicated to be outside the lawful scope of the act, the act shall not apply to him, or to his workmen. It is held that a stevedore injured while working in the hold of a ship in the navigable waters of Puget Sound was not within the act, and that his other rights and remedies remained unimpaired.

[See note at end of this case.]

Courts — Effect of Decision — Federal Decision as Binding State Court.

The question whether the workmen's compensation act abolishes all other actions by an employee injured while unloading a ship in the navigable waters of Puget Sound is a wholly state question as to the right to maintain a common-law action, and therefore the decision of the federal district court in another case as to the interpretation of the act is not controlling upon the state court.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Maritime Employees as within Act.

Although Rem. Code 1915, § 6604—2, includes in the workmen's compensation act as extrahazardous steamboats, tugs, and ferries, such provision does not require that the law be construed to include injuries on ships lying in navigable waters, since there are inland lakes over which the state has sole jurisdiction to which such provision may apply.

[See note at end of this case.]

Judgments — Correction — Premature Entry by Clerk.

Where the court took the case under advisement and intimated that it would decide for defendant, and the clerk then without proper authority made a judgment entry for defendant on the minutes, the court is not thereby precluded from changing its mind and ordering a judgment entry for plaintiff, and the judgment so entered is valid where the court then on motion and hearing ordered the incorrect entry expunged.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county:
FRATER, Judge.

Action by George Shaughnessy, plaintiff, against Northland Steamship Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Bronson, Robinson & Jones for appellant.
Brady & Rummens and Thos. B. McMartin for respondent.

[326] PARKER, J.—The plaintiff, Shaughnessy, commenced this action in the superior court for King county, seeking recovery [327] of damages for personal injuries claimed by him to have resulted from the negligence of the defendant steamship company while he was working for that company in the hold of its steamship Alki assisting in its unloading, while it was lying in the navigable waters of Puget Sound alongside a wharf in the city of Anacortes. The trial resulted in verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, awarding him $3,500 damages, from which the defendant has appealed to this court.

It is first contended in appellant's behalf that the trial court erred in refusing to sustain its counsel's challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence, timely made, and decide, as a matter of law, that appellant was not guilty of negligence and that respondent's injuries were the result of his own negligence. It was while returning to his work after having his supper on the day in question that respondent received the injuries for which he here sues to recover. He was required to go to his work in the hold of the ship through the hatch down a ladder. The hatch was about twelve feet square, its coaming rising some ten inches above the deck. The ladder down which the employees were required to go into the hold to their work was stationary, perpendicular, and set back under the edge of the hatch some four or five inches so as to avoid coming in contact with the cargo sling as it was lowered into or raised from the hold in loading or unloading the ship. While the hatch was open and the unloading proceeding, there was placed around it in the usual manner a rope run through eyelets at the top of iron stanchions which were set in the deck at each corner of the hatch just outside the coaming, so that the rope ran parallel with the sides of the hatch some two feet or more above the deck over the edge of the hatch. The stanchions and rope constituted a railing which was apparently strong enough to at least bear the weight of a man, whether such weight might come in contact with the rope laterally or directly downward. When respondent returned to his work after supper and started [328] to go down into the hold, he took hold of the rope with his hands, or at least with one hand, reached one foot down to the upper rung of the ladder, evidently intending to descend backward, as was usual; and, proceeding upon the assumption that the rope was strong enough and the stanchion sufficiently secure to bear his weight, allowed his weight to come upon the rope. One of the stanchions gave way where it was set into the deck, and this sudden giving away and slackening of the rope caused him to lose his hold and fall into the hold, some twenty feet below, resulting in his injuries.

It seems quite plain to us that, in view of the position of the rope with reference to the ladder, its apparent strength, and the apparent strength and security of the iron stanchions which held it in place, and the fact that to start to descend the ladder necessarily required respondent to take hold of either the top of the hatch coaming or the rope, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that appellant was free from negligence in having the rope in this position less secure than it apparently was, or that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in taking hold of the rope and depending upon it to temporarily support him rather than entirely depending upon a hold upon the hatch coaming. The jury might have well concluded that the situation was such as invited respondent and others descending the ladder to take hold of the rope as well as the hatch coaming in starting to descend. We are quite clear that it cannot be held otherwise as a matter of law.

Some contention is made in appellant's behalf upon the theory that the complaint seems to be framed upon the assumption that respondent was necessarily required to take hold of the rope in starting to descend and that the proof fails to show that there was any real necessity for his so doing, the argument being apparently that there was no other issue in the case than that of the necessity of taking hold of the rope, so far as respondent's contributory negligence is concerned. We are convinced, however, that the [329] proof did not, in any event, constitute such a variance as worked to the prejudice of appellant upon the trial, and that it was enough to warrant the jury finding in respondent's favor that the situation was such as to in effect invite him to take hold of the rope preliminary to his descending into the hold. It seems quite clear to us that the court did not err in leaving the question of negligence, both on the part of appellant and respondent, to the jury, and that respondent was not prejudiced by the fact that the issues were not confined by the court strictly to the question of the necessity of taking hold of the rope by respondent.

What we regard as the most important question here presented is, Has our workmen's compensation act (Rem. Code, § 6604-1 et seq.) withdrawn from controversy in the courts causes of action of this nature arising out of employment such as respondent was engaged in at the time he was injured, and substituted therefor the remedy and compensation provided for by that act? This question was presented to the superior court by respondent's demurrer to appellant's first affirmative defense, and by appropriate motions, made during the course of the trial, invoking the provisions of the workmen's compensation act as a complete defense in this action. The trial court, by its rulings on the demurrer and the motions, declined to entertain this defense, being of the opinion that claims of this nature arising out of maritime employment are not withdrawn from controversy in the state courts and the right to compensation from the accident fund provided for by the act substituted therefor.

Our workmen's compensation act, let us be reminded, is one under which neither the employer nor the employee has any right of election as to whether he will come under and be governed by its provisions, so far as extrahazardous employment is concerned. Neither can exempt himself from the burdens which it imposes, nor by contract waive the benefits thereof in the sense that he can bar himself from the right to claim its benefits. The employee, by the terms of the act, [330] has taken away from him the right to sue in the courts upon his cause of action, and in lieu thereof is furnished indemnity in certain specified amounts, payable from the accident fund provided for in the act, according to the nature of his injury, regardless of the fault of his employer. The employer is compelled to contribute to the accident fund certain specified amounts, according to the hazardous nature of the work of his employees, and in return therefor is furnished indemnity against all claims of his employees for injuries received in the course of their employment. Thus the act in effect provides for compulsory insurance, both for the employer and the employee, and manifestly contemplates that all employers and all employees, who are compelled to come under the act and have their rights each as against the other controlled and determined by its provisions, shall enjoy such privileges and immunities equally, in harmony with the guaranty of § 12 of art. 1 of our state constitution. This evident spirit of the act, we think, points to a legislative intent to make the act applicable only to those relations of employer and employee which are in the legislative control of the state untrammelled by the laws of the United States and the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, which might have the effect of rendering the privileges and immunities for which the act provides unequal as between employers or unequal as between employees. If these observations be sound, it seems to follow almost as a matter of course that, in so far as the maritime service of appellant's employees is concerned, it is not required to contribute to the accident fund provided for in the act out of which workmen are to be compensated for their injuries in lieu of the right to sue therefor in the courts and such employees, injured while so engaged in maritime service, are not required to accept the limited compensation provided therefor out of the accident fund.

That the employment in which respondent was engaged for appellant was maritime in its nature, and that the question of his compensation for the injuries received by him here involved [331] are subject to controversy in admiralty in the Federal courts regardless of all state laws, seems quite clear in view of the fact that he was working upon the ship for appellant while it was lying in the navigable waters of Puget Sound. Nor does the fact that he was assisting only in unloading the ship of assisting in its navigation lessen his right to seek his remedy in admiralty. Atlantic Transport Co. v. Imbrovek, 234 U. S. 52, 34 S. Ct. 733, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1208, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1157; Imbrovek v. Hamburg-American Steam Packet Co. 190 Fed. 229; The Fred E. Sander, 208 Fed. 724.

In our recent decision in State ex rel. Jarvis v. Daggett, 87 Wash. 253, 151 Pac. 648, L.R.A.1916A 446, we reached the conclusion that a navigation company operating vessels upon Puget Sound is not required to contribute to the accident fund provided for by our workmen's compensation act to compensate its employees injured while engaged in maritime service. In that case, the question arose upon the petition of a maritime employee of the company injured while working upon one of its ships as an oiler. He presented his claim to the commission, seeking compensation from the accident fund provided for by the act. His claim was rejected by the commission upon the ground that the act did not give it any jurisdiction over such navigation companies and their employees engaged in maritime service. The injured employee then applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the commission to make demand upon and take proceedings to collect contributions to the accident fund from navigation companies to the end that his claim might be paid from such fund. While recognizing that certain language of the act presently to be noticed, which, read literally and apart, would seem to have the effect of subjecting such companies and their employees to the provisions of the act, Judge Main, speaking for the court, at page 257, said:

"The maritime law being a part of the law of the United States, the legislature of a state has no power to modify or abrogate it. Workman v. New York City, 179 U. S. 552, 21 S. Ct. 212, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 314. [332] It follows, therefore, that the legislature in passing the compensation act could not take from a workman any right which he had under the maritime law of the United States. The petitioner here still has the right to pursue his remedy in admiralty. Gathering the purposes of the act from all its provisions, we think it could not have been the legislative intent to attempt to encroach upon the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts. . . . It seems to be the purpose of the act to give the relief therein granted where the legislature had the power to abolish every other remedy. If companies operating boats upon Puget Sound are within the act, then they may be compelled to pay the percentage of their pay rolls specified, and yet be subject to a right of action in admiralty; while other persons or corporations engaged in a hazardous business not covered by admiralty law would be completely protected against the pursuit of any other remedy or proceeding. The owner of a steamboat, if he should pay the percentage of his pay roll specified, and his injured seamen should pursue their remedy in admiralty, would receive no protection from the act, and yet would be subject to its burdens. If the act were given this construction, it might well be doubted whether it would not offend against that provision of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'"

We note that the ship there in question was engaged in interstate as well as intrastate commerce; but the decision was rested upon the fact that the admiralty remedy remained unimpaired, which is not affected by the nature of the ship's commerce so long as it is not on inland waters having no connection with the high seas or another state. Now it seems almost unthinkable that the legislature ever intended to give to an employee the right to compensation out of the accident fund provided for in the act and at the same time not require his employer to contribute to that fund. So it seems to us that when it has once been determined, as it has been in the Jarvis case, that an employer whose employees are engaged in maritime service is not required to contribute to the accident [333] fund, it necessarily follows that such employees cannot lawfully claim compensation from that fund. This, we think, became in effect as thoroughly settled by the Jarvis decision as that navigation companies are not required to contribute to the accident fund so far as the maritime service of their employees is concerned.

Does it follow that the act by its terms, assuming that it could do so, has taken away respondent's right to sue in the courts, other than in admiralty, for damages resulting in his injuries, as he is here doing? It seems to be so argued by counsel for appellant. Looking to the provisions of the act, ch. 74, page 345, Laws of 1911, Rem. Code, §§ 6604-1, 6604-2, 6604-27, so far as necessary to here notice them, we read:

"Section 1. . . . The state of Washington, therefore, exercising herein its police and sovereign power, declares that all phases of the premises are withdrawn from private controversy, and sure and certain relief for workmen, injured in extrahazardous work, and their families and dependents is hereby provided regardless of questions of fault and to the exclusion of every other remedy, proceeding or compensation, except as otherwise provided in this act; and to that end all civil actions and civil causes of action for such personal injuries and all jurisdiction of the courts of the state over such causes are hereby abolished, except as in this act provided."

"Sec. 2. . . . This act is intended to apply to all such inherently hazardous works and occupations, and it is the purpose to embrace all of them, which are within the legislative jurisdiction of the state, in the following enumeration, and they are intended to be embraced within the terms 'extrahazardous' wherever used in this act, to wit: . . . steamboats, tugs, ferries . . ."

"Sec. 27. If any employer shall be adjudicated to be outside the lawful scope of this act, the act shall not apply to him or his workman, . . ."

If our decision in the Jarvis case is to remain as a correct exposition of the law in so far as therein discussed, the last quoted paragraph from section 27 of the act seems to render [334] it quite plain that both appellant and respondent are "outside the lawful scope of this act," that none of the rights of either of them are in the least changed or lessened by its provisions, and that their rights and remedies remain unimpaired as if the act had never become the law of this state. The views expressed in the following decisions are in harmony with our conclusion here reached, though the questions therein considered are not exactly the same as here presented. Reynolds v. Day, 79 Wash. 499, 140 Pac. 681, L.R.A.1916A 432; Cunningham v. Northwestern Imp. Co. 44 Mont. 180, 119 Pac. 554; Schuede v. Zenith Steamship Co. 216 Fed. 566.

There has come to our notice the decisions in Mathison v. Minneapolis St. R. Co. 126 Minn. 286, 148 N. W. 71, L.R.A.1916D 412; Lindstrom v. Mutual Steamship Co. 132 Minn. 328, 156 N. W. 669, L.R.A.1916D 935, and Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 372, L.R.A.1916A 436, which are thought to be out of harmony with our own views herein expressed. Those cases, however, deal with workmen's compensation acts which leave it optional with the employer and employee as to whether they will come under and be governed by the provisions of the acts in question. In such cases we see no reason why such an election on the part of the employer and employee might not be held to divest the claimant of the right to resort to admiralty for relief upon the ground of estoppel; as where there is an election to sue in the state court instead of in admiralty, in the absence of a workmen's compensation act. Such, in substance, is the theory upon which Judge Neterer of our Federal district court rendered his decision in the case of The Fred E. Sander, 212 Fed. 545, holding that the libelant having applied for and received compensation from the accident fund under our workmen's compensation act, he thereby became precluded from seeking redress in admiralty. The question of the libelant's right to receive compensation from the accident fund, and the question of the duty of the commission in making such award from that fund, [335] was a matter with which the Federal court was not called upon to concern itself. It was enough for the learned judge of that court to know that the libelant, seeking his remedy in admiralty, had been awarded and accepted compensation from the accident fund under the act.

In Walker v. Clyde Steamship Co. 215 N. Y. 529, 109 N. E. 604, Ann. Cas. 1916B 87, we have a decision in which there are some remarks of the court which may seem opposed to our views herein expressed. In that case, the injured employee was engaged in maritime service such as would have secured to him his remedy in admiralty had he elected to so assert it. He applied to the state commission and was awarded compensation from the accident fund provided for in the workmen's compensation act. His employer, the steamship company, as it apparently had the right to do under the act, caused the question of the claimant's right to compensation from that fund to be removed to the courts for review, with a view of defeating the award made by the commission. The fact of the steamship company having contributed to the accident fund seems to be assumed in the decision. Whether it did so by compulsion or at its own election does not appear in the opinion of the court. The decision may be harmonized with the conclusion we here reach, if we assume that the workmen's compensation act of that state does not compel the employer to contribute to the fund from which the claimant was compensated, but is only elective in that regard. If the employer having such right of election voluntarily contributed to the fund and the employee took compensation therefrom, both would be in substantially the same position as the employee found himself in The Fred E. Sander case, 212 Fed. 545. If the decision cannot be harmonized with our views upon this theory, with all due respect for that great court, we would feel constrained to not follow it, in the light of our decision in the Jarvis case, which we are not now inclined to recede from.

[336] We have not overlooked the decision of Judge Cushman of our Federal district court in Stoll v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co. 205 Fed. 169, wherein it was held that an action upon the law side of the Federal district court, which could have been maintained in admiralty, for injuries received as the result of the steamship company's negligence could not be maintained; the decision being reated upon the language of section 1 of the act (Id. § 6604-1) above quoted, and apparently regarded by the court as absolutely abolishing the employee's right to maintain such an action in the courts and substituting therefor his right to compensation from the accident fund. The fact that the plaintiff had a right to seek his remedy in admiralty seems not to have been noticed in the case. We think, therefore, that the decision would not be a controlling authority here even if the question were a Federal one, as it manifestly is not, since it has to do, in its last analysis, only with the right to maintain a common-law action in the state courts.

Included in the enumeration of extrahazardous works in section 2 (Id. § 6604-2) of the act are "steamboats, tugs, ferries." If our conclusion rendered these words in the act meaningless, it might be argued with some show of reason that we are not correctly construing its provisions. There are, however, a number of inland navigable lakes wholly within the boundaries of this state having no navigable connection whatever with rivers or tide waters constituting navigable waterways to the high seas. It seems to be well settled that the jurisdiction of the state over such inland waters so unconnected with the high seas is exclusive, and that there is no Federal admiralty jurisdiction over such waters. Com v. King, 150 Mass. 221, 22 N. E. 905, 5 L.R.A. 536; Stapp v. Steam-Boat Clyde, 43 Minn. 192, 45 N. W. 430; U. S. v. Burlington, etc. County Ferry Co. 21 Fed. 331. It therefore seems plain that the words "steamboats, tugs, ferries" are not rendered meaningless by our construction of the act. We note in this connection that section [337] 2 (Id. § 6604-2) of the act, above quoted from, provides that "it is the purpose to embrace all of them [extrahazardous works] which are within the legislative jurisdiction of the state."

It is contended that the trial court had no jurisdiction to render the judgment in favor of the respondent which is here appealed from because it had previously rendered a final judgment of dismissal in appellant's favor upon its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Upon the return of the verdict, the clerk, by direction of the court, withheld entry of judgment thereon pending appellant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Thereafter that motion was argued and decision thereon taken under advisement by the court. Thereafter the trial judge announced in open court, in substance, that he had concluded to grant appellant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, when it evidently was understood by the court and counsel for both parties that judgment be prepared accordingly; and since the ground upon which the court was inclined to so hold was that respondent had no right of action in the courts because of the passage of our workmen's compensation act, it apparently was then contemplated that judgment of dismissal would be prepared in such form that the question of respondent's right to maintain the action in the light of our workmen's compensation act might be presented to this court upon a short record. The matter was to be postponed until counsel could prepare some such form of judgment. However, at that time the clerk of the court did make a brief minute entry which could be construed as a final judgment of dismissal of the case in harmony with the views then expressed by the court. This entry was made without the knowledge of the court or of counsel for either party as to its contents. Thereafter, counsel for both parties were again before the court for the purpose of having formal judgment entered, when the judge announced that he had reached a different conclusion upon further reflection and had become [338] of the opinion that the workmen's compensation act did not preclude respondent from maintaining this action, in view of the fact that his injuries resulted while he was in maritime service. Formal judgment was then prepared and entered accordingly, from which this appeal was taken. It was not until after this that the contents of the minute entry made by the clerk were discovered by either counsel or the court. Thereafter, on a proper showing and notice in the form of an order to show cause, the minute entry was set aside and expunged from the record upon the ground that the same had been entered by the clerk "inadvertently and through mischance." It seems plain to us that the showing was sufficient and warranting the court and so concluding and ordering in reference to that entry. It follows that the judgment here appealed from is the only judgment that was actually rendered in the case.

Some other claimed errors are relied upon by counsel for appellant. We think, however, that whatever technical error there may have been in the rulings so questioned, they were wholly without prejudice to the rights of appellant and that they do not call for further notice here. We conclude that the judgment must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

NOTE.

Maritime Employees as within Purview of Workmen's Compensation Act.

It is intended in this note to discuss the recent decisions passing on the question whether a maritime employee is within the purview of a workmen's compensation act. The earlier cases are collected in the note to Walker v. Clyde Steamship Co. Ann. Cas. 1916B 87.

In the recent case of Southern Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, Ann. Cas. 1917E 900, 37 S. Ct. 524, reversing 215 N. Y. 514, Ann.

Cas. 1916B 276, 109 N. E. 600, L.R.A.1916A 403, the Supreme Court of the United States has definitely established that a maritime employee may not be brought within the purview of a state workmen's compensation act. The decision in Clyde Steamship Co. v. Walker, 244 U. S. 255, 37 S. Ct. 545, reversing 215 N. Y. 529, Ann. Cas. 1916B 87, 109 N. E. 604, is to the same effect. Those decisions have been followed in other recent cases. See Hartman v. Toyo Kisen Kaisha Steamship Co. 244 Fed. 567; Tallac Co. v. Pillsbury (Cal.) 168 Pac. 17; Neff v. Industrial Commission (Wis.) 164 N. W. 845. And see the reported case.

It was said in Hartman v. Toyo Kisen Kaisha Steamship Co. supra: "The contention that plaintiff's claim is within the workmen's compensation act of the state (St. 1913, p. 279), and that jurisdiction accordingly rests exclusively with the industrial accident commission, has been settled adversely to defendant, since this case was submitted, in the very recent case of Southern Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 37 S. Ct. 524, 61 U. S. (L. ed.) 1086. In that case it was sought to uphold an award under the workmen's compensation act of New York (Consol. Laws, c. 67) for an injury received in a maritime transaction, as against the objection that that act had no application, that the jurisdiction in such cases was exclusively in the federal courts. . . . The present case is concededly of maritime origin, but it is suggested that the fact that plaintiff's duties were other than those of the ordinary seafaring man has the effect to take it without the principles of the Jensen case. But that case is not bounded by any such narrow lines."

In the following cases, decided prior to the Federal Supreme Court decision, maritime employees were held to be within the purview of the act and entitled to compensation. North Pac. Steamship Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 163 Pac. 199; Steamship Bowdoin Co. v. Pillsbury, (Cal.) 163 Pac. 204; Alaska Pac. Steamship Co. v. Pillsbury (Cal.) 163 Pac. 204; Lindstrom v. Mutual Steamship Co. 132 Minn. 328, 156 N. W. 669, L.R.A.1916D 935. And see Bjolstadt v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co. 244 Fed. 634.

It was held in Riegel v. Higgins, 241 Fed. 718, that an injured maritime employee did not by receiving compensation voluntarily paid under a compensation act lose his right to recover damages in admiralty for the negligence of his employer, the court saying: "Respondents, and very properly, urge upon the consideration of the court the uncertainties and injustices to which shipowners may be subjected if they are compelled to answer in the admiralty court after having paid to an injured employee the compensation provided for by the workmen's compensation act. I am of the opinion, however, that this act cannot and does not deprive the seaman of his right of action in the admiralty court for damages for injuries caused by the negligence of the shipowner in providing defective appliances. But if the injured seaman shall, as he may, subject himself to the state tribunals, and claim and receive the amount awarded under the act, or if by agreement, fairly entered into, the amount to be paid under the act is fixed, and he accepts it with full knowledge of the extent of his injuries, he should not later be permitted to maintain an action for the same injuries. But where, as here, the amount has been fixed by the employer, and not by any tribunal or agreement, and is not adequate, the seaman may pursue his remedy in the admiralty, and, if successful, the amount already received by him will be credited upon the amount of the judgment entered."

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY

v.

WINFIELD.

United States Supreme Court—May 21, 1917.

244 U. S. 170; 37 S. Ct. 556.

Employers' Liability Acts — Federal Act as Exclusive.

Congress intended the Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), regulating the liability of an interstate railway carrier in case of the injury or death of an employee when employed in interstate commerce, to be as comprehensive of those instances in which it excludes liability, i. e., where there is no causal negligence for which the carrier is responsible, as of those in which liability is imposed, and in both classes such act is paramount to, and exclusive of, state regulation.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915B 493.]

Employees within Act — Engineer of Switch Engine.

An employee of an interstate railway carrier in charge of a switch engine who is killed while leaving the yards after his day's work, which includes employment in both interstate and intrastate commerce, is employed in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), governing the liability of such carriers for the death or injury of their employees when employed in interstate commerce.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914C 164; Ann. Cas. 1916E 472; Ann. Cas. 1918B 55.]

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Employees within Act — Employee of Interstate Railroad.

The operation of the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), governing the liability of interstate railway carriers for the death or injury of their employees while employed in interstate commerce, cannot be interfered with by a state either by putting the carriers and their employees to an election between the provisions of that statute and a state workmen's compensation act, as is attempted by N. J. Laws 1911, chap. 95, or by imputing such an election to them by a statutory presumption.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.

Action by Amy L. Winfield, plaintiff, against Erie Railroad Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in Court of Common Pleas, Hudson county. Judgment reversed by Supreme Court of New Jersey, and latter judgment reversed by Court of Errors and Appeals. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

George S. Hobart and Gilbert Collins for plaintiff in error.

Harry Lane for defendant in error.

[171] VAN DEVANTER, J.—This was a proceeding under a New Jersey statute, c. 95, Laws 1911, against a common carrier by railroad, engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce, to obtain compensation for the death of one of its employees. The employee was in charge of a switch engine in the carrier's extensive yard at Croxton, New Jersey, and was switching freight cars about in the yard, especially to and from a transfer station. The cars usually contained package freight and many were moved in the course of a day's work. In some the freight was interstate, in others intrastate and in still others it was of both classes. This was true of the cars moved on the day in question. In concluding his work for that day the employee took his engine to the place where it was to remain for the night and started to leave the yard. His route lay across some of the tracks and while passing over one he was struck by an engine and received injuries from which he soon died. No causal negligence was alleged or proved and both parties assumed there was none. In these circumstances the trial judge, while not doubting that the fatal injury occurred in the course of the deceased's employment, held that he was not then employed in interstate commerce and that compensation should be made under the state statute to the widow. A judgment in her favor was entered, but was reversed by the Supreme Court of the State, which concluded that the deceased's employment at the time of the injury was in interstate commerce and that the case was controlled by the Employers' Liability Act [172] of Congress (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584) which makes negligence the test of the carrier's liability or obligation. That judgment was in turn reversed by the Court of Errors and Appeals, which, although assuming "that the conclusion of the Supreme Court as to the character" of the deceased's employment at the time of the injury "was justified by the facts proved," regarding the federal act as without bearing, because affording no remedy and imposing no liability in the absence of causal negligence. 88 N. J. L. 619, 96 Atl. 394.

The questions presented for decision are these: First, whether the federal act is regulative of the carrier's liability or obligation in every instance of the injury or death of one of its employees in interstate commerce, or only in those instances where there is causal negligence for which the carrier is responsible. Second, whether the facts proved sustain the conclusion that the deceased was employed in interstate commerce at the time of the injury. Third, whether by reason of the state statute the carrier became bound contractually to make compensation in this instance, even though it came within the federal act.

The first question is fully considered in New York Cent. R. Co. v. Winfield, the opinion in which has been just announced, 244 U. S. 147, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1139, 37 S. Ct. 546, and it suffices here to say that, for the reasons there given, we are of opinion that the federal act proceeds upon the principle which regards negligence as the basis of the duty to make compensation and excludes the existence of such a duty in the absence of negligence, and that Congress intended the act to be as comprehensive of those instances in which it excludes liability as of those in which liability is imposed. It establishes a rule or regulation which is intended to operate uniformly in all the States, as respects interstate commerce, and in that field it is both paramount and exclusive.

The second question must be given an affirmative answer. [173] In leaving the carrier's yard at the close of his day's work the deceased was but discharging a duty of his employment. See North Carolina R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, 260, Ann. Cas. 1914C 159, 34 S. Ct. 305, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 591. Like his trip through the yard to his engine in the morning, it was a necessary incident of his day's work and partook of the character of that work as a whole, for it was no more an incident of one part than of another. His day's work was in both interstate and intrastate commerce, and so when he was leaving the yard at the time of the injury his employment was in both. That he was employed in interstate commerce is therefore plain, and that his employment also extended to intrastate commerce is for present purposes of no importance.

The third question requires some notice of the New Jersey statute. It consists of two parts. One conforms to the principle which regards negligence as the basis of liability and excludes liability in the absence of negligence. In its details, however, that part differs materially from the federal act. The other conforms to a different principle which rejects negligence as a basis of liability and requires compensation to be made by the employer wherever the injury or death of the employee is an incident of the service in which he is employed. This part is described as "elective" and is not to be applied unless the employer and the employee shall have agreed, expressly or impliedly, to be bound thereby and to surrender "their rights to any other method, form or amount of compensation or determination thereof." Respecting the mode of manifesting such an agreement or the contrary, it is provided that every contract of hiring "shall be presumed to have been made" with reference to this part of the statute and, unless the contract or a notice from one party to the other contain "an express statement in writing" to the contrary, it "shall be presumed" that the parties "have agreed to be bound" by this part of the statute. There was no express agreement in this instance and there is no [174] basis for regarding the carrier as in any way bound by this part of the statute, save as it provides that an agreement to be bound by it shall be presumed in the absence of a declaration to the contrary. But such a presumption cannot be indulged here, and this for the reason that by the federal act the entire subject, as respects carriers by railroad and their employees in interstate commerce, was taken without the reach of state laws. It is beyond the power of any State to interfere with the operation of that act, either by putting the carriers and their employees to an election between its provisions and those of a state statute or by imputing such an election to them by means of a statutory presumption. The third question therefore must be answered in the negative.

It follows that the Court of Errors and Appeals erred in failing to give controlling effect to the federal act.

NOTE.Railroad Employees as within Purview of Workmen's Compensation Act.

Introductory, 664.

Employee Engaged in Interstate Commerce, 664.

Employee Engaged in Intrastate Commerce, 664.

Street Railway Employee, 665.

Introductory.

When the note to Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Commission, Ann. Cas. 1914D 655, was written, there was no other case which dealt with the question whether railroad employees were within the purview of a workmen's compensation act. The rule therein laid down was fortified by several decisions cited in the annotation to Winfield v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1916A 817. Since the last cited note, the authorities dealing with this phase of the subject have been quite numerous.

Employee Engaged in Interstate Commerce.

While a few early cases took the view that a railroad employee engaged in interstate commerce was entitled to claim compensation under a state workmen's compensation act, it has now been definitely settled by the United States Supreme Court that railroad employees or their representatives cannot recover under a state workmen's compensation act for injuries or death arising out of acts connected with their employment in interstate commerce. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 147, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1139, 37 S. Ct. 546, reversing 216 N. Y. 284, Ann. Cas. 1916A 817, 110 N. E. 614. That decision has been followed in a number of recent cases. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Knapp, 233 Fed. 950, 147 C. C. A. 624; Waters v. Guile, 234 Fed. 532, 148 C. C. A. 298; Smith v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 26 Cal. App. 560, 147 Pac. 600; Grybowski v. Erie R. Co. 89 N. J. L. 361, 98 Atl. 1085, affirming 88 N. J. L. 1, 95 Atl. 764; Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. (N. J.) 101 Atl. 182, reversing 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392, and following the ruling laid down in the reported case. Flynn v. New York, etc. R. Co. (N. J.) 101 Atl. 1034; Saxon v. Erie R. Co. 221 N. Y. 179, 116 N. E. 983; State v. Bates, etc. Constr. Co. 91 Wash. 181, 157 Pac. 482. And see the reported case. Compare West Jersey Trust Co. v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 88 N. J. L. 102, 95 Atl. 753.

By the Federal Employers' Liability Act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584) Congress has undertaken to cover the subject of the liability of railroad companies to their employees while engaged in interstate commerce. This exertion of a power which is granted in express terms must supersede all legislation over the same subject by the states. It therefore follows that in respect to state legislation prescribing the liability of such carriers for injuries to their employees while engaged in interstate commerce the federal act is paramount and exclusive. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Knapp, 233 Fed. 950, 147 C. C. A. 624. So it has been held that an employee engaged as a railroad watchman who was injured in attempting to eject trespassers from an interstate train, could not claim any relief under a workmen's compensation act. Smith v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 26 Cal. App. 560, 147 Pac. 600.

The decisive question in determining the applicability of a workmen's compensation act to an employee of an interstate railroad being whether he was at the time of the injury engaged in interstate commerce, the cases passing on the applicability of the federal employers' liability act are in point, every employment included in that act being excluded from the workmen's compensation acts. For these cases see the notes to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens, Ann. Cas. 1914C 163; Shanks v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1916E 467; and Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Winters, reported ante, this volume, at page 54.

Employee Engaged in Intrastate Commerce.

A railroad employee is within the purview of a workmen's compensation act, if at the time of the injury he is not engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act. New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A. 1917D 1; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 273 Ill. 528, L.R.A. 1916F 540, 113 N. E. 80; Nevich v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. (N. J.) 100 Atl. 234, L.R.A. 1917E 847; Flynn v. New York, etc. R. Co. (N. J.) 101 Atl. 1034; Parsons v. Delaware, etc. Co. 167 App. Div. 536, 153 N. Y. S. 179, appeal dismissed in 216 N. Y. 710, 111 N. E. 1093; Watts v. Ohio Val. Electric Co. 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659. See also Truman v. Kansas City, etc. Co. 98 Kan. 761, 161 Pac. 587.

Thus it was held in New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, supra, that a night watchman charged with the duty of guarding tools and materials intended to be used in the construction of a new station and new tracks on a line of intrastate railroad, in which occupation he was injured, was not engaged in interstate commerce, and was accordingly within a state workmen's compensation act.

[1916] 1 K. B. 970.

Similarly it was held in Chicago Junction R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 512, 115 N. E. 647, that the fact that the claimant who was injured while engaged in repairing an empty freight car partly dismantled and which was used indiscriminately for intrastate as well as interstate commerce as occasion required, was entitled to the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Law, since the shops and tracks leading into them were not used at any time as an agency in interstate commerce as such.

Not every employee of an interstate carrier is engaged in interstate commerce, and unless his work constitutes a substantial part of the interstate commerce in which the carrier is engaged, he will when injured be entitled to compensation under a workmen's compensation act. Dickinson v. Industrial Board (Ill.) 117 N. E. 438.

An employee is not engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal act to the exclusion of the Workmen's Compensation Law, where his work consists of preparing materials which are subsequently designed to be used for transportation in interstate commerce. Sullivan v. Chicago, etc. Co. 163 Wis. 583, 158 N. W. 321.

Street Railway Employee.

Street railway employers are liable to injured employees for compensation under the state workmen's compensation acts. Chicago Rys. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 534; McCabe v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 177 App. Div. 107, 162 N. Y. S. 741; Watts v. Ohio Val. Electric Co. 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659; Canadian Northern R. Co. v. Green, 9 Sask. 371, 30 Dominion L. Rep. 546. See also Bloomington, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 239, 114 N. E. 517.

Thus in Chicago Rys. Co. v. Industrial Board, supra, it was held that the defendant street railway company was engaged in an occupation which brought it under the provisions of the Illinois Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 which provides that employers engaged in extrahazardous occupations are conclusively presumed to be under the act unless they file a written election to the contrary. It appeared in that case that the workman in his application for employment as a motorman agreed to assume all risks of accidents resulting from his own negligence while in such employment and to acquit the defendant company of all liability for any personal injury suffered by him while in such employ. The workman was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and the commission made an award in favor of his estate under the workmen's compensation act. The court held that the appellant's contention that it was not subject to the provisions of the act by virtue of the contract between it and the deceased was without merit, since the workmen's compensation act was the declared public policy of the state on the subject embraced in the statute, and provided the sole method by which employers might exempt themselves from providing and paying compensation under the act of employees for accidental injuries sustained and arising out of and in the course of the employment, viz., by electing not to come under the act; that it was contrary to the policy of the act to allow an employer, while choosing to come under its provisions, to relieve itself from liability thereunder by a private agreement or contract with an employee.

However, in order that compensation may be had under the New York act for an injury to a street railway employee, the injury must be sustained in connection with or as an incident of the hazardous employment. McCabe v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 177 App. Div. 107, 162 N. Y. S. 741. In Brown v. Richmond Light, etc. Co. 173 App. Div. 432, 159 N. Y. S. 1047, it was held that the workmen's compensation act did not apply to a case where the decedent was employed as a process server, claim adjuster and investigator for the company and was returning to the office of the defendant, riding on one of its cars, when a fellow passenger stepped on and injured his foot.

EARWICKER

v.

LONDON GRAVING DOCK COMPANY, LIMITED.

England—Court of Appeal—March 23, 1916.

[1916] 1 K. B. 970.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Medical Examination of Workman.

An application by the employer for a medical examination of an injured workman claiming the benefit of the workmen's compensation act is not a nullity because it was not made until the hearing, and while it may be that the trial judge may in his discretion deny an application made at that time, he must rule on it. Accordingly where no note of the proceeding was taken, and no ruling on the application appears, a new trial must be granted.

[See note at end of this case.]

Medical Referee — Duties.

A medical referee sitting as an assessor with the judge hearing a claim under the workmen's compensation act should not be permitted to cross-examine witnesses or otherwise take part in the conduct of the hearing.

[70] Appeal from an award of the judge of the City of London Court sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

The applicant in this case was a boiler-maker in the employ of the respondents, a firm of ship repairers. On November 30, 1914, while engaged in his work, he was injured by a small piece of steel which entered his right eye and ultimately destroyed the sight of it. The [71] respondents paid him 1*l.* a week down to September 17, 1915, when they discontinued their weekly payments on the ground that he had recovered from the accident and was able to work again. The applicant then commenced proceedings for an arbitration. The case was in the list for hearing at the City of London Court on January 10, 1916, but was not reached. On January 26, 1916, the respondents' solicitors wrote to the applicant asking him to submit himself for medical examination by their doctor. To this request the applicant made no reply. On February 1 the respondents gave notice that they intended to apply on February 4 for an order under Sched. I. par 4, of the Act suspending the right of the applicant to continue the proceedings on the ground that he had refused to submit himself for medical examination. On February 4 the case came on for hearing, when counsel for the respondents applied for the suspension of the applicant's right to compensation on the ground that he had declined to undergo a medical examination. It appeared that he had already been medically examined several times, the last occasion being on January 5. After hearing counsel for the applicant, who asked him to go into the question whether there had been an unreasonable refusal to submit to an examination, the judge determined to proceed with the hearing.

There was evidence that the applicant as a one-eyed man was incapable of following his employment, which involved going about in dangerous and ill-lighted places in the interior of ships.

The judge found that the applicant was unfit to resume his former work and awarded him 1*l.* a week compensation during total or partial incapacity. This weekly payment represented half the difference between 1*l.* 10*s.* per week which the applicant was found to be able to earn as an injured man and the sum of 3*l.* 10*s.* per week which he earned before the accident.

The employers appealed on the grounds (1.) that the judge was wrong in law (a) in refusing to decide the question of the reasonableness of the applicant's refusal or neglect to submit himself for medical examination in accordance with the provision of Sched I. par. 4, of the Act, and (b) in rejecting the evidence tendered by the respondents in that behalf. (2.) That the judge was wrong in law in permitting the medical assessor at the hearing to examine and cross-examine the witnesses. (3.) That there was no evidence to [72] support an award of more than a declaration of liability to which the respondents had already submitted or agreed to submit.

At the hearing of the appeal it appeared that the county court judge had taken no note at all of the proceedings before him, but, in accordance with the practice in the City of London Court, a note of the evidence was taken by the shorthand writer attached to the Court. The transcript, however, did not contain any note of the submissions of counsel, and counsel did not agree in their recollections of what actually took place, it being contended on the part of the applicant that the respondents' objection had been abandoned, this being disputed by counsel for the respondents.

It further appeared that in the county court the medical assessor, who sat with the judge, was allowed by him to put a number of questions to the witnesses as to the capacity for work of a one-eyed man, and as to the value of such a man in the labour market.

[73] LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an anxious case. The applicant some time ago met with a serious injury to one eye; compensation was paid for a considerable time, and it was then stopped because his employers thought that he was able to work again. There had been several medical examinations of the man. There were two or three examinations before the case came into the paper on January 10. The desire of the employers, however, for a further examination was made quite manifest by the letter of January 26. That was a formal letter asking for another examination, and with a view of bringing the case within par. 4 of the First Schedule the solicitors asked that the trial might be adjourned in order that there might be an examination. That application was renewed by counsel when the case came on on February 4. I think it is a fallacy to say that the Court had seisin of the case on January 10; the case was not reached, it was not part heard, and certainly I do not think that the Court was seised of the case on January 10 in any sense which is material for the purpose of to-day. It was not even called on, it was simply not reached; it went over, if I may use a colloquial expression, until the next Court day, which was February 4. When that day was reached an application was made by counsel for the respondents in the terms of the letter. Counsel for the applicant said it was too late to ask for an adjournment, because the Court had seisin of the matter, and the application ought not to be granted, but the learned judge, after apparently hearing counsel for the respondents again (though it is not clear whether he did so or not), said: "I will go on with the case and let this stand over until the end of the case and then I will see what is to be done." The case went on, the learned judge sitting with a medical assessor; it was obviously impossible to try the case without one.

[974] What was the duty of the learned judge? As to this duty under r. 36 I decline to say one word more than I have said in previous cases; and I do not think that I can make more emphatic what I consider to be the duty of the learned judge in these cases. It has been suggested that although the learned judge took no note whatever of this case (that is that his registrar tells us), still the fact that there is an official shorthand writer in the City of London Court exempted the learned judge from that duty. I do not assent to that view. The parties may if they are so minded take the not unreasonable course of agreeing that the official shorthand writer's notes of the evidence shall be taken as accurate, giving the learned judge an opportunity of seeing the transcript and adopting it as his note. If that course is taken no objection can be raised, but it is a very serious hardship in these cases that there should be no available note or record for this Court of the evidence which was taken except upon the terms of the parties paying a very considerable sum for the shorthand writer's transcript of what took place. In the present case we are told that the cost of the transcript of the evidence alone was 4*l.* 12*s.* That is a very serious matter indeed, whereas if the learned judge had taken a reasonable note of the evidence it would have been much shorter; and the cost of taking a copy of his notes is something very trivial and unimportant, and in no sense a burden on the workman as compared with the cost of taking a transcript of the shorthand writer's notes. It is not a question of the evidence only in this case, for it is said that a question of law was raised of which there was no note, about which I certainly do not propose to express any final view. It is argued that under Sched. I. par. 4, you cannot have a compulsory examination after the Court has seisin of the case, and that the Court had seisin of the case on January 10. The learned judge did not express any opinion about that. No note was taken by the official shorthand writer to show what took place at the end of the trial. It is quite plain that in the correspondence before the case came on the employers asked for an examination under par. 4, and that counsel asked for it at the beginning of the hearing. We are invited to presume that at the end of the trial he did not persist in it, being a wise man and knowing what the medical evidence had been, and being afraid, in fact, to persist in it. There is a difference of opinion between counsel as to [975] what took place. What is this Court to do? With all respect to the learned judge, I think this is a case in which he has neglected the duty imposed upon him by r. 36, and has thus put upon this Court an impossible task. It is quite impossible for us to say what did take place. It is certain, I think, that the learned judge did not from first to last indicate any view whatever as to whether the application for an adjournment ought or ought not to be acceded to. He did not express any view whatever as to whether there had been unreasonable conduct by the applicant in obstructing the examination. We are therefore not in the least in a position to say whether the application was one which ought or ought not to have been acceded to. If the learned judge had heard the application and had given reasons one way or the other, it is extremely probable that we should not have interfered with his discretion, but as he has exercised no discretion in the matter, I do not see what we can do except to send the matter back for a new trial.

There is another point to which I desire to refer. The learned judge was sitting quite properly with a medical assessor. The medical assessor in this case seems to me to have taken a part which was quite outside and beyond his duties. In one of the authorities referred to, Lewis v. Port of London Authority, 7 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 577, 588, a passage was quoted from the judgment of Pickford, L.J., who defined, in language which I think cannot be misunderstood, the functions and the duties of a medical assessor. He is an assessor to assist the learned judge upon points as to which his expert knowledge may render assistance; he is not there to conduct an examination or a cross-examination—I care not which you call it—of a more or less hostile character to one side or other in the case; his duty is simply and solely that of assisting the learned judge by his expert knowledge to arrive at a proper conclusion, there being points raised which the learned judge cannot be assumed to know without being aided by a medical assessor. He is not a witness, of course; he cannot be cross-examined, and he certainly ought not to take up the position of cross-examining witnesses at length; and he ought not to take up the case as if he were leading counsel for one side or the other. Upon that ground also I think that this trial was very unsatisfactory, and it seems to me that all we can do is to say with [976] regret that there must be a new trial of this case because it was not properly tried.

PHILLIMORE, L. J.—I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said upon both points.

As regards the first matter there was a question of law raised under the First Schedule of the Act, par. 4, which says that a workman shall if so required submit himself to an examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner, and if he refuses or obstructs the same his right to take or prosecute any proceeding shall be suspended until such examination has taken place. The Courts have put a construction on the word "obstruct" which is quite reasonable, and there are cases in which an employer may require a workman to be examined or further examined, and the workman may refuse, and the Court may or may not hold that he has improperly refused or that he has obstructed, but it then becomes a question for the decision of the learned judge or arbitrator who hears the matter, whose discretion, if he properly exercises it, is not likely to be successfully impugned. Here there is no doubt that towards the end of January the employers applied by letter and in February by a notice that the workman should submit himself to a further examination. There is no doubt he had been examined, and when the hearing took place on February 4 counsel for the employers took this preliminary point and asked that the man should be further examined by one of their doctors, and that either the case should be adjourned or that the final decision should be left open until that examination had taken place; to which answer was made by counsel for the workman in substance that this was a very unreasonable application, that the man had been examined at no very distant date, and it was wrong to take advantage of the fact that the case had not been reached on the day it was put down for hearing, to wit, January 10, but had been necessarily postponed and agreed to be postponed to February 10 in order to try to put in force this paragraph in the schedule. Speaking for myself, I think that it was a reasonable point to urge before the learned judge as a reason why he should decide the question left to him under par. 4 in favour of the workman, but if put as a kind of estoppel that the learned judge could not require it because the parties had waited until after the date when the case was first in the list for hearing, I [977] do not think the point was a good one. I do not think the learned judge could say "This is so late that I have no jurisdiction to entertain the point." He might have said "This application is made so late that for that and other reasons I do not think it is one to which I should accede." However, what we do know is that the learned judge, after hearing counsel for the employers and counsel for the workman in answer and counsel for the employers in reply, said, "I will go on with the case: anyhow I can go on with the whole case and leave this point open until the end." What happened at the end, and how far what happened at the end can be elucidated by the final speech of counsel for the employers, is unfortunately a matter upon which we have no accurate knowledge. Counsel before us were present at the trial in the county court; as I understand, the recollection of one is that he still insisted on his point that there ought to be this examination; the recollection of the other is, not that he formally withdrew it, but that by not insisting on it he was legitimately taken to have dropped it. That being the case, and we being in difficulty as to what did happen, we are deprived of that source of information which would have been conclusive and which the Legislature has intended that we should have. Under r. 36 it is the duty of the arbitrator or of the learned judge to take a note of any question of law raised and of the facts in evidence in relation thereto and of his decision thereon. That rule differs, as has been pointed out, from the general rule regulating county court procedure under which the duty of the learned judge to take a note does not arise until the party before him has requested him to take a note of the material evidence and of the point of law and of his decision thereupon. Under r. 36 he has to do it without request, and this Court has so held—indeed it was necessary for the Court so to hold—under the direct words of the rule. Now the learned judge has taken no note. Application has been made to him, and through the registrar he says he has taken none. That is prima facie a contravention of the rule, but it is said that by custom in the City of London Court, and at the expense of the City up to a point, there is a paid shorthand writer who takes notes and whose notes are available to the parties upon their paying the cost of a transcript. That is not a burden which except by consent can be put upon the parties. I do not understand that the City pays for the cost of a transcript; [978] indeed it would be unreasonable to expect that it should. There was no note taken here by the county court judge. It is suggested that so settled is the practice in the City of London Court that everybody is to be taken to have understood it, but I think it would be unwise to trust to that. But assuming that a shorthand writer's note signed and certified by the learned judge may, by consent of the parties, be substituted for and be deemed a sufficient compliance with r. 36, we find that the note in this case is deficient on the very points which have to be determined by us. There is no note of the speeches of either counsel at the end. It is apparent from the shorthand writer's note that Mr. Duckworth did address the Court; it is not quite so apparent that Mr. Shakespeare did. Mr. Duckworth states he did, and I understand Mr. Shakespeare does not wish to be understood to contradict him. There is no record of what was said, and we are left with this: At the end of the cross-examination of the last witness for the defence an observation by the learned judge is reported; then these words appear: "Mr. Duckworth addressed the Court;" and then this follows, which it is agreed was said by the Court, although I do not know that the shorthand writer's note shows that it was: "He is not fit to go back as a charge hand. I think he is entitled to 1l. a week as compensation;" and then there was a discussion about costs. With regard to the question whether this point of law was maintained—or I will put it in another way, whether the point of law which had been taken was waived—the record is entirely silent. What we do know, because both counsel take the same view, is that the learned judge passed no opinion upon it at all. We do know from the note presented to us that he reserved it to the end, and it is common ground that he said nothing about it at the end. That being the case, we really must have this matter properly tried and properly recorded. The learned judge not having passed his opinion upon this matter, we have no sufficient reason to suppose that he was relieved from doing so, and it being something which he ought to have passed his opinion upon, upon that ground alone the case ought to go back for a new trial.

Then it was said by Mr. Shakespeare—and I do not want to disregard the argument—"If you will allow me to read the official shorthand writer's notes of the medical evidence you will see that the respondents could not have the face to ask for this adjournment [979] after what came out." I do not see the force of that. I have glanced at the evidence, I have not properly read it through, but I have taken in Mr. Shakespeare's favour that which he has argued, that the hospital doctor for the employers had examined the man on January 5 and had taken a view unfavourable to the employers, and when called as a witness expressed a view unfavourable to the employers. I assume all that. From one point of view that is all the more reason why the employers should wish, if they had to go into Court to fight with that doctor's evidence before them, as long before as January 5, to have a further examination which they think may displace even the opinion of the hospital doctor whom they have employed, and whom, having nobody else to call, they called. Therefore, giving due weight to that argument, I see no sufficient reason why there should not be a new trial.

With regard to the other matter, I do not want to be understood to put within too narrow bounds the way in which the medical assessor should be allowed to elicit information which ought to be before the Court and upon which ultimately he may have to advise his principal, the learned judge. It is enough to say that he was allowed by the learned judge in this case to take an undue share in the trial and to usurp duties which were not his.

SARGANT, J.—I am also of opinion that this case should go back for a new trial, and I will add but a few words.

As regards the duty of the learned judge to take a note, it seems to me that these arbitrations constitute some of the most important business that comes before the county courts, and r. 36 of the Rules, which have statutory effect, was deliberately made an imperative rule and in no way dependent upon the request of one of the parties. Secondly, with regard to the important question of fact, whether there was a withdrawal by Mr. Duckworth of his application for the suspension of the right to compensation, I think I ought to say this. Counsel have very properly, in the absence of any shorthand note of the whole of what took place, declined to contradict each other, or to commit themselves to statements which might be not in accordance with the recollection of the opposing counsel. But there are two circumstances which seem to me extremely important: in the first place had the application once been properly made, it seems to me [980] that the onus lies on him who alleges that it was withdrawn or waived; and in the second place I attach great importance to the fact that Mr. Duckworth, while the matter was still fresh in his mind, only a few days after the trial had taken place—I think seven days after the date of the trial—in his notice of appeal raised this very point. It seems to me that that confirms his recollection on the point rather than that of Mr. Shakespeare.

Introductory.

The earlier cases construing the provisions in the various workmen's compensation acts respecting the medical examination of workmen together with the earlier statutes providing for such an examination are collected in the note to Major v. South Kirby, etc. Collieries, Ann. Cas. 1914C 86. It is the purpose of the present note to discuss the recent cases passing on this question and to set forth the provisions in the recent acts.

English Statute.

It was held in Smith v. Davis [1915] 31 Times L. Rep. 356, W. C. & Ins. Rep. 299, that the English compensation act (Paragraph 4 of Schedule 1) does not limit the employer's right to a single examination, where a further examination appears to be reasonable and necessary. The court said: "The contention put forward on the appellant's behalf that these and other evils would follow if a workman were bound to submit himself to more than one examination has, therefore, no substance in it, and will not bear a moment's examination. One of the objects of the act and of the rules in the schedule attached to it clearly is that settlements of claims for compensation should, if possible, be arranged by agreement between the employer and the workman. Nothing, I think, would be more calculated to defeat that object, and nothing could be more opposed to common sense and reason, than to require that an employer should make up his mind definitely in all cases on the result of one examination whether he would or would not resist the workman's claim. In the present case, for instance, three months elapsed between the date of the first examination and the demand for the second. A still further time might, and in many cases does, elapse. The employer, and indeed the workman, are both interested in having a medical examination made as soon after the accident as possible, in order that both of them may be able to fix the time when the incapacity to work, if it supervened, had commenced. Again, such symptoms of bodily hurt in their early stages might be of such an obscure nature that it would be quite impossible to ascertain on one examination whether they would soon abate or pass away, or whether some incapacity more or less permanent might not supervene. Of course if the language of rule 4 be so plain that it admits of no other construction than that contended for by the appellant, one must adopt that construction, however irrational, absurd, or mischievous the result; but, unless one is coerced to adopt a construction from which such consequences may follow, it ought not to be adopted. It is in my view clear that the words of rule 4 need not be read as if the words 'once but only once' were written into it between the words 'submit' and 'himself.' The 'submitting himself for examination' provided for is a 'process,' not a single act. It may necessitate one or more acts to effect its object—namely, to ascertain the bodily condition of the sufferer. I think that rule 15 strongly supports this conclusion, inasmuch as the concluding words of the first paragraph of that rule, 'or at more frequent intervals than may be prescribed by those regulations,' cannot be confined in their application to rule 14. I think these words apply equally to rule 4, and, if so, they indicate conclusively that more than one act of submission to examination was contemplated in the framing of this fourth rule. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that the county court judge had jurisdiction to make the order which he did make, and that the judgment appealed from was right and should be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed with costs." See also the reported case.

A workman entitled to compensation under the act, for injuries sustained while in the course of his employment, cannot be said to have refused to submit to a medical examination, when it appears that he had enlisted in the army and had been sent to India. Harrison v. Dowling [1915] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 218, 8 B. W. C. C. 544, wherein the court said: "An accident occurred to the workman, and his employers paid him compensation at varying rates, which are not now material. Last September the man enlisted in the Territorials, in the East Surrey Regiment, and by order of the military authorities his regiment has been sent to India, and the man is at present at Cawnpore with the regiment. An award had been made on February 4, 1913, of 15s. a week, and the employers having stopped payment of this, the workman applied to issue execution, and, according to the usual procedure in these cases, the employers met this by an application to terminate the award. They then desired to have him medically examined, but were told that he was in India, and they now say that under Sched. I, clause 14, of the act the payment of compensation ought to be suspended. This clause provides as follows: 'Any workman receiving weekly payments under this act shall, if so required by the employer, from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer. If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place.' I cannot find that there has been any refusal by the workman to submit to any examination. I am quite aware of the correspondence between the solicitors, but there is certainly nothing in this amounting to a refusal to submit to examination. Nor do I see that there is any evidence that he is obstructing the same. His being in India with his regiment, under military control, does not seem to me to amount to obstruction within the meaning of that clause. I am not at all satisfied that he might not be required by the employers to submit to examination in India by a duly qualified practitioner, it may be the regimental surgeon at Cawnpore. It seems to me that might be the case."

In Chuter v. Ford [1915] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 113, 8 B. W. C. C. 160, it was held that where a workman, who, on the certificate of the examining physician that he was suffering from a cerebral hemorrhage due to the nature of his employment, applied to the certifying surgeon for a disabling certificate, an appeal might be taken to the medical referee from the refusal of the surgeon to grant the application, and that the decision of the referee that the applicant was entitled to the certificate, was conclusive. The court said: "I have come to the conclusion that the certificate of the medical referee in a case like this is conclusive as to the nature of the industrial disease and the date of the accident, that is to say the date of disablement, and also as to the fact that the man was suffering from that disease, not at the date of the medical referee's certificate, but at the date of the certifying surgeon's certificate."

In the reported case it is held that a request for an examination is not a nullity so as to dispense with a ruling thereon because it is first made at the hearing.

American Statutes.

UNITED STATES.

A federal compensation act more recent than that set out in the previous note (Act of Sept. 7, 1916, c. 458, Fed. St. Ann. Pamph. Supp. No. 8, p. 145) contains the following provision respecting the medical examination of employees of the United States, injured in the performance of their duties: "Sec. 21 [Submission of injured employee to examination by physician, etc.] That after the injury the employee shall, as frequently and at such times and places as may be reasonably required, submit himself to examination by a medical officer of the United States or by a duly qualified physician, designated or approved by the commission. The employee may have a duly qualified physician designated and paid by him present to participate in such examination. For all examinations after the first the employee shall, in the discretion of the commission, be paid his reasonable traveling and other expenses and loss of wages incurred in order to submit to such examination. If the employee refuses to submit himself for or in any way obstructs any examination, his right to claim compensation under this act shall be suspended until such refusal or obstruction ceases. No compensation shall be payable while such refusal or obstruction continues, and the period of such refusal or obstruction shall be deducted from the period for which compensation is payable to him."

Under the original Federal Act of 1908 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 330) civilian employees, injured in the government service, were required to submit themselves for medical examination once in six months. The section providing for such examination was construed in the case of In re Haynes, Op. Sol. Dept. of Labor 761, wherein it was maintained that as the law required an examination every six months, one who had suffered the loss of his hand, could not recover compensation for a greater period of time. The solicitor said: "The law provides for a medical examination at least once in six months, and the secretary cannot approve payment of compensation for a longer period than six months at a time, the presumption being that such medical examination may reveal that the claimant by that time has recovered sufficiently to resume his work. The precise question as to whether an injury is permanent or not cannot arise under this act, which provides only for compensation for incapacity for work. The continuance of the injury is only important for the purpose of ascertaining when the injured party is able to resume work. The six months' period has been fixed for further examination to ascertain that fact. There is no doubt that the disability in this case will continue for six months. Such conclusion may be assumed as a matter of fact. Claimant's position as a brakeman on a dirt train made of him a laborer depending entirely for his livelihood upon the work of his hands, and it would take him a long time to adjust himself to his changed condition sufficiently to make a living in other pursuits. At any rate, the loss of his right hand disabled him for doing the manual labor of his usual avocation. It is my opinion, therefore, that he should be compensated for loss of time for six months subject to the right of continuance of such compensation for another period of six months thereafter if at the end of the first period he is still found to be incapacitated for work."

Although a workman was bound under the earlier act to submit himself for examination, the failure of the secretary of labor to provide for an examination did not bar the claimant's right to compensation under the act. In re Villafranca, Op. Sol. Dept. of Labor 762, wherein it was said: "I do not mean to say, however, that the secretary would be justified in ignoring the provision. It should be complied with as an expression of the legislative intent, but if, for any reason, the secretary does not require the examination, the right of the employee to compensation is not defeated. The examination may be made after the expiration of six months, and, so far as the statute is concerned, the employee does not lose his right to the compensation between the expiration of the six months' period and the date of the examination. It should be borne in mind, however, that where the secretary has authorized the payment of compensation limited to a 'period of six months beginning with the date of the accident,' no compensation beyond such period can be paid until further authority is given by the secretary." See also In re Mayott, Op. Sol. Dept. of Labor 765.

Examination by a naval surgeon has been held to be an examination within the act where it was requested by the secretary of labor. In re Villanueva, Op. Sol. Dept. of Labor 765.

COLORADO.

The Colorado Workmen's Compensation Act (Sess. Laws 1915, S. B. No. 99, c. 179, p. 515) contains the following provision with reference to the medical examination of workmen: "Whenever, in case of injury, the right to compensation under this act would exist in favor of an employee, he shall, upon the written request of his employer, or the insurer carrying such risk, submit himself from time to time to examination by a physician or surgeon duly authorized to practice medicine under the laws of this state, who shall be provided and paid for by the employer or insurer and shall likewise submit to examination from time to time by any regular physician selected and paid for by said commission, or a member, or examiner thereof. The employee shall be entitled to have a physician provided and paid for by himself present at any such examination. So long as the employee, after such written request of the employer or insurer, shall refuse to submit himself to such examination, or shall, in any way, obstruct the same, his right to collect or to begin or to maintain any proceeding for the collection of compensation shall be suspended; and if he shall refuse to submit to such examination, after direction by the commission, or any member or examiner thereof, or shall in any way obstruct the same, his right to weekly indemnity which shall accrue and become payable during the period of such refusal or obstruction, shall be barred. If any employee shall persist in unsanitary or injurious practice which tends to imperil or retard his recovery, or shall refuse to submit to such medical or surgical treatment as is reasonably essential to promote his recovery, the commission may, in its discretion, reduce or suspend the compensation of any such injured employee. Any physician who shall make, or be present at, any such examination, may be required to testify as to the results thereof. Any physician having attended an employee in a professional capacity, may be required to testify before the commission when it shall so direct. Physicians will not be required, however, to disclose confidential communications communicated to them for the purpose of treatment and which are unnecessary to a proper understanding of the case."

INDIANA.

The Indiana Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1915, c. 106) contains the following provision with reference to the medical examination of workmen: "Sec. 27. After an injury and during the period of resulting disability, the employee, if so requested by his employer or ordered by the industrial board, shall submit himself to examination, at reasonable times and places, by a duly qualified physician or surgeon designated and paid by the employer or the industrial board. The employee shall have the right to have present at any such examination any duly qualified physician or surgeon provided and paid by him. No fact communicated to, or otherwise learned by, any physician or surgeon who may have attended or examined the employee, or who may have been present at any examination, shall be privileged, either in the hearings provided for in this act, or any action at law brought to recover damages against any employer who may have accepted the compensation provisions of this act. If the employee refuses to submit himself to or in any way obstructs such examination, his right to compensation and his right to take or prosecute any proceeding under this act shall be suspended until such refusal or obstruction ceases, and no compensation shall at any time be payable for the period of suspension unless in the opinion of the industrial board the circumstances justify the refusal or obstruction. The employer, or the industrial board, shall have the right in any case of death to require an autopsy at the expense of the party requiring the same."

KENTUCKY.

The provision of the Kentucky Workmen's Compensation Act (Acts 1916, S. B. No. 40, c 33, p. 354) with reference to the medical examination of workmen is as follows: "Sec. 37. After an injury and so long as compensation is claimed, the workman, if so requested by his employer or the board, shall submit himself to examination, at reasonable time and places, to a duly qualified physician or surgeon designated and paid by the employer. The employee shall have the right to have a duly qualified physician or surgeon designated and paid by himself present at such examination, which right, however, shall not be construed to deny to the employer's physician or surgeon the right to visit the injured employee at all reasonable times and under all reasonable conditions. If an employee refuses to submit himself to or in any way obstruct such examination his right to take or prosecute any proceedings under this act shall be suspended until such refusal or obstruction ceases and no compensation shall be payable for the period during which said refusal or obstruction continues."

LOUISIANA.

The Louisiana Workmen's Compensation Act (Act No. 20, op. 1914; H. B. No. 150; Acts Reg. Sess. 1914, p. 44, as amended) contains the following provision with reference to the medical examination of workmen: "§ 9. Be it further enacted, etc., That an injured workman shall submit himself to examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid for by the employer, as soon after the accident as demanded, and from time to time thereafter, as often as may be reasonably necessary and at reasonable hours and places, during the pendency of his claim for compensation or during the receipt by him of payments under this act."

MAINE.

The provision of the Maine Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1915, c. 295) with reference to the medical examination of workmen is as follows: "§ 21. The employee shall after the injury, at all reasonable times during the continuance of his disability, if so requested by his employer, submit himself to an examination by a physician or surgeon authorized to practice medicine under the laws of this state, to be selected and paid for by the employer. The employee shall have the right to have a physician or surgeon selected and paid for by himself, present at such examination of which right the employer shall give him notice when requesting such examination. The chairman of the commission may at any time after the injury appoint a competent and impartial physician or surgeon to act as a medical examiner, and the reasonable fees of such medical examiner shall be fixed and paid by the commission. Such medical examiner being first duly sworn to the faithful performance of his duties before any justice of the peace, or any clerk of the supreme judicial court, shall thereupon and as often as the chairman of the commission may direct, examine such injured employee in order to determine the nature, extent and probable duration of the injury. Such medical examiner shall file a report of every examination made of such employee in the office of the commission, and a copy thereof certified by the clerk of said commission may be produced in evidence in any hearing or proceedings to determine the amount of compensation due said employee under the provisions of this act. If such employee refuses to submit himself to examination provided for in this act, or in any way obstructs any such examination, his rights to compensation shall be suspended and his compensation during such period of suspension may be forfeited."

MASSACHUSETTS.

Construing the provision for medical examination in the Massachusetts workmen's compensation act, set out in the earlier note, in McLean's Case, 223 Mass. 342, 111 N. E. 783, wherein it appeared that an injured employee had given notice of his injury to a foreman and had replied to a letter written by the insurer requesting him to have an examination made, indicating his willingness to comply with the statute, a finding by the board that the employee did not refuse to be examined or in any way obstruct the examination, was sustained.

MONTANA.

The Montana statute (Laws 1915, c. 96) contains the following provision with reference to the medical examination of workmen: "§ 13. (a) Whenever in case of injury the right to compensation under this act would exist in favor of any employee, he shall, upon the written request of his employer or the insurer, submit from time to time to examination by a physician, who shall be provided and paid for by such employer or insurer, and shall likewise submit to examination, from time to time, by any physician selected by the board, or any member or examiner, or referee thereof. . . . § 13. (b) The request or order for such examination shall fix a time and place therefor, due regard being had to the convenience of the employee and his physical condition and ability to attend at the time and place fixed. The employee shall be entitled to have a physician, provided and paid for by himself, present at any such examination. So long as the employee, after such written request shall fail or refuse to submit to such examination, or shall, in any way obstruct the same, his right to compensation shall be suspended. Any physician, employed by the employer, the insurer, or the board, who shall make or be present at any such examination may be required to testify as to the results thereof."

NEW JERSEY.

Under the provision of the New Jersey workmen's compensation act relative to the medical examination of workmen, set out in the earlier note, it has been held that an announcement that an employee would refuse to submit to a medical examination, made before the arrival of the physician, did not constitute a refusal to submit to a medical examination. Birmingham v. Lehigh, etc. Coal Co. (N. J.) 95 Atl. 242, wherein it was said: "The claim that petitioner refused to submit to medical examination at the trial is not substantiated. Before prosecutor's physician arrived, petitioner's counsel announced that they would not consent to an examination. But no demand appears to have been made after the physician arrived, and the anticipatory refusal, if it may be so called, did not lead prosecutor to countermand him, for he appeared and was sworn as a witness."

OKLAHOMA.

With reference to the medical examination of workmen the Oklahoma Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1915, c. 246) provides as follows: "§ 9. An employee injured claiming or entitled to compensation under this act, shall, if requested by the commission, submit himself for medical examination at a time, and from time to time, at place reasonably convenient for the employee, and as may be provided by the rules of the commission. If the employee or the insurance carrier request he shall be entitled to have a physician or physicians of his own selection to be paid by him present to participate in such examination. If an employee refuses to submit himself to examination, his right to prosecute any proceeding under this act shall be suspended, and no compensation shall be payable for the period of such refusal."

PENNSYLVANIA.

The provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act of Pennsylvania (Laws 1915, No. 338, p. 736) with reference to the medical examination of workmen is as follows: "§ 314. At any time after an injury the employee, if so requested by his employer, must submit himself for examination, at some reasonable time and place, to a physician or physicians legally authorized to practice under the laws of such place, who shall be selected and paid by the employer. If the employee shall refuse, upon the request of the employer, to submit to the examination by the physician or physicians selected by the employer, the board may, upon petition of the employer, order the employee to submit to an examination at a time and place set by it, and by the physician or physicians selected and paid by the employer, or by a physician or physicians designated by it and paid by the employer; and if the employee shall, without reasonable cause or excuse, disobey or disregard such order, he shall be deprived of his right to compensation under this article. The board may at any time after such first examination, upon petition of the employer, order the employee to submit himself to such further examinations as it shall deem reasonable and necessary, at such times and places and by such physicians as it may designate; and, in such case, the employer shall pay the fees and expenses of the examining physician or physicians, and the reasonable traveling expenses and loss of wages incurred by the employee in order to submit himself to such examination. The refusal or neglect, without reasonable cause or excuse, of the employee to submit to such examination ordered by the board, either before or after an agreement or award, shall deprive him of the right to compensation, under this article, during the continuance of such refusal or neglect, and the period of such neglect or refusal shall be deducted from the period during which the compensation would otherwise be payable."

The employee shall be entitled to have a physician or physicians of his own selection, to be paid by him, participate in any examination requested by his employer or ordered by the board."

VERMONT.

The Vermont Workmen's Compensation Act (Acts 1915, No. 164, p. 275) contains the following provision with reference to the medical examination of workmen: "When application is made to said board under the provisions of the preceding section, said board may appoint a duly qualified and impartial physician to examine the injured employee and to report to said board. The fee for such physician's services shall be five dollars, and traveling and hotel expenses, but the board may allow additional reasonable amounts in extraordinary cases. Said fees and expenses shall be paid by the state, on presentation of accounts approved by the board."

WEST VIRGINIA.

The West Virginia workmen's compensation act does not appear to contain a provision requiring injured workmen to submit to a medical examination.

WYOMING.

The Wyoming Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1915, c. 124, House Bill No. 147) contains the following provision with reference to the medical examination of workmen: "Sec. 30. Any workman awarded compensation for temporary total disability under this act, as defined by clause (c) of Section 19 hereof shall, if thereafter requested by his employer, submit himself for medical examination by a physician licensed to practice medicine in this state, at a place designated by the employer and which shall be reasonably convenient for the workman, and said workman may have a licensed physician present of his own selection. The purpose of such examination shall be to determine whether the workman has recovered so that his earning power at any kind of work is restored. If it be agreed that the workman has recovered so that his earning power at any kind of work is restored, the fact shall be reported by the employer and said physician to the judge of the district court who made the award in the first instance, or if there be a dispute, as to the recovery of the workman and his restoration to earning power, it shall be likewise reported to said judge by filing a statement in either case in the office of the clerk of the district court of the county where the award was made and the matter shall be disposed of in such manner as said judge may deem proper under the facts. If said judge find that said workman has recovered and has been restored to his earning power and that compensation should be discontinued, his decision and judgment in the premises shall be certified to the state auditor and state treasurer and shall be authority and direction to said officers to discontinue compensation payments. If the workman in such case refuse to submit to such examination or obstructs the same, his right to monthly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place, and no compensation shall be payable during or for account of such period or refusal."

STETZ

v.

F. MAYER BOOT AND SHOE COMPANY.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—March 14, 1916.

163 Wis. 151; 156 N. W. 971.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Workmen within Act — Minor Illegally Employed.

Under Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1915, §§ 2394—1 to 2394—31), § 2394—7, subd. 2, declaring that the term "employee" as used in the law shall include every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, including minors who are legally permitted to work under the laws of the state, who for the purposes of section 2394—8, relating to election by employees, shall be considered the same and have the same power of contracting as adult employees, plaintiff, who was under sixteen years of age at the time of his employment and injury, and who had not obtained a written permit authorizing his employment under St. 1915, § 1728a, subd. 1, forbidding the employment of children between fourteen and sixteen in any factory, etc., unless there is first obtained from the commissioner of labor, etc., a written permit authorizing the employment of such child, is not an "employee" whose claim for injury is governed by the workmen's compensation law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Infants — Action for Injuries — Defenses — Misrepresentation as to Age.

Under St. 1915, § 1728a, subd. 1, prohibiting the employment of any child between the ages of fourteen and sixteen at work in any factory, etc., without first obtaining the written permit therein specified, and section 1728h, declaring that any employer including a corporation violating section 1728a, subd. 1, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to fine or imprisonment, an employer of a child having no permit cannot defend on the ground that its foreman was reasonably justified under all the facts in relying on his representation that he was more than sixteen years of age; since the employer's violation of the statute constitutes a criminal offense, classed with gross negligence, and makes him liable in a civil action for injury resulting from such violation of law.

Same.

Under St. 1915, § 1728a, subd. 1, forbidding the employment of children between fourteen and sixteen in any factory, etc., without first obtaining the permit therein specified, the violation of which is made by section 1728h a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment, plaintiff, under sixteen, who misrepresented his age to defendant's foreman when he was employed, is not thereby estopped from recovering damages for the injury in such employment, as the statute is declaratory of a public policy, and is aimed at the master and not at the servant.

Release by Guardian — Effect.

A release given by plaintiff's guardian to the employer in whose service he had been injured, on the ground that plaintiff's claim against the employer was regulated by the Workmen's Compensation Law, does not settle the claim for damages for injury resulting from his wrongful employment in violation of St. 1915, § 1728a, subd. 1, forbidding employment of children between fourteen and sixteen, without permit, etc., and if so intended is not binding because it was not approved by the county court as expressly required by section 3982.

[See 17 Ann. Cas. 608.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Milwaukee county: ESCHWEILER, Judge.

Action by Peter Stetz, by his guardian ad litem, plaintiff, against F. Mayer Boot and Shoe Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[152] This is an action to recover damages resulting from personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant company.

The defendant is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes in the city of Milwaukee. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant, and while operating a heelpress machine he was injured. At the time the plaintiff was injured he was less than sixteen years of age and had no permit authorizing his employment. The plaintiff went with his father and uncle to the home of the foreman of the defendant company to apply for work. They represented to defendant's foreman that plaintiff was then sixteen years of age. Sometime after plaintiff was injured he went to the liability insurance company which carried insurance for the defendant, and a settlement of $287.84 was agreed upon as the maximum allowed under the Workmen's Compensation Law. Plaintiff's guardian signed a release for this amount. This settlement was approved by the industrial commission, but was not approved by the county court of Milwaukee county. The court submitted a special verdict to the jury, who found (1) that the plaintiff was less than sixteen years of age at the time he was employed by the defendant; (2) that the plaintiff represented to the defendant's foreman at the time he was employed that he was more than sixteen years of age; (3) that the plaintiff's father, at or prior to plaintiff's employment, represented to the defendant's foreman that plaintiff was more than sixteen years of age; (4) that the foreman was justified in the exercise of proper vigilance, in the light of plaintiff's appearance, in relying upon the representations that the plaintiff was more than sixteen years of age; (5) that there were no false and fraudulent representations knowingly made by any one, on behalf of the defendant or the insurance company, to the plaintiff or his father as an inducement to the [153] signing of the release of plaintiff's claim; (8) that there was not gross negligence on plaintiff's part which contributed to his injury; (9) that if plaintiff is entitled to recover his damages are $985.

The court awarded judgment on this verdict dismissing plaintiff's complaint with costs. From such judgment this appeal is taken.

Doe, Ballhorn, Wilkie & Doe for respondent.

SIEBECKER, J.—Are the rights of the parties to this action governed by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Law, secs. 2394—1 to 2394—31, Stats. 1915, inclusive? By sub. (2) of sec. 2394—7 of this act the term "employee" as used in the Workmen's Compensation Law shall include "Every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, including aliens, and also including minors who are legally permitted to work under the laws of the state (who, for the purposes of section 2394—8, shall be considered the same and shall have the power of contracting as adult employees)." The plaintiff was less than sixteen years of age at the time of his employment and injury. He had not obtained "a written permit authorizing the employment" of him, under sub. 1, sec. 1728a, which forbids the employment of children "between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years . . . in any factory or workshop, . . . or at any gainful occupation, or employment, directly or indirectly, unless there is first obtained from the commission of labor . . ." or other specified officers "a written permit authorizing the employment of such child within such time or times as the said commissioner of [154] labor . . . " or other officers "may fix; . . . " If the plaintiff's legal remedy for the injury he suffered is governed by the Workmen's Compensation Law, then the defendant has discharged its obligations toward him by the settlement made with him under this law, which received the formal approval of the industrial commission.

The plaintiff, being under sixteen years of age at the time of employment and not having obtained a written permit authorizing his employment as provided by sub. 1, sec. 1728a, could not be legally employed by defendant for the service at which he was engaged and in which he suffered his injuries. The terms of sub. (2), sec. 2394—7, which confers on minors the power to contract for employment the same as adults, clearly limit the power so conferred to minors "who are legally permitted to work under the laws of the state." It seems plain that the statute includes only such minors who at the time of contracting are legally authorized to enter the employer's service. The legislative intent evidently is to enable any minor who has the legal right to work to make a contract for his employment as same as adults, and if he has the legal authority to exercise this right then he "shall be considered the same . . . as adult employees" for the purposes of sec. 2394—8 of the Workmen's Compensation Law. The provisions of this statute can only apply to minors who are at the time of contracting to enter the service of another authorized and permitted under the law to engage in such service and employment the same as adults.

It is urged that the Workmen's Compensation Law applies to and includes all minors in the service of others, who, under the law, may upon specified conditions and circumstances obtain a permit authorizing their employment, without first obtaining the permit provided by law. This contention runs counter to the terms of the Compensation Law and the provisions of other statutes prohibiting the employment of children under certain ages. The interpretation of sub. (2), sec. [155] 2394—7, as applied in Foth v. Macomber, etc. Rope Co. 161 Wis. 549, 154 N. W. 369, does not include the instant case. In that case the minor who was injured was at the time of entering the service legally authorized to engage in the occupation for which he contracted to work, but at the time of injury he was working at a machine at which he was forbidden to work, and it was held that, since the minor was legally authorized to make that contract of employment, for the purposes of sec. 2394—8 he must be considered the same as an adult employee, and that under the facts and circumstances shown he was injured while "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment." The language of the court in the decision of the Foth Case must be understood and interpreted in the light of the facts of that case. When so read and properly restricted in its application, the phraseology employed in construing the statutes therein referred to does not conflict with the interpretation of the law in its application to this case. From the foregoing it necessarily results that the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Law do not govern the rights of the parties to this case.

The question then arises whether or not the defendant is liable in damages to the plaintiff under the law applicable to persons having the relation which is shown to have existed between plaintiff and defendant when the accident happened. The provisions of sub. 1, sec. 1728a, prohibit the employment of any child between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years to work in any factory or workshop, etc., without first obtaining a written permit as therein specified. Sec. 1728a declares that any employer, including a corporation, violating the provisions of sec. 1728a shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to fine or imprisonment. It is without dispute that defendant's employment of plaintiff, under the facts found by the jury, was a violation of these statutes and makes the defendant liable in damages to plaintiff, unless the finding of the jury to the effect that defendant's foreman was reasonably [156] justified, under all the facts and circumstances, in relying on plaintiff's representation that he was more than sixteen years of age, bars the plaintiff's right to a recovery of his damages. In Pinoza v. Northern Chair Co. 152 Wis. 473, 140 N. W. 84, it was held that in an action for injuries to a boy under sixteen years of age which resulted from his employment by the defendant in that case in violation of sec. 1728a, Stats. 1911 (ch. 338, Laws 1909), in an "employment dangerous to life and limb," the defense of contributory negligence is not available, and that such a violation of the statute, constituting a criminal offense, is classed with gross negligence as defined in our law and makes the person liable in a civil action for the injuries resulting from such violation of the law. The basis of that decision rests essentially, as there declared, on these propositions:

"If a person purposely does an act in violation of a duty created by law as regards the personal safety of others, and the policy of the written law is that the prevention of such violations is so important that a person guilty thereof should in addition to civil liability to the injured person be held criminally liable as for a serious offense against the public, the act should be regarded as done regardless of human life or bodily injury . . . ; thus classing the act of the wrongdoer with ordinary acts of gross negligence. . . . The principle thus stated is in harmony with general public policy. Every one is presumed to know the law, even though as a matter of fact he may be ignorant of it."

Lenahan v. Pittston Coal Min. Co. 218 Pa. St. 311, 67 Atl. 642, 120 Am. St. Rep. 885, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461; Stehle v. Jaeger Automatic Mach. Co. 220 Pa. St. 617, 14 Ann. Cas. 122, 69 Atl. 1116; Strafford v. Republic Iron, etc. Co. 238 Ill. 371, 87 N. E. 358, 128 Am. St. Rep. 129, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 876.

Upon the facts of this case the defendant, under the doctrine as applied in the Pinoza Case, is liable to plaintiff for the injuries he sustained as a result of such unlawful employment of him by the defendant unless plaintiff's misrepresentation of his age to defendant's foreman, as found by [157] the jury, operates as a bar to plaintiff's right to recover damages for his injuries. As has been indicated in the decisions of this court, the liability in this class of cases is predicated on the tort arising from the act which the law denounces as a crime as distinguished from liability arising from acts of ordinary negligence. In those cases it is said of the act of the employer in employing a minor in violation of the law, which results in injury to the minor, "The fault was advertent in character. There was an actual or constructive intent to violate the law, equivalent, as indicated, to a constructive intent to cause the consequences which the law was designed to prevent." Under the law as here established the record now before us presents no case within the law of negligence, and all precedents in other jurisdictions, of which Koester v. Rochester Candy Works, 194 N. Y. 92, 16 Ann. Cas. 589, 87 N. E. 77, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 783, is representative, have no application to this case because it and others similar in their character go on the grounds of negligence.

The inquiry then arises, Is plaintiff estopped from recovering his damages in this case by misrepresenting his age to defendant's foreman at the time he was employed? The object of the provisions of sec. 1728a, Stats., is to conserve the health and morals of children in the interest of the general welfare. It is declaratory of a public policy and makes all employments of children contrary to its provisions criminal acts, and we do not deem it permissible for the court to so construe the statute and restrict its operative effect that it would not harmonize with this clear legislative intent. To permit an employer to protect himself against the consequences resulting from his violation of this law by the plea that he acted with reasonable diligence to avoid a breach of it, would seriously restrict and modify the beneficial objects for the protection of children which the legislature obviously intended to accomplish. The Pinoza Case points out the fact that the statute is undoubtedly taken from a similar one [158] in the state of Illinois and was there construed, before this state enacted it, in American Car, etc. Co. v. Armentraut, 214 Ill. 509, 73 N. E. 766. In that case the injured child had misrepresented his age, and it was urged that such misrepresentation was a bar to his recovery in an action for injuries resulting from the illegal employment. The court held: "This doctrine is not applicable for the reason that the statute under consideration is aimed at the master and not at the servant. The act of the child in accepting or entering into the employment is not unlawful." In the case of Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 87 N. E. 229, 139 Am. St. Rep. 389, where a minor brought action for injuries he suffered from a violation of a statute of this class, the court, after a thorough review of the grounds upon which the policy of such statutes rests, holds that a minor is not barred or estopped from recovering damages for such injuries by his misrepresenting his age. This rule was also enforced in the following cases wherein this question was presented for decision: DeSoto Coal Min. etc. Co. v. Hill, 179 Ala. 186, 60 So. 583; Synszewski v. Schmidt, 153 Mich. 438, 116 N. W. 1107; Kirkham v. Wheeler-Osgood Co. 39 Wash. 415, 4 Ann. Cas. 532, 81 Pac. 869; Matlock v. Williamsville, etc. R. Co. 198 Mo. 495, 95 S. W. 849, 115 Am. St. Rep. 481. In Eliot v. Eliot, 81 Wis. 295, 51 N. W. 81, 15 L.R.A. 259, the question whether an infant who is incapable of entering into a marriage contract for want of age is estopped by a fraudulent declaration of his age, which induced a marriage with him, was negatived upon the ground that an infant who is legally incapacitated to make a valid contract of marriage is incapable also to estop himself by such fraudulent representation. The case of Grauman, etc. Co. v. Krienitz, 142 Wis. 556, 126 N. W. 50, holds that a minor may by his own fraud estop himself from assailing a contract on the ground of infancy, but it is declared that the rule rests upon certain conditions, and that: "It is confined to cases where the infant, though under legal discretion, is in fact developed to the condition of actual discretion. It is further confined to cases of actual fraud and [159] where the contract or transaction is beneficial to the minor." The doctrine as applied to minors is there held to be closely fenced about: "(1st) By necessity for actual discretion; (2d) necessity for actual fraud; (3) necessity for beneficial nature of the transaction to the minor." An attempt to class the instant case as within the foregoing rules would necessarily fail because the employment of the plaintiff in violation of the law is obviously not a transaction which can in any light be considered beneficial to the minor. It necessarily follows from what has been said on the foregoing questions that defendant's contention respecting its rights to enforce a counterclaim for damages resulting from the minor's fraudulent misrepresentation of his age must fail. As indicated, these misrepresentations of the plaintiff afford no legal ground on which defendant can predicate a claim against the minor.

The release given by plaintiff's guardian was based on the ground that the plaintiff's claim against defendant was regulated and controlled by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Law. Manifestly there was no intent to settle the plaintiff's claim against defendant under the law for damages for his injuries resulting from his wrongful employment in violation of the law. Furthermore, if it is claimed that the release included this claim for damages, it is not binding on plaintiff because it was not approved by the county court as is required by sec. 3982, Stats. The guardian's power is limited by the law, and his acts which the law does not sanction are not binding on his ward.

BY THE COURT.—The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court with direction to award judgment in plaintiff's favor for the recovery of the damages found by the jury.

NOTE.

Person Employed in Violation of Law as Entitled to Compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act.

General Rule.

The cases involving the question whether a person employed in violation of law is entitled to compensation under a workmen's compensation act, are in the main confined to those which deal with the unlawful employment of minors; and the general rule to be deduced from the authorities is that a workman's compensation act does not cover illegal contracts of employment, but is based on the existence of a lawful contract of employment and from the foundation of such a contract regulates the compensation to be paid for injuries growing therefrom. See the reported case.

Thus it was said in Hetzel v. Wasson Piston Ring Co. 89 N. J. L. 201, 98 Atl. 306, L.R.A.1917D 75: "It can hardly be doubted that the legislature, in providing for the ingrafting of these statutory provisions on contracts of hiring, had in mind contracts which were valid in law, or, at least, contracts the making of which was not prohibited by express legislative enactment; for it would be entirely unreasonable to attribute to the legislature the intention of adding terms to a contract of hiring which it had already prohibited the parties thereto from making." In reversing the dismissal of a common-law action for injuries brought by an infant the court said further: "Was, then, the contract in the present case a valid one? A mere reference to chapter 64 of the laws of 1904 (Pamph. L. p. 152) furnishes a complete answer to this query. This act regulates the age, employment, safety and work hours of persons employed in factories, workshops, mills and all places where the manufacture of goods of any kind is carried on, and its first section is that 'No child under the age of fourteen years shall be employed, allowed or permitted to work in any factory, workshop, mill or place where the manufacture of goods of any kind is carried on; any corporation, firm, individual, parent or guardian of any child who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty of $50 for each offense.' The basis of the judgment below is that there was a contract of hiring by which the plaintiff became the employee of the defendant. That there was such a contract, either express or implied, clearly appears from the facts set out in the plaintiff's complaint. That the contract was in violation of this statute, and that the making thereof was absolutely prohibited thereby, cannot be questioned; for it will hardly do to say, as is suggested by counsel, that the employer and the parent of the minor can by joint agreement deprive the child of the protection of this statute by a payment of $50 as a penalty for a violation of its provisions. The purpose of the statute cannot be thwarted in any such way. Its primary object is the protection of children who are too young to appreciate the dangers arising out of work in places such as those described in the act. And in order to make the protection complete the legislature left no loophole for the escape from its provisions of either the employer or the parent. It says to the employer, 'You shall not employ any child under the age of fourteen years in your factory; you shall not allow or permit him to work there.' It says to the parent of such a child, 'You shall not allow or permit your boy or girl to work in such a place until he or she has reached the age of fourteen years.' Having declared this absolute prohibition, how can it logically be said that the legislature, by a subsequent enactment, recognized the right of the factory owner and the parent to disregard the mandate of this statute, and make a contract for the employment of the boy which might or might not have read into it the provisions of the workmen's compensation act, as the master and the parent between them should elect? It is said that there is nothing in the complaint which shows that the contract of hiring was made by the parent on behalf of the plaintiff, and not by the plaintiff himself. It is not necessary that this should appear. Ordinarily the parent is entitled to the services of the child, and the wages earned by the child, until he reaches his majority, and so contracts for the employment of the child are presumed to be made by the parent. But in this particular case it is immaterial whether the contract was that of the parent for the child, or of the child by his own act; for the prohibition of the Act of 1914 is not only against the making of contracts for the employment of minors under the age of fourteen in factories where the manufacture of goods is carried on, but against allowing or permitting him to work in any such factory; and so a contract of hiring which by its terms proposes to violate that act, is equally invalid whether made by the parent or by the child. We conclude, therefore, that the common-law right of action of the plaintiff arising out of the facts set out in his complaint has not at all been affected by the provisions of the workmen's compensation act." See also Hoey v. Superior Laundry Co. 85 N. J. L. 119, 88 Atl. 823.

It is immaterial that there is no causal connection between the youth of the workman and the injury received by him. Hillestad v. Industrial Insurance Com. 80 Wash. 426, Ann. Cas. 1916B 789, 141 Pac. 913.

In Westerlund v. Kettle River Co. (Minn.) 162 N. W. 680, a common-law action brought by a minor through his guardian to recover for injuries sustained in the course of his employment, the defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint contending in support thereof that the plaintiff's remedy was under the workmen's compensation act. In overruling the demurrer and deciding that the fact that the employment of the plaintiff was prohibited by statute rendered the compensation act inapplicable, it was said: "The question whether plaintiff's remedy is exclusively under the compensation statute depends: (1) Upon the construction to be given section 8230, G. S. 1913, wherein the legislature expressly declared what persons should be treated as within the compensation statute as employees; and (2) the scope and effect of sections 3848 and 3870, G. S. 1913, by which the employment of minors between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years is prohibited in the classes of work there stated. 1. The section of the compensation statute referred to provides that the term 'employee' shall include, among others, 'minors who are legally permitted to work under the laws of the state.' We are satisfied that this language will permit of no construction other than as stated in Pettee v. Noyes, 133 Minn. 109, 157 N. W. 995, namely, that the legislature intended thereby to exclude from the act minors whose employment is prohibited by law. This is made too clear for controversy when viewed in the light of the legal rights of minors in this state, and of our statutes affecting such rights, known as 'child labor laws.' In the absence of legislation to the contrary, all minors may lawfully engage in such employments or work as their age and capacity fit them, and in this respect are 'legally permitted' to work, though their contracts, except as to necessities, are voidable at their election. In fact, we have no statute expressly permitting the employment of minors, and the use of the words 'legally permitted to work' was not intended as a reference to permissive legislation. But we have statutes, and have had for many years, known as the child labor laws, by which the employment of minors of certain age is expressly prohibited in specified classes of employment deemed detrimental to their moral welfare and dangerous to their life or limb. And in making use of the language quoted it is apparent that the legislature intended to preserve the status of minors in respect to their employment in dangerous occupations, and to remove them from the compensation act when employed in violation of law. No other construction of the statute can be adopted that would not be in discord with our whole legislative policy upon the subject. This view is sustained by other courts. Stetz v. F. Mayer Boot, etc. Co. 163 Wis. 151, 156 N. W. 971; Stephens v. Dudbridge Iron Works Co. [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 225; Hetzel v. Wasson Piston Ring Co. [89 N. J. L. 201] 98 Atl. 306. It follows that the compensation act can have no application to the case of an injured minor who was employed in violation of any of the child labor laws of the state. 2. We turn then to the second question, namely, whether plaintiff's employment was in violation of any such laws. We answer the question in the affirmative. Plaintiff was just over fourteen years of age at the time of his injury. The facts with reference to the character of his work and the place where it was performed are stated in the complaint substantially as follows: Defendant's plant covers several acres of land upon which are located necessary buildings, stone crushers, coal sheds, hoisting derricks, stationary engines. The operating yard is traversed by railroad tracks, upon which defendant operates engines and cars in the movement of material in and about the works. At and near one of the tracks three large hoisting derricks are located, all equipped with necessary machinery and appliances, and operated by stationary engines. These derricks are used in loading heavy material upon cars to be carted out of the plant either for shipment, or to be dumped outside thereof as waste material. The waste material is referred to in the complaint as 'spalls.' The work of loading the spalls is described at some length in the complaint, not necessary here to repeat, but it is shown by the averments to be attended with danger to the workmen, particularly and especially to young boys of the age of plaintiff. Plaintiff was employed in that work, and also in connection with the movement of cars about the loading platform. He was injured by being run over by a car being shunted down the track leading to the loading department, the brakes upon which were either defective or out of repair, and which plaintiff was attempting to stop by placing a block in front of the moving wheels. This the complaint alleges was in accordance with the practice and custom adopted by defendant in handling such cars. That was of itself dangerous employment for a boy the age of plaintiff. Plaintiff was not engaged to operate nor to assist in operating machinery of any kind, though he was in close proximity thereto when in the discharge of his duties.

3. Was this such employment as the statutes of the state prohibit to minors of the age of plaintiff? This question must be answered by the construction to be given to sections 3848 and 3870, G. S. 1913. Those statutes in their present form are found in section 3, c. 316, Laws 1913, and section 2, c. 516, Laws 1913. So far as here material, the statutes are substantially the same, though section 3870 contains certain provisions, not here material, not found in section 3848. Both statutes prohibit or make unlawful the employment of minors under sixteen years of age in the particular kinds of work there enumerated, being of a kind naturally to expose the minor to danger of injury either physical or moral. The various provisions are too numerous to set out at length. The concluding clause, following the enumerated prohibited employments, reads: 'Nor shall they be employed in any capacity whatever in the manufacture of goods for immoral purposes, or any other employment dangerous to their lives or limbs or their health or morals.' The work for which plaintiff was employed by defendant does not come within any of the specifically enumerated employments, and his employment was rendered unlawful or forbidden, if at all, by this general clause, distinctly prohibiting the employment in any work which may endanger the life, limb, health, or morals of the minor. The employments specifically referred to in the statute embrace the operation or assisting in the operation of machinery, the preparation of any composition in which dangerous or poisonous acids are used, or in the manufacture of paints, colors, or white lead, or in the operation of any passenger or freight elevator, or the manufacture of goods for immoral purposes, following which is the general prohibition quoted. It is the contention of defendant that the general prohibiting clause following the specific enumerations must, under the rule of ejusdem generis, be held to refer to and include only such employments as are substantially similar to one of the classes so enumerated. We do not concur in that view of the statute. The rule invoked is one of construction, employed as an aid in determining the intent of the legislature, and the effect thereof should not be permitted to confine the operation of the statute within narrower limits than intended by the law makers. That, as well as all other rules of construction, has but one object in view, namely, the ascertainment of the intent of the statute. The general purpose of a statute, as disclosed by the provisions thereof, taken as a whole, often requires that the final general clause, inserted with a view of bringing within its scope matters not specifically mentioned, should not be restricted in meaning by the preceding specifications. . . . And when it appears that the legislature intended to go beyond the specifications, effect must be given that intent and the statute construed accordingly. The whole purpose of the legislature in the enactment of this statute; as clearly disclosed by its numerous provisions, was the protection of boys and girls from moral or physical harm who by reason of immature years presumptively are incapable of appreciating risks of injury which are incident to the particular employments. And it is manifest that the concluding clause was inserted for the express purpose of including any employment not embraced in those specifically mentioned which for the same reason might expose them to like dangers. It obviously was not intended as a limitation upon the scope of the statute, but rather as an enlargement thereof and to fully effectuate the protection intended thereby to be placed about the young and inexperienced minor child. This view is sustained by reputable authority. . . . It requires no extended argument or discussion to demonstrate that it is just as dangerous to a child to be set to work in a factory, machine shop or other like industry, where he will be hourly exposed to injury from machinery in operation, as to set him to work in operating or in assisting in operating of the same. Danger of injury of that character is what the legislature intended to guard against, and not especially the dangers incident to a particular employment. We therefore hold that the employment of plaintiff, as disclosed by the complaint, was prohibited by the statute referred to, and excludes the case from the Compensation Law."

In New York it seems that the fact that a minor is employed in violation of the Labor Law is no defense to a claim for compensation. Ide v. Faul, 179 App. Div. 567, 166 N. Y. S. 858.

Qualification of Rule.

In Pettee v. Noyes, 133 Minn. 109, 157 N. W. 995, it appeared that the plaintiff's son entered the defendants' service as an apprentice, intending to become an operator of an electric passenger elevator. After two weeks' tutelage, he operated the elevator alone in the tutor's absence, without a license as required by the statute, in which service he was injured. Thereafter the parties adjusted the compensation for which the defendants were liable under the workmen's compensation act and the adjustment was presented to and approved by the district court. In an effort thereafter to maintain a common-law action it was contended that the relation of master and servant did not exist between the parties since the son was not licensed and was therefore prohibited by law from operating the elevator so that the compensation statute had no application and any proceeding thereunder was wholly void. In denying that contention it was held that the original legal relation of master and servant continued until changed by some agreement of the parties express or implied, since it did not appear that the son was authorized to operate an elevator alone and the employment was therefore not unlawful.

In West Virginia it is not unlawful to employ an infant over fourteen years of age, and if injured he is confined to his remedy under the compensation act. Rhodes v. J. B. B. Coal Co. (W. Va.) 90 S. E. 796. See also Adkins v. Hope Engineering, etc. Co. (W. Va.) 94 S. E. 506.

Minors who have procured the necessary permit or certificate to permit them to work are "employees" in the same sense as adults and are embraced within a workmen's compensation act, though at the time of the injury they are engaged on a certain class of work not permitted by law. Foth v. Macomber, etc. Rope Co. 161 Wis. 549, 154 N. W. 369.

If a person who is a subcontractor, employs another in respect to the work which is the subject of the contract, the rights of the employee under the workmen's compensation act are not affected by an invalidity of the subcontract. Wausau Lumber Co. v. Industrial Commission (Wis.) 164 N. W. 836, wherein it was held that where a workman was employed by a subcontractor under a contract entered into on Sunday between the subcontractor and the principal contractor of the general employer, the workman's rights were not affected thereby.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Effect of Intoxication of Workman.

Where a workman sustains an accidental injury causing his death, while actually engaged in the performance of his duties and from a risk incident to his employment, his dependents are entitled to compensation under the workmen's compensation act though the proximate cause of the accident was the intoxication of the workman.

[See note at end of this case.]

Accident in Course of Employment — Disobedience of Orders.

A workman injured while engaged in performing a duty of his employment is none the less within the workmen's compensation act because in entering on that work he disobeyed an order to perform first another duty.

[101] Appeal from an award of the judge of the Carnarvonshire County Court sitting at Conway as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

[102] The applicant Ann Evans Williams, the widow of John Williams, a stableman, claimed compensation on behalf of herself and the two infant children of the marriage in respect of the death of her husband by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents.

The facts as found by the county court judge were as follows:—

"(1.) On the 31st of January, 1914, the deceased was engaged with the respondents as a stableman, his duty being to chop and mix feed for the horses and convey it to the various stables by carts.

"(2.) The loft in which the deceased had to chop hay for the horses was in Oxford Road, Llandudno, and was approached by a vertical ladder fastened and running parallel to but a little distance from the wall; and it was part of the deceased man's duty to ascend and descend the ladder.

"(3.) On the day in question the deceased was seen by the respondents' manager about 9 A. M. He was then sober and in a condition fit and proper for the discharge of his duties.

"(4.) At 12.30 the deceased, in the course of his employment was going up the ladder to the loft for feed for the top stable, and had got up about nine steps, when he slipped and fell sideways, striking his head against a window-sill, causing injuries from which he died on the 15th of February, 1914.

"(5.) At the time of the accident the deceased was under the influence of drink."

There was uncontradicted evidence that the deceased workman was told by the managing director of the respondents on the morning in question to wash certain motor cars, which he did not do, and that a fellow workman told him not to go up to the loft as he was not in a fit condition to do so.

The county court judge, after stating the findings of fact above set out, said that in his opinion slipping off the ladder was a risk incidental to the employment of the deceased; that his accident might or might not have been due to his intoxicated condition; and that if he had to decide the point he should say it was due to his intoxicated condition. But, on the above findings, if the [103] decision in Frazer v. Riddell (1914) W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125; 7 B. W. C. C. 841, was right, although that might rightly be called an accident due to the serious and wilful misconduct of the deceased, it was none the less an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment, and his award must therefore be for the applicant for the agreed sum of 186*l.* 15*s.* with the usual costs.

[105] LORD COZENS-HARDY, M. R. read the following judgment:—This appeal raises a question which has given rise to differences of judicial opinion, namely, how far drunkenness, or rather in what circumstances drunkenness, is an answer to a claim by dependants. In Frith v. Steamship Louisianian [1912] 2 K. B. 155, 159, a sailor at a foreign port was so hopelessly drunk that he could not walk and was brought along the quay by a negro just as his vessel was starting, and was pushed on board like a bag of sand. He rose from the deck, staggered, and fell overboard at a place where the rail had not been replaced, and he was drowned. It was held by this Court that the accident did not arise out of the employment, although the sailor was on the ship, but it was due to his drunken condition. In Nash v. Steamship Rangatira [1914] 3 K. B. 978, the [106] principle of Frith's Case [1912] 2 K. B. 155, 159 was, it may be, slightly extended, though I doubt it. There a sailor who had gone on shore with leave returned in a drunken condition along the quay. There was a gangway, a part of the ship, well constructed and properly lighted, and used both by the crew and passengers, including ladies. To a man not under the influence of drink it was perfectly safe. Before he reached the top of the gangway he let go of one of the guide ropes, swung round, and fell and broke his head. It was held by this Court, Pickford, L. J., dissenting, that the accident did not arise out of his employment, although it happened within the ambit of his employment on the ship and in a place more attended with risk than the quay itself.

These decisions are binding upon this Court, even if it should be held that the Scotch Courts have taken a different view of the law.

The authority principally relied upon in support of the alleged difference is Frazer v. Riddell [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125, 7 B. W. C. C. 841. There an engine driver, while driving a traction engine, fell off the footplate and was fatally injured. At the time he was under the influence of drink and unfit for his work, and the arbiter refused compensation and held that the accident did not arise "out of" his employment. But the Court of Session held that the man was actually performing the duty which he was employed to perform—namely, to drive the engine—although he was guilty of serious and wilful misconduct. I do not think there is any inconsistency between this case and Frith's Case [1912] 2 K. B. 155, 159 and Nash's Case [1914] 3 K. B. 978. It is rather like a case which I put by way of illustration in Frith's Case [1912] 2 K. B. 155, 159, that if a sailor, told to go aloft, does so, when in a state of intoxication, and meets with a fatal accident, that might be an accident arising out of the employment, notwithstanding his drunkenness.

The facts in the present case as found by the county court judge are as follows: [His Lordship read findings (1.) to (5.) above set out and also finding (6.), which was in the following terms: "In my opinion slipping off the ladder was a risk incidental to the employment of the deceased, and his accident may or may not [107] have been due to his intoxicated condition." He continued:] There is no finding that the ladder was not properly constructed or properly fastened. The only material finding is that the slipping off was "due to his intoxicated condition." I should add that there was uncontradicted evidence that he was told by the managing director on the morning in question to wash motor cars, which he did not do, and that a fellow workman told him not to go to the loft as he was not fit to do so. But it was his duty, and it seems to me his primary duty, to cut chaff, and for that purpose to go to the loft by ascending the ladder. I attach no importance to the circumstance that he did not on the morning in question first finish washing the motor cars.

The learned county court judge has held the dependants entitled to compensation. I think he was quite right in so holding. I do not propose to consider in detail the numerous authorities which have been called to our attention.

The true principle is this. A workman who, while doing an act which it was part of his duty to do, meets with an accident to which he is more exposed than persons not so engaged is—or in case of death his dependants are—entitled to compensation from the employer, although the act is done negligently or contrary to rules. I assume a case to which the defense of serious and wilful misconduct is not available. I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The county court judge stated the facts of the case as he found them. I will not read those findings again, as they have already been read by the Master of the Rolls. He held that the fatal accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased's employment, although also an accident due to his serious and wilful misconduct. This misconduct is not a defence, as the accident terminated fatally.

It was urged by the appellants (the employers) that the real cause of the accident was the drunkenness of the deceased, and therefore that his widow could not recover, although if he had been sober and the accident had happened, it might be said to have arisen out of and in the course of his employment. It was also urged that he had been told to wash a motor car, and that [108] he departed from the terms of his employment by proceeding to the loft before he had done that duty. It was also said that there was a conflict of authority on the point involved in the case.

The cases establish the proposition that if an accident occurs while the workman is acting within the scope of his authority, and is doing an act which it was part of his duty to do, and the accident arises from his being engaged in doing that act and being thereby exposed to a special risk beyond that of other persons not so engaged, the employer is liable to pay compensation, although the workman is doing the act negligently or contrary to rules laid down for his guidance. Illustrations of this, are furnished by Mawdsley v. West Leigh Colliery Co. [1911] 5 B. W. C. C. 80, where a workman was engaged to oil machinery, but told not to do so when it was in motion; and Chilton v. Blair & Co. [1914] 7 B. W. C. C. 607, where a workman was employed to turn a wheel in a rolling machine, but told not to do so sitting down.

If a state of facts is proved which brings the workman within the proposition I have stated, the fact that he was drunk when the accident happened, or indeed the fact that the proximate cause of the accident was his drunkenness, will not disentitle him or in the case of death his dependants from recovering compensation from his employer where death or serious and permanent disablement results.

There can be no doubt that it is serious and wilful misconduct for a man to be drunk at his work, but where death ensues this element may be disregarded in considering whether the workman is entitled to compensation.

In Frazer v. Riddell [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125, 7 B. W. C. C. 841, the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and the widow of the engine driver, who fell off the traction engine he was driving, was not precluded from recovering because the fall was due to the deceased's intoxicated condition. Intoxication is not of itself a defence in the case of fatal accidents.

In the other cases referred to in the argument the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment; the fact of the intoxication explained how the accident arose, but did not [109] prevent a workman from recovering who would otherwise have been entitled to do so.

In Murphy v. Cooney [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 44; 7 B. W. C. C. 962, the first mate, who took the wheel of the ship, when he came on board heavily under the influence of drink, had been ordered away from the wheel and to go below, as he was not in a fit condition to do his work, and he had thus been removed from his work before the accident happened.

In Renfrew v. M'Crae [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 195; 7 B. W. C. C. 898, the accident did not arise out of the employment. A commercial traveller at a railway station does not run any more risk of falling off the platform on to the line than any other intending passenger by train. The accident arose not from any special risk to which a commercial traveller is exposed by his employment, but only from the circumstance that he was intoxicated.

In Frith v. Steamship Louisianian [1912] 2 K. B. 155, the accident did not arise out of the employment. The sailor was brought back to the ship, hopelessly drunk, and pushed "like a sack of sand" on to the deck. Fletcher Moulton L. J. said that the accident had nothing to do with the employment, except that it occurred more or less in the place of employment, that is on board the ship. It arose entirely out of his state of drunkenness.

Nash v. Steamship Rangatira [1914] 3 K. B. 978, is to the same effect, and followed Frith v. Steamship Louisianian [1912] 2 K. B. 155. The man was on a part of the ship—that is the ship's own solid step gangway; it was an accident to a drunken man in the place of his employment. It was held that the principle of Frith's Case [1912] 2 K. B. 155, applied.

In my opinion the cases cited to us are not in conflict with each other, as contended, but are reconcilable as I have endeavoured to explain, and there is not any conflict of authority with regard to them.

The fact that the deceased had not washed the motor car, when going to the loft, which it was part of his ordinary work to do, will not prevent the claim from being sustained.

[110] In my judgment the award of the county court judge was correct, and this appeal should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L. J. read the following judgment:—In this case the county court judge has found that the man met with an injury by accident which caused his death, the accident being that when going up a vertical ladder to a loft, where he had to chop hay to provide feed for the horses in one of the stables under his charge, he slipped and fell sideways and struck his head.

He has further found (a) that the deceased was under influence of drink; (b) that the slipping off the ladder was a risk incidental to his employment; (c) that his accident may or may not have been due to his intoxicated condition; (d) that if he had to decide he should say that it was due to it; and, following the authority of the case of Frazer v. Riddell [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125, 7 B. W. C. C. 841, he has held that though due to the serious and wilful misconduct of the deceased it was none the less an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and he has made an award in favour of the applicant.

I think his conclusions of fact cannot be disturbed.

A point was taken for the employers that the man was not acting within his employment because he ought to have been doing some other part of his work first. I see nothing in this point. The work which he was engaged in was part of his work, perhaps taken out of due order. The accident therefore occurred in the course of the deceased's employment. I think also that the county court judge was right in holding that it arose out of his employment.

There was an element of risk in the task on which the deceased was engaged. It was a job in which a careless man might meet with an accident, might slip and fall, and his drunkenness made him careless.

The case is, as the county court judge thought, indistinguishable from Frazer v. Riddell [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125, 7 B. W. C. C. 841, where an intoxicated driver slipped and fell from the footplate of a traction engine. In the argument before us this case was fully discussed, as were [111] the following: Renfrew v. McCrae [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 195, 7 B. W. C. C. 898; Murphy v. Cooney [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 44; 7 B. W. C. C. 962; Frith v. Steamship Louisianian [1912] 2 K. B. 155; Nash v. Steamship Rangatira [1914] 3 K. B. 978. In these last four cases the decisions were against the applicants.

Renfrew v. McCrae [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 195, 7 B. W. C. C. 898, is, as is Frazer v. Riddell [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125, 7 B. W. C. C. 841, a decision of the Court of Session, and is a later decision. The Court in deciding against the applicant distinguished the two cases, and I think rightly. The element of intoxication is common to the two; but in the latter case it was unimportant. The deceased, a commercial traveller, might have had business in the town of Beith and said he was going to do business there; but there was no evidence that he did any. He may have gone there merely for a jaunt with his fellow traveller in the dogcart which the latter had hired. Even if he did go there on business and was returning thence to his home by train, the accident of his slipping off the platform on to the rails (if he did slip off) was not one to which his employment particularly exposed him. He was at best like the servant going to the post in Sheldon v. Needham [1914] 7 B. W. C. C. 471.

In Murphy v. Cooney [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 44, 7 B. W. C. C. 962, the drunken mate of a ship was ordered away from the wheel and it may be off the bridge by the master. As the Court of Appeal in Ireland viewed the facts it was not proved that he met with his accident in obeying this order. The Court thought it consistent with the facts that after leaving the wheel as ordered he just stood about and finally fell or rolled off the bridge on to the deck and got killed; and so the decision was against the applicant. The judgments seem to imply that if the man had got killed while descending the ladder from the bridge in obedience to an order the applicant would have recovered, even though the accident was due to drunken carelessness.

In Frith v. Steamship Louisianian [1912] 2 K. B. 155, a drunken sailor who having just managed to get on board had fallen on to the deck and then attempted clumsily to rise and fallen backwards [112] overboard was held not to have met with an injury arising out of his employment, because he was not employing himself on any part of the ship's work. But the Master of the Rolls said that if he had been ordered aloft and had fallen through drunken carelessness the case might have been different. The supposed case is exactly the present case.

Nash v. Steamship Rangatira [1914] 3 K. B. 978, is perhaps more difficult. But in seeking to deduce a principle of law from a judgment which the Court has rendered upon certain facts, I must take the facts as they appeared to that Court and not as they may possibly appear to me.

In Nash's Case [1914] 3 K. B. 978, the majority of the Court thought that the accident did not arise out of the man's attempting to fulfil his employment or arrive at his place of employment, and therefore dismissed the application. Pickford, L. J. took a different view and would have granted it. On the view which the majority took Nash's Case [1914] 3 K. B. 978, is not this case.

On the whole none of the four cases relied upon for the employers are authorities for deciding the present case, while on the other hand Frazer v. Riddell [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 125; 7 B. W. C. C. 841, is in point and is, I think, sound and right.

I think this appeal should be dismissed.
Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

Intoxication of Employee as Precluding Recovery under Workmen's Compensation Act.

Introductory, 686.

In General, 686.

Express Statutory Provision, 688.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of the present note to review the recent cases dealing with the question whether the intoxication of an employee will preclude him from claiming the benefit of a workmen's compensation act. For a discussion of the earlier cases see the note to Nekoosa-Edwards Paper Co. v. Industrial Commission, Ann. Cas. 1915B 995.

In General.

Under the English compensation act serious and wilful misconduct does not bar the right to compensation for an injury resulting in death or serious and permanent disablement. Accordingly, if an injury so resulting arises out of and in the course of the employment, the fact that the intoxication of the workman is the proximate cause of the injury will not prevent the award of compensation. See the reported case. But it has been held that where the workman was by reason of his intoxication not engaged in his employment and sustained the injury solely by reason of his intoxication the fact that he was at the time or about the place of employment would not warrant an award. Nash v. Rangatira [1914] 3 K. B. 978, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 490. In that case employers appealed from an award in favor of the dependents of a sailor who met with his death by falling from a gangway when going on board his ship. The gangway was well constructed and lighted. An eyewitness to the accident testified that he saw the sailor coming along the quay, walking unsteadily and staggering; that he got to the gangway and began to mount it, holding on to the ropes on either side, but when part of the way up he let go one of the ropes, twisted suddenly and fell down on the quay resulting in his death. The court in allowing the appeal followed the ruling in Frith v. Steamship Louisianian [1912] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 155, 81 L. J. K. B. 701, and said per Cozens-Hardy, M. R.: "The county court judge finds as a fact that he was very drunk. I say that he found that the man was very drunk because his language is strong on that point. The witness Jenkins, who was the quartermaster, said, and he satisfied the county court judge, that the man was more or less drunk and that the accident was due to that fact. The county court judge says in the course of his judgment that 'Nash was at least so much under the influence of drink that he was unsteady on his feet and had not such control over his movements as a sober man would have had. Further, I think that the right inference from Jenkins' evidence is that in all probability the accident would not have happened but for Nash being under the influence of drink, and in that sense the accident was due to that fact.' Again, lower down he says, 'I find therefore as a fact that the accident and the death which resulted from it would not have happened but for the fact that Nash was under the influence of drink;' and subsequently he expresses his opinion that 'drunkenness was the primary and effective cause of this accident;' and I think he repeats the same thing again further on in his judgment. But the county court judge further says that the accident was due to two concurrent causes. He says that, drunk as the man was and unable to walk steadily and like a reasonable man, there was a special peril incident to his employment as a sailor, and that but for the fact that the sailor was on the gangway, which is part of the ship for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the accident would not have happened. Therefore he holds that, while drunkenness was primarily and effectively the cause of the accident, there was a concurrent cause, namely, that he was on the ship with an extra peril attached to it. Is that right? With great respect to the learned judge, I do not think it is. This is not a case in which the section of the act as to serious and wilful misconduct can be relied on. It was admitted by counsel for the respondents that this was so, and he only sought to refer to that provision by way of analogy and to show that there may be cases where a workman or his dependents may claim compensation in respect of injury by accident although the accident does not arise solely from the employment, but is also due to wilful misconduct on the part of the workman. In my view, it would be wrong to take that exceptional section, which it is difficult to justify logically, as throwing light on the scheme and policy of the act. This is not a case where the accident happened to the man through his wilfully doing in a wrong manner something which it was his duty to do, but the man's drunkenness was primarily the cause of the accident, and it would not be right to hold that the accident was one coming under the act. I do not wish to repeat what I said in Frith v. Steamship Louisianian but there is not one word of my judgment that I wish to modify or alter. That was the case of a sailor who had gone ashore without leave and was still on shore when his ship was about to start. He was in a hopeless state of drunkenness and was brought along the shore by a negro and pitched like a sack on to the vessel. The vessel was just starting, and when it had only gone a few yards, and before the ship's rail had been replaced after taking in the gangway, the man got up, so drunk that he could scarcely stand, and then fell down and rolled off the ship through the open space and was drowned. We held that the accident had been occasioned by and was due to the man's hopeless drunkenness, and that, although the accident occurred through his being on the ship in that state and being exposed to an extra risk through the rail not being in its place, yet the accident was not brought within the act. I should personally greatly regret if any other view were taken. To say that if a drunken man went in the course of his employment to a place where there was dangerous machinery or some other risk of that kind, and put his hands in the machinery owing to his drunken state, that would be an accident arising out of his employment, would be to my mind very shocking. I do not wish to refer to my own judgment in Frith v. Steamship Louisianian, but Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton put the matter very clearly in his judgment. There the learned county court judge had held that the accident arose out of the sailor's employment and awarded compensation, and Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton said: "The learned judge appears to have thought that if the sailor was on the ship anything that happened by reason of his being there would bring him within the purview of the act. That is not so. The accident must arise out of his employment. In my opinion this accident had nothing whatever to do with the employment except that it occurred more or less in the place of employment, that is on board the ship." The case reminds me of Dr. Johnson's definition of a ship as a prison with an extra chance of being drowned; but in view of the finding that the effective cause of the accident was drunkenness, it would be wrong to say that this case can be distinguished from the principle laid down in Frith v. Steamship Louisianian. I hold therefore that this appeal ought to be allowed on the ground that the sailor's death was not due to an accident arising out of his employment." And see Murphy v. Cooney [1914] 2 Ir. R. 76, W. C. & Ins. Rep. 44.

The degree of drunkenness makes no difference once it has been found that such drunkenness was the sole cause of the death. Nash v. Steamship Rangatira [1914] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 978, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 490.

In several American cases the effect of the intoxication of an employee has been considered with respect to his relation to the employment, without reference being made to the question of wilful misconduct. Thus in Berg v. St. Lakes Dredge, etc. Co. 173 App. Div. 82, 158 N. Y. S. 718, it appeared that an employee who lived on a dredge went ashore for his own purpose, became, in the language of a witness "staggering drunk," and on his attempt to return, fell from a dock and was drowned. It was held that compensation could not be recovered, since the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. The court said, however: "If he had fallen overboard from the boat which was conveying him from the dock to the dredge a different question would be presented." In Kiernan v. Friestedt Underpinning Co. 171 App. Div. 539, 157 N. Y. S. 900, wherein it appeared that an employee reported for work and was informed by the superintendent that he need not work because he was intoxicated and therefore not in a fit condition to engage in a hazardous kind of work which he had been doing, whereupon the employee started to leave and fell receiving the injuries complained of, it was held that he was entitled to the benefit of the act. Compare Matter of Pope, 177 App. Div. 69, 163 N. Y. S. 655.

However, in one case the view has apparently been taken that there could be no recovery of compensation for an injury of which the intoxication of the employee was the proximate cause. See Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 334, Ann. Cas. 1917E 839, 157 N. W. 145, L.R.A.1917D 51, amending opinion 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, L.R.A.1917D 15.

The causal connection between the intoxication and the injury has been held to be a question of fact. Napoleon v. McCullough, 89 N. J. L. 716, 99 Atl. 385, wherein there was conflicting testimony as to the condition of the workman before the accident. The only eyewitness to the happening of the accident testified that the workman appeared to him to be all right and that a jounce of the wagon (which he was employed to drive) threw him into the street. The court in affirming an award under the compensation act said: "This being the state of the evidence, the trial judge was warranted in making the finding that he did. He was under no legal duty to make an express finding negating the assertion on the prosecutor that the deceased was intoxicated at the time he received his injuries and that such intoxication proximately caused his injuries and death. Such a negative finding was necessarily included in, and will be presumed from, the finding of the trial judge that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased."

It was held in Ramlow v. Moon Lake Ice Co. 192 Mich. 505, 158 N. W. 1027, L.R.A. 1916F 955, that the fact that the system of an employee had been so weakened by his intemperate habit, that after he had sustained injuries in the course of his employment he suffered an attack of delirium tremens and died on the following day, did not shift the proximate cause of death from his injury to his intemperate habit. And see Sullivan v. Industrial Engineering Co. 173 App. Div. 65, 158 N. Y. S. 970.

In Von Ette's Case, 223 Mass. 56, 111 N. E. 696, L.R.A.1916D 641, it was said obiter, that if a workman's fall from a roof was due to a condition of intoxication no recovery could be had under the act.

Express Statutory Provision.

By the Maryland act it is specifically provided by section 45, that "notwithstanding anything hereinbefore or hereinafter contained, no employee or dependent of any employee shall be entitled to receive any compensation or benefits under this act, on account of any injury to or death of an employee caused by self-inflicted injury, the wilful misconduct or the intoxication of such employee." Section 61 provides as follows: "In any proceeding for the enforcement of a claim for compensation under this act, it shall be presumed in the absence of substantial evidence to the contrary . . . (d) that the injury did not result solely from the intoxication of the injured employee while on duty." In American Ice Co. v. Fitzhugh, 128 Md. 382, 97 Atl. 999, wherein it appeared that the driver of an ice and coal wagon fell or was thrown from the wagon and was killed, it was held that the fact that his drunken condition was a contributing cause of the accident would not defeat recovery under the act. The court said: "The appellant's first prayer asserted its right to a verdict if the jury found that Seymour Fitzhugh was intoxicated at the time of his death and that such intoxication contributed to his death. The defendant's second prayer asked for the instruction that, if the jury found that Seymour Fitzhugh was intoxicated while on duty and that his death directly resulted from such intoxication, then their verdict should be for the appellant. By its third prayer the jury were instructed that if they found that Seymour Fitzhugh was intoxicated at the time of the accident referred to and that his death directly resulted from such intoxication, and if the jury further believed from the evidence that the accident would not have happened if the deceased had not been intoxicated, than their verdict should be for the appellant. These prayers ignore the provision of the act which disentitles the employee to recover only where intoxication is the sole cause of the injury which results in death. The prayers properly present the defense of contributory negligence applicable to ordinary cases of negligence; but the act in question was designed to abolish the defense of contributory negligence in cases falling within its provisions, and it is only where intoxication is the sole cause, and not the contributing cause of the injury, that it can be relied on as a defense to the claim of the employee or his dependents. In other words, under the terms of the act, the injury for which compensation is sought must be due exclusively or entirely to the intoxication of the employee in order to constitute a defense to the claim. Subsection 7 of section 61 declares that 'death,' referred to as the basis of compensation under this act, means 'only death resulting from such injury,' and where the injury, which results in the death of the employee, results solely from intoxication, the dependents are not entitled to compensation."

The workmen's compensation act of Rhode Island expressly provides that "no compensation shall be allowed for the injury or death of an employee where it is proved that his injury or death . . . resulted from his intoxication, while on duty." In Collins v. Cole (R. I.) 99 Atl. 830, it appeared that an employee was engaged as a night watchman and deck hand on a dredge, and as part of his duty he was to take members of the crew to and from the shore on a large yawl belonging to the dredge. On the night of the accident he returned to the dredge in a drunken condition, and there drank more whisky. He was then heard talking about going back to shore for more drink, and shortly afterwards there was a yell, whereupon the other deck hands who had retired for the night rushed out on the deck and found the watchman standing up in a small skiff which did not belong to the dredge and which immediately capsized whereby he was drowned. In dismissing a petition by his widow for compensation the court said: "The petitioner argues that, in order to defeat the petition, the respondent must prove that the death resulted solely and exclusively from intoxication while on duty. If the petitioner means by that that the respondent must exclude every possibility that death might have resulted otherwise than from intoxication, we cannot agree with her. If Collins was in an intoxicated condition, that is, a condition in which he would be unable to look out for his own safety with that degree of care which a person would otherwise naturally exercise, and that, while so influenced, he did something which a person in a normal condition would not be likely to attempt and which brought about the accident, the trial court would be warranted in finding that the accident resulted from the condition into which he had voluntarily brought himself. We do not think that the statute requires that every possibility should be excluded before the evidence becomes sufficient to support the finding that the result was due to intoxication. We think that the intoxicated condition of the decedent is fully substantiated by the evidence, and that his reckless and unnecessary act in going into and standing up in a small boat, easily capsizable, was a dangerous act which would be apparent to any sober person. The very fact that he elected to make use of this small boat, instead of the larger yawl, which was lying close to it and was equally available, is further evidence of his condition and of his inability therefrom to properly care for himself. The trial court having denied the petitioner compensation, and such decision being in our opinion supported by substantial testimony, the petitioner's appeal is dismissed, and the decree of the superior court dismissing the petition is affirmed."

MISSOURI VALLEY BRIDGE AND IRON COMPANY.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Lump Sum Award — Review.

An appeal from a judgment rendered under the workmen's compensation act, awarding compensation in a lump sum to a dependent upon a workman whose death resulted from personal injuries sustained in a hazardous employment, dismissed for want of merit.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Barton county: BANTA, Judge.

Action by Ellen McCracken, plaintiff, against Missouri Valley Bridge and Iron Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. DISMISSED.

R. A. Campbell for appellant.

F. V. Russell and R. C. Russell for appellee.

[354] BURCH, J.—The action was one for compensation under the act to provide compensation for workmen injured in certain hazardous industries. (Laws 1911, ch. 218; Laws 1913, ch. 216.) The plaintiff recovered and the defendant appeals.

In December, 1914, the defendant was engaged in building a bridge across the Arkansas river near Nettleton in Edwards county. On December 11 the defendant employed George McKinley McCracken as a common laborer to assist in building the bridge. On December 29 the workman sustained personal injuries in the course of his employment which resulted in immediate death. His wages were twenty-five cents per hour, eight hours constituting a day, and the time which he actually work amounted to one hundred and twelve hours. He had previously been employed by the defendant at various times and places but an interval of about a year had elapsed since the last employment. The workman died intestate, leaving no surviving widow or children and leaving as his sole heir at law his mother, Ellen McCracken, who is the plaintiff. At the time of the death of her son the plaintiff resided in the city of Great Bend where she has lived for a number of years. She was wholly dependent upon her son's earnings for her support. She is a widow about sixty-two years of age, entirely destitute, without resources or income of her own, and physically unable to earn her own living. The son left no other person or persons dependent upon him either wholly or in part.

At the time of his death the workman and the defendant were subject to the provisions of the workmen's compensation act. The plaintiff complied with all the requirements of the statute on her part and the court rendered judgment in her favor for the lump sum of $1872.

It is said the judgment should have been for $624, or fifty-two times the workman's average weekly earnings during his employment by the defendant. The statute reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. That section 11 of chapter 218 of the Session Laws of 1911, be and the same is hereby amended to read as follows: Section 11. Amount of Compensation. The amount of compensation under this act shall be: (a) Where death results from injury: (1) If the workman leaves any dependents wholly dependent upon his earnings, an amount [355] equal to three times his earnings for the preceding year but not exceeding thirty-six hundred dollars and not less than twelve hundred dollars, provided, such earnings shall be computed upon the basis of the scale which he received or would have been entitled to receive had he been at work, during the thirty days next preceeding the accident; and, if the period of the workman's employment by the said employer had been less than one year, then the amount of his earnings during the said year shall be deemed to be fifty-two times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment under said employer; provided, that the amount of any payments made under this act and any lump sum paid hereunder for such injury from which death may thereafter result shall be deducted from such sum; and provided, however, that if the workman does not leave any dependents, citizens of and residing at the time of the accident in the United States or the Dominion of Canada, the amount of compensation shall not exceed in any case seven hundred and fifty dollars." (Laws 1913, ch. 216, § 5.)

It will be observed that the amount of compensation is three times the workman's earnings for a year. Anticipating that difficulty might be encountered in computing earnings for a year the legislature provided a rule which applies to the facts of the present case. The period of the workman's employment with the defendant was less than a year, in fact less than a month within the year preceeding his death. Therefore the amount of his earnings for a year were deemed to be fifty-two times his average weekly earnings during the period he was in the defendant's service. His average weekly earnings were twelve dollars. Fifty-two times this amount are $624, earnings for a year. Three times this sum are $1872, the amount of compensation and the amount of the judgment.

It is said that judgment should not have been rendered in a lump sum but that the plaintiff should have been awarded periodical payments according to her necessities so that in case of her death any unpaid balance would be saved to the defendant.

The statute leaves the character of the judgment to the discretion of the trial court.

"The judgment in the action, if in favor of the plaintiff, shall be for a lump sum equal to the amount of the payments then due and prospectively due under this act, with interest on the payments overdue, or, in the discretion of the trial judge, for periodical payments as in an award." (Laws 1911, ch. 218, § 36.)

The court has frequently expressed itself on this subject. The question usually arises in cases involving incapacity of a [356] workman. In the very recent case of Roberts v. Charles Wolff Packing Co. 95 Kan. 723, 149 Pac. 413, it was said:

"The theory of the legislature manifestly was that cases would arise in which the condition of the employee would be so marked that there would be little reason to anticipate improvement in earning capacity and that the circumstances would be such as would warrant the court in giving judgment for a lump sum available at once rather than for periodical payments as in an award. The kind of judgment that is to be rendered was left to the discretion of the trial court. The question now contended for was presented in Gorrell v. Battelle, 93 Kan. 370, 144 Pac. 244. It was there insisted that the theory of the act was that compensation should cease and payments should end when incapacity ceased and the case should be left open so that employers might obtain modification of the payments as the condition of the employee should improve. The answer to that contention was that:

"The workmen's compensation act confers express power upon the trial court to render judgment in a lump sum instead of making an award of periodical payments. In every case the trial court must exercise its judgment and discretion as to the best method of making compensation in the light of all the facts, and the result will not be disturbed on appeal except for an abuse of the power." (Syl. ¶ 5.)

"In the more recent case of Cain v. National Zinc Co. 94 Kan. 679, 146 Pac. 1165, it was held that:

"Whether the judgment in such a case shall be for a lump sum, or for periodical payments, is expressly left to the discretion of the trial court.' (p. 680.)

"In arriving at its judgment the court considers the testimony as to the nature of the injury, its effect on the earning capacity, the duration of the incapacity and the likelihood of cure or improvement, and from all pertinent facts brought to its attention it determines whether the judgment shall be for periodical payments or for a lump sum on which payment may be enforced at once." (p. 728.)

The statute gives precisely the same power to the trial court in cases instituted by persons dependent upon a workman whose death results from an injury.

In many instances the position of the trial court is a difficult one. In the case of Gorrell v. Battelle, 93 Kan. 370, 144 Pac. 244, the solution of the problem of how long incapacity to earn wages will continue was discussed. Because the court exercises discretionary power in a matter peculiarly for its consideration its action is practically final. Consequently it is to be expected that district courts will act cautiously and candidly and not render lump-sum judgments for any other reason than that the welfare of the parties requires it. Whenever [357] such a judgment appears to be best under all the circumstances there should be no hesitation in pronouncing it.

In this case there is no possible hope for improvement like restoration of earning capacity to an injured workman. The son is dead.

The mother was entirely dependent upon his earnings for her own continued existence independent of charity. She is utterly destitute. She has no income or sources of income of her own. She is physically unable to earn her own living, and she is sixty-two years old. The statute gave her $1872. With this sum she must establish herself according to her helplessness and then employ the remainder so that may last to the end of her days, for she will never have any more. It does not take a financier to understand how little she has, nor a sentimentalist to appreciate her needs. Every man has or has had a mother in fortunate or unfortunate pecuniary circumstances. Now an insurance company, using the name of the defendant as appellant, sees in this situation a chance to make some money. Probably the plaintiff cannot attain her life-expectancy and the insurance company wants this judgment doled out to her in installments "as her necessities require"—no comfort, nothing to inspirit or gladden, but as her necessities may require—so that should she die soon part of the judgment will not have to be paid. More than this, it is said that the judge of the district court was so callous of conscience that he abused his official power in not withholding some of the money from this aged, destitute and helpless woman.

In order to debate a subject with profit the minds of the disputants must be capable of meeting on a common plane in common comprehension. It is useless to discuss the dignity of labor with a professional gambler. It is useless to discuss the rewards and the happiness of virtue with a procuress. In this case the insurance company reveals itself in such a way that it is not necessary for the court to do more than to express its opinion that the district court did not abuse its discretion.

The fact is this is not a lawsuit. It is an abuse of the judicial machinery of the state, set up for the purpose of accomplishing justice, by a contumacious corporation which chooses, to disrespect and to defeat as far as it can a social-welfare statute of this state. There was no controversy between [358] the plaintiff and the bridge company in whose service the plaintiff's son was killed. There was no controversy between the attorneys for the plaintiff and the attorney for the defendant. They knew the law and the facts were not disputed. The case was determined in the district court on admission supplemented by a little oral testimony by the plaintiff. No stenographer was called to take the proceedings, because of their simplicity and uncontroversial character. The case was a typical one for the substantially automatic operation of the workmen's compensation law, and the bridge company was anxious to make compensation at once to the plaintiff for the loss of her sole means of support. But the insurance company informed the defendant that liability should be established in the court of last resort or the indemnity the defendant had purchased would not be paid. So an appeal had to be taken. Five grounds were stated. The first was that the judgment was contrary to the evidence, which, of course, was too frivolous to serve even as make-weight. The other four presented in four different ways the stale subject of judgment for a lump sum. It is submitted that the statute quoted above relating to the form of the judgment in compensation cases is too plain and unambiguous for fair minds of ordinary acumen to differ respecting the power conferred. This court had patiently spelled out time and again the legislative meaning and purpose, which were already too clear to be misconceived, and the attorney for the defendant had too much respect for himself and for the court to argue the matter. The point concerning the amount of the judgment, which is too must dignified by calling it a point, was pressed into service at the hearing.

The court does not possess adequate means of dealing with this kind of lawlessness. The attorney for the defendant who signs the papers is not amenable to discipline because he was acting under duress of the peril to his client, who he assured the court was and always has been anxious to pay. The real culprit is not in court or subject to process. Because appeals of this kind, serving no purpose except to oppress claimants and to frustrate the law, are common in compensation cases the court has adopted the practice of disposing of them summarily [359] on motion to dismiss for want of merit. In the case of Cain v. National Zinc Co. 94 Kan. 679, 146 Pac. 1165, 148 Pac. 251, it was said:

"The workmen's compensation act contemplates the speedy adjustment of claims under it. If the determination of the amount to be paid must await the relatively slow process of litigation through an appellate court its main purpose will be defeated and its beneficent operation thwarted. In a case of this character the plaintiff may well raise the question whether the issue of the appeal is so far doubtful as to require the ordinary routine to be followed; and where upon the preliminary hearing resulting from such challenge the court is fully satisfied that no grounds for a reversal exist, the judgment should be made final without further delay." (p. 681.)

Some time must be consumed even when this course is pursued. In this instance the plaintiff's son was killed on December 29, 1914. The judgment was not rendered in the district court until May 10, 1915. The appeal was taken on June 1. The motion to dismiss was filed on June 29. The case was heard on July 7, and the order of dismissal was entered at the first ensuing consultation of the court, which occurred on July 9. The mandate of this court was ordered to be forwarded to the district court at once. However, by means of an utterly groundless resistance of payment accomplished by an abuse of judicial proceedings, the plaintiff will have been kept out of her money for the greater part of a year.

Insurance companies say they are preyed upon by "snitch" lawyers, who secure lump-sum judgments for permanent injuries to the spine. If this be true in some instances the course pursued in this case is not less disreputable and affords no remedy. It is quite possible that district courts have sometimes hesitated to render judgments for compensation payable in installments, because of the practical certainty that workmen would be hounded into unjust compromises by one proceeding after another brought nominally to test restoration to earning capacity.

It is not considered good form for the court to make suggestions to the legislature, which body has sole authority to make the law, and which reserves to itself the power to regulate practice and proceedings in court, except in the most minor matters. Some disagreeable facts, however, have been set down in this opinion, plainly and in detail, which not only disclose a condition, but which ought to awaken some interest in some quarters.

ADDENDUM.

[360] The foregoing opinion was filed on July 28, 1915, just before the summer recess of the court. In due time The Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York filed a motion asking for a modification of the opinion. The motion states in substance that the Fidelity and Casualty Company, the insurer of the defendant, The Missouri Valley Bridge and Iron Company, was in fact willing to abide by the judgment of the district court awarding the plaintiff compensation in a lump sum, but that the insurance department of the state of New York, the state of its incorporation, would not permit it to pay the judgment without an appeal being taken. The motion states that the facts presented will be sustained by proof, and a preliminary showing as to the nature of such proof has been made. If upon the hearing of the motion the proof should be as indicated, some of the language of the opinion will not apply to The Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York.

OPINION MODIFYING FORMER OPINION.

(December 11, 1915; 96 Kan. 799.)

Charles A. Baker for Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York.

[799] BURKH, J.—Ellen McCracken commenced an action against the Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Company for compensation for the death of her son who was an employee of the bridge company. The district court made an award of compensation in a lump sum computed according to the terms of the workmen's compensation act. At the instance of the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, which had insured the bridge company, a baseless and contumacious appeal was taken to this court. The appeal was dismissed for want of merit, and in the opinion of the court occasion was taken to comment on the practice of taking such appeals. After the opinion was filed the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York filed a motion asking that it be relieved from censure on the ground that it was in fact willing to abide the judgment of the district court but that it was coerced by the insurance department of the state of New York to resist the claim of the aged, destitute and helpless plaintiff. Leave to make a showing was granted. [800] (McCracken v. Missouri Val. Bridge, etc. Co. 96 Kan. 353, 360, 150 Pac. 832, 834.) The showing has been made and it clearly discloses that the Fidelity & Casualty Company was not actuated by any desire to delay payment, to speculate upon the plaintiff's misfortunes, or to abuse judicial procedure, in this case. Anything to the contrary contained in the former opinion may be considered as withdrawn.

While the court is pleased to make the foregoing statement it regrets the necessity of adverting to the proof which the Fidelity & Casualty Company has brought upon the record explaining why it acted against its own wishes. As a part of its showing the Fidelity & Casualty Company filed the affidavit of one James J. Hoey, the material portions of which read as follows:

"James J. Hoey, being first duly sworn, upon his oath deposes:

"That at all times hereinafter mentioned, he was second deputy superintendent of insurance of the state of New York. That the principal office of the department of insurance of the state of New York is located at the capital of said state, to wit, Albany, but that affiant's office was located at the city of New York. That affiant, by virtue of the office as such second deputy superintendent of insurance, was charged with the supervision of insurance companies writing workmen's compensation insurance within the state of New York, and among others, with the supervision of The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York.

"That the said The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York as a condition precedent to its doing business in the state of New York was required by the department of insurance of the state of New York to promise and undertake not to make lump sum settlements in cases arising under the workmen's compensation statutes of the various states in which The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York might transact business, without the approval of the department of insurance of the state of New York. That the said pledge was at all times hereinafter mentioned in full force, and that the said department of insurance of the state of New York insisted that no lump sum settlements in cases arising under workmen's compensation acts of the various states should be made without its approval.

"That upon to wit the 30th day of April, 1915, Frank E. Law, Esq., vice-president of The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, came to the office of affiant, and asked permission of affiant as representing the Department of Insurance of the State of New York, to make a lump sum settlement of the liability of The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York in this case. That the said Frank E. Law laid before affiant among other papers a certain letter from the Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Company to the Chicago office of the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, in which letter the Missouri Valley Bridge and Iron Company [801] urged that The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York make a lump sum settlement in this case. That affiant stated to Mr. Law that he did not believe that the facts of the case warranted any change in the prior rulings of the Department of Insurance of the State of New York, and that the Department of Insurance of the State of New York would expect The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York not to make a lump sum settlement in the case, but to resist the same to the utmost."

The workmen's compensation act is a statute of the state of Kansas, duly promulgated by its legislature for the purpose of ameliorating certain social conditions. With the wisdom or unwisdom of the statute this court has nothing to do. The legislature, however, provided that in actions for the recovery of compensation the judgment, if in favor of the plaintiff, "shall be for a lump sum equal to the amount of the payments then due and prospectively due under this act, with interest on the payments overdue." To this legislative command was added the following: "or, in the discretion of the trial judge, for periodical payments as in an award." (Laws 1911, ch. 218, § 36.) That is the law of this state, and so long as it stands on the statute book it is entitled to obedience from anyone who encounters it.

It sometimes occurs that a statute of a state is displeasing to a portion of its citizenship and to others beyond its borders. It is, however, a fundamental principle of the American system of government that when the legislature of a state has registered a decision upon a subject within the scope of its authority the decision is the will of the state to the support of which all moral forces should rally. Those who are dissatisfied may indeed continue to persuade, if they can, successive legislatures to change the law, but so long as the legislation stands public and private welfare demand obedience to it until it can be changed according to lawful methods, because the supremacy of the law is the indispensable condition of any peace, order, or justice whatever.

Upon its own showing The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York comes into this state to transact its business under an obligation to abide, not the will of the state vesting in its district courts authority to say when lump sums shall be paid in compensation cases, but the will of a department deputy of another state. On April 30, 1915, before the district court [802] of Barton county had an opportunity to examine the facts and to exercise its authority to determine whether or not Ellen McCracken ought to receive a lump sum or periodic payments as compensation for the killing of her son, the deputy issued his fiat to resist a lump sum judgment "to the utmost." The case was one which both the bridge company and The Fidelity & Casualty Company desired to settle by paying a lump sum. The facts were stated in the former opinion as follows:

"The son is dead. The mother was entirely dependent upon his earnings for her own continued existence independent of charity. She is utterly destitute. She has no income or sources of income of her own. She is physically unable to earn her own living, and she is sixty-two years old. The statute gave her $1872, with this sum she must establish herself according to her helplessness and then employ the remainder so that it may last to the end of her days, for she will never have any more. It does not take a financier to understand how little she has, nor a sentimentalist to appreciate her needs." (Ante, p. 357.)

The judgment of the district court was that compensation should be made in a lump sum. There was no ground for appeal. Because The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York was under obligation to submit to something which it accepted as higher law than the statute and rules of procedure of this state, it proceeded to resist to the utmost, and required an appeal to be taken which lacked even the shadow of merit. The result was not a lawsuit, but, as the court indicated before, a demoralizing abuse of the judicial machinery of the state perpetrated in disrespect of its laws and in an effort to thwart the purpose of the legislature expressed in a social-welfare statute. As the former opinion stated, the court does not possess adequate means of dealing with this kind of lawlessness, the real culprit not being in court nor subject to process.

Such being the situation disclosed by the showing made in support of the application to modify the former opinion, the closing words of that opinion are pertinent:

"Some disagreeable facts, . . . have been set down . . . plainly and in detail, which not only disclose a condition, but which ought to awaken some interest in some quarters." (Ante, p. 359.)

English Act.

IN GENERAL.

The English Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 provides for the redemption of weekly payments by the payment of a lump sum as follows: "Schedule I, paragraph (17).—Where any weekly payment has been continued for not less than six months, the liability therefor may, on application by or on behalf of the employer, be redeemed by the payment of a lump sum of such an amount as, where the incapacity is permanent, would, if invested in the purchase of an immediate life annuity from the national debt commissioners through the Post Office Savings Bank, purchase an annuity for the workman equal to seventy-five per cent of the annual value of the weekly payment, and as in any other case may be settled by arbitration under this act, and such lump sum may be ordered by the committee or arbitrator or judge of the county court to be invested or otherwise applied for the benefit of the person entitled thereto: Provided that nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as preventing agreements being made for the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum."

In awarding a lump sum under this section of the act, the question to be decided by the judge is whether the injury is permanent, and not whether the workman will be able to earn higher wages. Calico Printers' Assoc. v. Booth [1913] 3 K. B. 662, 82 L. J. K. B. 985, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 540, 109 L. T. N. S. 123, 6 B. W. C. C. 551; Marshall v. Prince [1914] 3 K. B. 1047, [1914] W. N. 330, 7 B. W. C. C. 381; Swannick v. Congested Dist. Board [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 96, 46 Ir. L. T. 253, 6 B. W. C. C. 449. In Carlton Main Colliery v. Clawley [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 256, the award of a lump sum was set aside, it appearing that the injury sustained was not permanent and that the employee was in receipt of benefits other than the weekly payments.

Where the injury is permanent the judge is required by the schedule to award an amount equal to seventy-five per cent of the actual annual weekly earnings. If the injury is not permanent, the judge may in his discretion award a lump sum, taking into consideration all the evidence in the case. Calico Printers' Assoc. v. Higham [1912] 1 K. B. 93, [1911] W. N. 221, 28 Times L. Rep. 53, 56 Sol. J. 89, wherein the court said: "Now, three points are clear: (a) The right to redeem is given to the employer only; there is no corresponding right given to the workman to claim a capital sum. (b) This right cannot be exercised hastily; the weekly payment must have been continued for at least six months. (c) A broad distinction is drawn between an incapacity to work which is 'permanent' and one which is not 'permanent.' This distinction may sometimes be to the benefit of the workman and sometimes to his detriment. The arbitrator has, if the incapacity is 'permanent,' no discretion as to the amount. He cannot award less or more than seventy-five per cent of the actuarial value. If it is not 'permanent' the arbitrator must fix the lump sum in his discretion, having regard to the evidence before him."

The judge cannot make an optional award. The sum ordered to be paid must be as definite and certain and as capable of execution as any common-law judgment. Calico Printers' Assoc. v. Booth [1913] 3 K. B. 652, 82 L. J. K. B. 985, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 540, 109 L. T. N. S. 123, 6 B. W. C. C. 551. In that case the judge ordered that the weekly earnings "may be redeemed," on payment of seventy-five per cent of the actual annual wages as provided in the act. The workman appealed on the ground that the award was optional. In allowing the appeal the court said: "An arbitrator, under an application by the employer to redeem a payment, must make an award for a lump sum, an award which can be enforced as a judgment, and it makes no difference whatever that there is a direction in the sense that in one event he is to award seventy-five per cent of a sum ascertained in a particular way, and in the second event that he is not bound by any limitation of his discretion. For these reasons I think the appeal must be allowed and the award set aside."

A lump sum may be awarded only when weekly payments have been continued for not less than six months. Mullholland v. Whitehaven Colliery Co. [1910] 2 K. B. 278, 79 L. J. K. B. 987, 26 Times L. Rep. 462, 102 L. T. N. S. 663, 3 B. W. C. C. 317, wherein it was held that an infant who had received weekly compensation for five months and then resumed work was not entitled to a lump sum award made by the employers' committee and the amount was ordered to be paid back to the employers.

The right to redeem weekly payments in a lump sum is absolute in the employer. Gottob v. Petchell [1914] 2 K. B. 36, 83 L. J. K. B. 429, 110 L. R. N. S. 453, 30 Times L. Rep. 253, 48 Sol. J. 249, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 115, 7 B. W. C. C. 109; Kendall v. Pennington, 106 L. T. N. S. 817, [1912] W. C. Rep. 144, 5 B. W. C. C. 335. In the case last cited it was said: "This is a plain case. The scheme of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 is that compensation is to be awarded to a man sustaining injury by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. This compensation takes the form of a weekly payment, but a provision is inserted in sched. I, par. 17, enabling the employer, not the man, to apply to redeem the weekly payment. The employer, though he is not compelled to redeem, has a distinct right to do so given to him in certain cases when the payment has continued for six months, and the liability may then be redeemed by the payment of a lump sum. The county court judge then has the powers conferred on him which are discussed in Calico Printers' Assoc. v. Higham, 105 L. T. N. S. 734, [1912] 1 K. B. 93. Then there is this further provision: 'and such lump sum may be ordered by the committee or arbitrator or judge of the county court to be invested or otherwise applied for the benefit of the person entitled thereto.' So that the employer is given a right to redeem by payment of a lump sum; and, on the other hand, the arbitrator has power to say that this lump sum shall not be handed over to the workman, but invested and applied for his benefit. The employer has a right to redeem, and the appeal must be allowed." See also Castle Spinning Co. v. Atkinson [1905] 1 K. B. 336, 74 L. J. K. B. 265, 53 W. R. 360, 92 L. T. N. S. 147, 21 Times L. Rep. 192, wherein under the act of 1897 it was held that although the employer had the sole right to redeem he did not have the right to fix the amount to be paid.

Where a county court judge, in fixing the amount of a lump sum award, deducted the amount of weekly payments already paid, and awarded the balance as a lump sum, it was held in Victor Mills v. Shackleton [1912] 1 K. B. 22, [1911] W. N. 197, 81 L. J. K. B. 34, 105 L. T. N. S. 613, that the judge should not have considered the payments already received in arriving at the amount of the award.

In Pattinson v. Stevenson, 109 L. T. J. 106, 2 W. C. C. 156, decided under the Act of 1897, it was held that in fixing the amount of the lump sum award the possibility of improvement on the part of the workman, and the possibility of his death occurring earlier than the average, should be taken into consideration.

In Grant v. Conroy, 6 W. C. C. 153, it was held that lump sum awards should not be based on the actuarial value but on a "business footing" as between employer and workman.

It has been held that no further inquiry as to the permanency of the incapacity from the loss of an arm need be made before ordering a redemption of the weekly payments. National Telephone Co. v. Smith [1909] S. C. 1363, 46 Scot. L. Rep. 988. Compare Stavely Coal & Iron, etc. Co. v. Elson [1912] W. C. Rep. 228, 5 B. W. C. C. 301.

In Moreland v. Ely [1915] 1 K. B. 85, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 554, an employer's application for redemption and the workman's application for a review and increase of weekly payments were before the judge on the same day, and the application for redemption was dismissed for want of service and the workman's application granted. This was held not to be an abuse of discretion. The court said: "In my opinion the two applications, under clauses 16 and 17 respectively, must be dealt with on the footing that one application has just as much right to be heard as the other; and as the review has been made, and upon the materials properly made, it is now too late for an application to redeem to proceed with any possibility of success, being dependent, as it is, on the particular weekly payment having continued for not less than six months. The weekly payment has been altered, as the result of the application to review, and 5s. 6d. a week has been paid instead of 2s. 5d. a week since the date when the matter came before the judge. I see no ground for depriving the infant of the right to take advantage of the order made by the learned county court judge under clause 16, and I do not think it is any answer to say that the effect of that order will be to render an application for redemption nugatory. I do not think that the decision which I have arrived at is inconsistent with any of the authorities which have been referred to. It seems to me to be in accordance with good sense, and I think that we should be doing wrong if we said that the effect of an application to redeem necessarily deprived the infant of any right whatever to review. In my view the order made on the review application was right. The appeal against that ought to be dismissed with costs. In the other case, it being conceded that the application to redeem has become useless, counsel for the employers does not ask that it should go back for a rehearing, and, therefore, his appeal as to that must also be dismissed with costs."

AGREEMENT BETWEEN PARTIES.

An agreement between an employer and an injured workman, before any weekly payments have been made, whereby the latter agrees to accept a lump sum for injuries sustained, is a valid agreement under schedule I, (17) quoted in the preceding subdivision. Ryan v. Hartley [1912] 2 K. B. 150, 5 B. W. C. C. 407, wherein the court said: "Now is there anything in the act to prevent an adult workman before entering a claim for an award and before any payment of a weekly sum has been made from coming to an arrangement by way of compromise with the employer, that the employer will pay and that he will accept a sum of money in satisfaction of all his claims? All that I find in the act is this: that when there has been either an award of a weekly sum or a recorded agreement for payment of a weekly sum, there is in either case that which is enforceable as a county court judgment, so that execution can be levied, and that in neither of those cases can an agreement for the redemption of the weekly payment by a lump sum be validly made unless the registrar considers the sum adequate. Then by sched. II, clause 10, 'An agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum if not registered in accordance with this act shall not, nor shall the payment of the sum payable under the agreement, exempt the person by whom the weekly payment is payable from liability to continue to make that weekly payment . . . unless . . . he proves that the failure to register was not due to any neglect or default on his part.' What do the words 'liability to continue to make that weekly payment' mean? They presuppose that there has been a weekly payment made which would have continued but for the existence of an agreement to pay a lump sum. In my opinion that clause has no application whatever to a case where, as here, no weekly payment has ever in fact been made, even though the gross sum paid was a sum which may be said to have been calculated with reference to the workman's weekly wages. For these reasons I think this appeal fails and must be dismissed with the usual consequences."

There is no power vested in the county court judge in the absence of consent of the parties to make an award which in any way alters the terms of an agreement between the employer and the workman for a lump sum. Halls v. Furness, 3 B. W. C. C. 72.

An infant has been held not to be bound by agreement to accept a lump sum from his employer, though the agreement was made before the weekly payments were commenced. Bates v. Holding [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 6, 7 B. W. C. C. 80.

It was held in Hughes v. Vothey Val. Co. 125 L. T. J. 471, 1 B. W. C. C. 416, that an agreement whereby a workman released his employer from liability under the act did not prevent him from receiving compensation under the act, where the sum stipulated in the contract was paid before the agreement was signed.

Where on an application for review the parties, on dismissal of the application, agreed to redeem the weekly payments, and the award was granted, it was held in Howell v. Blackwell [1912] W. C. Rep. 186, 5 B. W. C. C. 293, that the order for redemption, being a consent order, was not subject to appeal.

RECORDING OF LUMP SUM AWARD.

In the English act provision is made for the recording of lump sum awards by the registrar as follows: "Schedule II, paragraphs (9) and (10).— (9) Where the amount of compensation under this act has been ascertained, or any weekly payment varied, or any other matter decided under this act, either by a committee or by an arbitrator or by agreement, a memorandum thereof shall be sent, in manner prescribed by rules of court, by the committee or arbitrator, or by any party interested, to the registrar of the county court who shall, subject to such rules, on being satisfied as to its genuineness, record such memorandum in a special register without fee, and thereupon the memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a county court judgment. Provided that—(a) no such memorandum shall be recorded before seven days after the despatch by the registrar of notice to the parties interested; and (b) where a workman seeks to record a memorandum of agreement between his employer and himself for the payment of compensation under this act and the employer, in accordance with rules of court, proves that the workman has in fact returned to work and is earning the same wages as he did before the accident, and objects to the recording of such memorandum, the memorandum shall only be recorded, if at all, on such terms as the judge of the county court, under the circumstances, may think just; and (c) the judge of the county court may at any time rectify the register; and (d) where it appears to the registrar of the county court, on any information which he considers sufficient, that an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum, or an agreement as to the amount of compensation payable to a person under any legal disability, or to dependents, ought not to be registered by reason of the inadequacy of the sum or amount, or by reason of the agreement having been obtained by fraud or undue influence, or other improper means, he may refuse to record the memorandum of the agreement sent to him for registration, and refer the matter to the judge who shall, in accordance with rules of court, make such order (including an order as to any sum already paid under the agreement) as under the circumstances he may think just; and (e) the judge may, within six months after a memorandum of an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum, or of an agreement as to the amount of compensation payable to a person under any legal disability, or to dependents, has been recorded in the register, order that the record be removed from the register on proof of his satisfaction that the agreement was obtained by fraud or undue influence or other improper means, and may make such order (including an order as to any sum already paid under the agreement) as under the circumstances he may think just. (10) An agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum if not registered in accordance with this act shall not, nor shall the payment of the sum payable under the agreement, exempt the person by whom the weekly payment is payable from liability to continue to make that weekly payment, and an agreement as to the amount of compensation to be paid to a person under a legal disability or to dependents, if not so registered, shall not, nor shall the payment of the sum payable under the agreement, exempt the person by whom the compensation is payable from liability to pay compensation, unless, in either case, he proves that the failure to register was not due to any neglect or default on his part."

Construing the foregoing provisions of the act it has been held that it is the duty of a registrar to record lump sum awards, unless he believes the amount awarded to be inadequate, and in such a case to refer the matter to the county court judge whose duty it then becomes to pass on the adequacy of the award. Mortimer v. Secretan [1909] 2 K. B. 77, 78 L. J. K. B. 521, 100 L. T. N. S. 721; Kierston v. Thompson [1913] 1 K. B. 587, 82 L. J. K. B. 920, 108 L. T. N. S. 236, 29 Times L. Rep. 205, 57 Sol. J. 226 [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 140; Rex v. Bow County Ct. Registrar [1914] 3 K. B. 266, 83 L. J. K. B. 1806, 111 L. T. N. S. 277, [1914] W. N. 223; Rex v. Thetford County Ct. Registrar [1915] 1 K. B. 224, 112 L. T. N. S. 413, 84 L. J. K. B. 291, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 136, 8 B. W. C. C. 276; Hudson v. Camberwell, 116 L. T. N. S. 523, 86 L. J. K. B. 558, [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 144; Ship Segura v. Blampied, 4 B. W. C. C. 192.

In Rex v. Thetford County Ct. Registrar, supra, it was held that though the compensation had been paid it was the registrar's duty to record the award. Darling, J., said: "I think that if the registrar in this case were upheld in the view that he has taken a grave injustice would be done to these employers who have paid the workman the maximum amount of compensation for his injury and have got a receipt for it. They would be deprived of the means of enforcing against the workman as a county court judgment the agreement which has been come to. The contention of the registrar assumes that the words 'enforceable as a county court judgment' mean enforceable by the plaintiff. I think they mean that it shall be enforceable by either party, by the employer as well as the workman. If the agreement is registered it becomes enforceable in the employer's favor by way of estoppel. I think paragraph 10 shows that if it is not absolutely necessary for the protection of the employer that the agreement should be registered it is very desirable in his interest that it should be so, for where he has applied for registration and been refused he ought not to be afterwards called upon to prove that the failure to register was not due to his default."

In Rex v. Bow County Ct. Registrar [1914] 3 K. B. 266, the court, in granting a manda-mus to compel the registrar to record the agreement, said: "It is not to be wondered at that the registrar declined to proceed further without the decision of this court. Form 38 which is appended to the workmen's compensation rules is misleading in its terms. It is directed to all parties interested. That would include the workman. It says 'If you dispute its genuineness'—i. e., the genuineness of the memorandum—or object to its being recorded, it will not be recorded, except with your consent in writing, or by order of the judge of this court.' That clearly leads the workman to believe that he has the right to object to the recording of the memorandum on any ground, and that if he does object the memorandum will not be recorded. That form led the registrar to think that the workman was entitled to object to the recording of the memorandum either because the amount named in the agreement was inadequate or upon any other grounds, and that, whatever the objection might be, it was not his duty or within his power to record the memorandum or proceed further. In our opinion that was a mistaken view of his duty. By sched. II, s. 9, it is the duty of the registrar on being satisfied of the genuineness of the memorandum to record it, subject to rules of court applicable to that case. There follows a proviso affecting this prima facie duty of the registrar to record the memorandum on being satisfied of its genuineness. That proviso is contained in several paragraphs. Paragraph (d) is the material one:—'Where it appears to the registrar of the county court, on any information which he considers sufficient, that an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum, . . . ought not to be registered by reason of the inadequacy of the sum, . . . he may refuse to record the memorandum of the agreement sent to him for registration, and refer the matter to the judge who shall, in accordance with rules of court, make such order . . . as under the circumstances he may think just.' The result is that when such a memorandum is sent to be recorded the registrar, on being satisfied of its genuineness, must either record it, or, proceeding under paragraph (d), he must proceed to ascertain whether the lump sum is adequate and determine that question upon any information which he considers sufficient. One course or the other he must take. In the present case the registrar has refused to take either course. Therefore this rule must be made absolute for a mandamus directed to the registrar commanding him to proceed to enter upon the consideration of the agreement in question in the terms of sched. II, s. 9 (d), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

The registrar or county court judge cannot refuse to record an agreement to pay a lump sum, on the ground of inadequacy of the amount, where the agreement is entered into before any weekly payments are made. Hudson v. Camberwell [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 144, 86 L. J. K. B. 558.

In O'Neil v. Anglo-American Oil Co. 2 B. W. C. C. 434, it appeared that a workman, having recovered sufficiently to do light work, agreed with his employer to accept a lump sum payment. The county judge refused to record the agreement, believing the amount to be inadequate as a redemption of permanent weekly payments. On appeal, however, the county judge was directed to record the award, it being the court's opinion that the county judge was in error in believing the weekly payments to be permanent.

Where a county court judge refuses to record a lump sum agreement because of the inadequacy of the amount, his decision does not preclude him, on a rehearing of the case, from deciding that the amount is adequate. Beech v. Bradford Corp. 4 B. W. C. C. 236.

American Acts.

IN GENERAL.

In most of the American workmen's compensation acts there is a provision for the allowance of a lump sum award in lieu of weekly payments, the usual form of the provision being that such an award may be made if it is deemed to be for the best interest of "the parties" or of the claimant. Provision for a lump sum award has been made in the following jurisdictions:

—United States (Act Sept. 7, 1916, ch. 458, § 14, Fed. St. Ann. Pamph. Supp. No. 8, p. 144);

—Arizona (Rev. St. 1913, p. 1054; only in case of death);

—Colorado (Sess. Laws 1915, ch. 179, p. 515);

—Washington (Laws 1911, ch. 174, § 7);

—West Virginia (Acts Reg. Sess. 1915, ch. 9, p. 52, § 41);

The Wyoming Act (Laws 1915, ch. 124) makes no provision for periodical payments but provides for a lump sum award for every injury.

CONSTRUCTION OF ACTS.

Under the Connecticut statute providing for a lump sum award when the commissioner finds it "just or necessary" it has been held that such an award should be made only when in the judgment of the commissioner the best interests of the parties require it. Clarke v. Bigelow-Hartford Carpet Co. 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 166. In Catto v. Cudemo, 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 374, the commissioner awarded a lump sum so that the injured workman could pay his debts and return to his home in Italy. See to the same effect Pumpanelli v. Aberthaw Constr. Co. 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 620. Commutation of weekly payments to a lump sum was awarded in Riley v. Walsh, 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 505, so that the widow of the deceased workman could purchase a small farm and thus maintain herself. In Cushman v. Rowe, 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 574, commutation of weekly payments into a lump sum was refused, it appearing that the claimant had sufficient funds to meet the expense of an operation.

Construing the Illinois statute the court in Staley v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 186 Ill. App. 593, discussed the circumstances making it to the interest of the parties that a lump sum award should be made, as follows: "The last question to be considered, and the one which appears really to be the object of this controversy, is whether the court below had power under the state act to order the whole of the sum of $3,500 to be paid to appellee in a lump sum. The statute . . . provides that any person entitled to compensation under the act, and any employer who shall be bound to pay that compensation, who desires to have the same or any part thereof paid in a lump sum, may petition the court for that purpose and if, upon proper notice to interested parties and a proper showing made before the court, it appears to the best interest of the parties that such compensation be so paid, the court shall order payment of the same in a lump sum. This provision places the person entitled to compensation and the employer upon the same plane and apparently makes the same rule applicable to both. Appellee made proof tending to show that it was for her best interest to have the amount paid in a lump sum, and the finding of the court that such was the case can readily be acceded to, but appellant, while apparently not opposing the entry of an order which would require it to pay the whole of its indebtedness at once instead of making monthly payments, contends that it is against its best interests and unjust to require it to pay the full sum of $3,500 at once instead of paying the same in instalments at the rate of about $50 per month, as it would otherwise be required to pay under the law. It urges in effect that the proper amount to be paid in a lump sum would be the present worth of $3,500 to be paid in instalments as aforesaid over a term of years, when all the circumstances and contingencies are taken in consideration. It requires no argument or citation of authorities to show that the payment of $3,500 distributed in monthly instalments over a number of years is less burdensome in a financial way upon appellant than the payment of the full amount in a lump sum at the beginning of that period. The mere matter of the use of the money required to make the deferred payments until such payments were made would be a material item regardless of other contingencies which might occur to the benefit of appellant. The court should not arbitrarily order the full amount to be paid in a lump sum against the pecuniary interest of the employer when the statute plainly provides that before the order can be made it must appear to be to the best interest of the parties, the employer as well as the beneficiary. We are inclined to the belief, however, that the trial court might, within the limits of the law, order an amount paid to the beneficiary in a lump sum, which would be equal to the present value of the total amount distributed in instalments over the whole number of years when all the circumstances are considered. What this amount should be is probably not altogether easy of ascertainment, but in that connection it is of interest to consider a similar provision in the Employment Act of June 28, 1913, which repeals the act we have under consideration. Section 9 of the new act provides for a petition to the industrial board, established by the act, for the payment of compensation in a lump sum under conditions substantially the same as those providing for the presentation of the petition to the court under the act under consideration, but it also, further provides that if "it appears to the best interest of the parties that such compensation be so paid, the board shall order the commutation of the compensation to an equivalent lump sum, which commutation shall be an amount which will equal the total sum of the probable future payments capitalized at their present value, upon the basis of interest, calculated at three per centum per annum with annual rests." This provision of the new law would seem to afford a reasonable rule for ascertaining the value of compensation to be paid in a lump sum, which might be properly applied in determining the amount due under similar circumstances by the terms of the old law." See to the same effect Schwarm v. George Thomson, etc. Co. 281 Ill. 486, 118 N. E. 95; Matecny v. Vierling Steel Works, 187 Ill. App. 448. It is not necessary to show that the best interests of both parties require that a lump sum shall be awarded. Schwarm v. George Thomson, etc. Co. supra. However, the party applying for redemption must show that it is for his interest that the award shall be made, and if he fails to make out a prima facie case, redemption will not be allowed. Forschner v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 99, 115 N. E. 912; H. G. Goelitz Co. v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 164, 115 N. E. 855.

Under the Indiana act an award of a lump sum for a permanent partial disability was affirmed in Underhill v. Central Hospital for Insane, 117 N. E. 870.

Under the Kansas act the discretion of the trial court in awarding compensation in a lump sum will not ordinarily be interfered with. Thus in Gorrell v. Battelle, 93 Kan. 370, 144 Pac. 244, wherein a lump sum was awarded for the loss of a hand, the court said: "The defendant insists that compensation must cease when the plaintiff's partial incapacity to work as the result of his injury ceases, that the plaintiff is likely to become able to work with his remaining eye, and to secure suitable employment, so that incapacity will end long before the expiration of the time for which he is allowed compensation. Therefore, it is said, an award of periodical payments should have been made instead of judgment for a lump sum. It may be conceded that compensation should cease when incapacity to work as the result of injury ceases, but the defendant's argument ignores the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff's incapacity is permanent so far as the remedy afforded by the statute is concerned. The statute confers express power to render judgment in a lump sum instead of making an award of periodical payments. In every case the trial court must exercise its judgment and discretion as to the best method of making compensation in the light of all the facts, and the result cannot be disturbed on appeal except for an abuse of the power." See to the same effect the following cases: Cain v. National Zinc Co. 94 Kan. 679, 680, 146 Pac. 1165, 148 Pac. 251; Ackerson v. National Zinc Co. 96 Kan. 781, 153 Pac. 530; Halverhout v. Southwestern Milling Co. 97 Kan. 484, 155 Pac. 916; Messick v. McEntire, 97 Kan. 813, 156 Pac. 740; Roberts v. Charles Wolff Packing Co. 98 Kan. 750, 160 Pac. 221; Girten v. National Zinc Co. 98 Kan. 405, 158 Pac. 33; McCorkle v. Red Star Mill, etc. Co. 99 Kan. 131, 160 Pac. 983. See also the reported case.

The Minnesota provision for lump sum awards is somewhat unusual, being as follows: "The amounts of compensation payable periodically under the law, either by agreement of the parties, or by decisions of the court, may be commuted to one or more lump sum payments, except compensation due for death and permanent disability. These may be commuted only with the consent of the district court." In State v. Dist. Ct. 134 Minn. 16, 158 N. W. 713, it was held that the court had no authority to grant a lump sum award without the consent of the parties. It was said in that case: "We find no statute like ours except in Nebraska, and it seems to us that the court of that state has correctly construed the statute. The whole idea of periodical payments is to give the workman an income payable as his wages were paid. In cases of injuries that are not serious, commutation to a lump sum is left to the agreement of the parties. In cases of more serious injury, the agreement is ineffectual unless the court gives its consent, finding a lump sum payment to be for the best interest of the workman. But in no case can the court commute the payments unless the parties agree. All the authorities agree that the discretion, where it exists, to award a lump sum judgment, should be sparingly exercised. In most cases it is much better for the workman and his family that the compensation be paid in instalments corresponding to the payment of his wages. This is the plan of the act, and it is only in exceptional cases that the court should approve a commutation."

Under the provision for lump sum awards in the Nebraska act, which is identical with that of Minnesota quoted in the preceding paragraph, it is held that the consent of both parties is essential to a lump sum award. Johansen v. Union Stock Yards Co. 99 Neb. 328, 156 N. W. 511; Bailey v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. 99 Neb. 109, 155 N. W. 237. Where both parties are desirous of commuting the periodical payments to a lump sum the court may direct that the award shall be made in that form. Pierce v. Boyer-Van Kuran Lumber, etc. Co. 99 Neb. 321, 156 N. W. 509, L.R.A.1916D 970, wherein it was said: "This court had occasion to consider one phase of this question in the recent case of Bailey v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. 99 Neb. 109. In that case the employer and the workman had agreed upon such commutation and the trial court rendered judgment in a lump sum. The question was whether the court had power to do so without the consent of the insurance company, which was also a party to the suit and was objecting to such commutation. This court sustained the trial court in so holding. It may no doubt sometimes happen that the workman, or his dependents, will be placed at a disadvantage by the refusal of the employer to agree to commutation in a lump sum. He may be compelled to receive a much less amount than he is entitled to because of his necessity to have the same paid in a lump sum. In the recent case above cited, the court construed the statute and held that the statute implies 'that a previous agreement must have been reached which will be ratified by the district court, and that without such an agreement the court cannot compel such a commutation of payments. . . . We do not feel at liberty to transpose the language of this section, as plaintiff desires, and change its meaning so as to make commutation compulsory. The meaning is not ambiguous. The fact that the legislature did not express such a thought, while many such statutes do, is significant.' The law provides that 'interested parties shall have the right to settle all matters of compensation between themselves.' Section 3677. Section 3681, which provides that periodical payments may be commuted, is in harmony with this provision. It does not provide that the district court may order commutation at the request of one of the parties, but does provide that the parties themselves cannot agree upon a commutation in certain cases without the consent of the court. If there is doubt in regard to the justice of this provision, there seems to be nothing in the language of the statute that would justify the court in construing it differently, and the remedy, if one is needed, must be by the legislature. It does not appear that the parties had agreed upon commutation, and the court has no authority to order it without such agreement."

Under the New Jersey act the court in James A. Banister Co. v. Kriger, 84 N. J. L. 30, 85 Atl. 1027, 89 Atl. 924, reversed a lump sum award because the trial judge had, in commuting periodical payments, fixed a sum in excess of the weekly payments to be paid in future instalments. The court held that the award should have been made equal to the present value of the periodical payments. The judgment of the trial court was also reversed in Mockett v. Ashton, 84 N. J. L. 452, 453, 90 Atl. 127, wherein the judge in granting a lump sum award failed to determine the periodical compensation or to disclose the manner in which he had arrived at the amount of the award. It was held in New York Shipbuilding Co. v. Buchanan, 84 N. J. L. 543, 87 Atl. 86, that an award of a lump sum could not be sustained, when unsupported by any evidence as to the necessity therefor. The court said: "Paragraph 20 of the act requires the 'determination' of the trial judge to be filed in writing, and that there shall be contained in this determination (or in the judgment entered thereon, according as we construe the statute), 'a statement of facts as determined by the trial judge.' Clearly it is intended that the judgment in every phase shall be supported by a specific finding of fact which may be submitted to and considered by a court of review. Accordingly a general finding that petitioner was permanently injured, without stating the nature of the injury, was held insufficient. Long v. Bergen Pleas, 86 Atl. 529. So also was the award of a lump sum by way of commutation, without stating the amount of weekly payment and number of weeks as a basis therefor. Ib. In the same case a ruling on the question whether facts to support the exercise of the court's discretion in commuting to a lump sum should be stated in the determination or judgment was reserved as not essential to the decision. That question is now fairly before us, and we are clearly of opinion that such a statement of facts should be contained in the written findings of the common pleas. No such facts being stated in the case at bar, the award of a lump sum is without legal support." See also Long v. Bergen County Ct. 84 N. J. L. 117, 86 Atl. 529; Diskon v. Bubb, 88 N. J. L. 513, 96 Atl. 660, and Baur v. Essex County, 89 N. J. L. 128, 95 Atl. 627, wherein the court awarded a lump sum without stating any reason therefor.

In Adams v. New York, etc. R. Co. 175 App. Div. 714, 161 N. Y. S. 919, the court, in construing the provisions of the New York act respecting lump sum awards, held that the theory of the act was primarily to provide for periodical payments, but that in exceptional cases the sum might be computed, and a lump sum awarded, to be paid either to the dependents under section 25, or into the state fund under section 27. The court said: "Section 25 provides in certain cases for the payment of a lump sum to the injured employee or in case of death to his dependents, whereas section 27 provides for the payment of such lump sum into the state fund, which fund then becomes liable for the periodical payments. The phraseology of the two sections is somewhat different, but their purpose is substantially the same except that under one section the lump sum payment goes to the injured employee, or in case of death his dependents, whereas under the other section the lump sum payment goes to the state fund. The amount of the payments is the same under either section and it can make no difference to the employer or insurer who receives the payment. The two sections are to be read together, therefore, and each is to be construed in the light of the other, and each is to be regarded as supplementing the other. What has been said in regard to the meaning and effect of section 25 applies also to section 27. It is not the purpose of either section to break down the theory of periodical compensation. It was not the purpose of the legislature to authorize the commission to emasculate this feature of the law or to virtually repeal the provision that 'compensation under the provisions of this chapter shall be payable periodically by the employer, in accordance with the method of payment of the wages of the employee at the time of his injury or death, and shall be so provided for in any award.' That stands as the general policy of the law and the commission is without power to repeal it or authority to ignore it except in particular cases. The commission has by an omnibus resolution destroyed this theory of the law in all death cases where the employer is insured in a mutual compensation insurance company or is a self-insurer. If the commission can do this it can pass a resolution requiring the payment of a lump sum into the state fund or to the injured employee or his dependents in every case and thereby destroy absolutely the theory of periodical payments and accomplish a repeal of an important feature of the law. We do not think that that was the intent of the statute. The purpose of sections 25 and 27 is the same. Particular cases may arise where payment to the employee or his dependents or payment into the state fund of one lump sum may be in the interest of justice. But such cases are exceptional and must be dealt with as they arise. No sweeping set of rules can be enunciated to apply to all cases. Section 25 requires that such a determination shall be 'in the interest of justice,' and section 27 requires that it must be 'possible to compute the present value of all future payments with due regard for life contingencies.' This latter provision in the statute implies that there are cases where the present value of future payments cannot be properly computed. The commission is not at liberty to guess at the present value of future payments regardless of the contingencies which may arise. The meaning of the statute is that the situation and conditions must be such that the present value of future payments may be arrived at on a scientific basis and with an approximate approach to certainty and fairness and to the monetary equivalent of the payments which the statute requires to be made periodically in the future." In McCarthy v. McAllister Steamboat Co. 94 Misc. 692, 158 N. Y. S. 563, an action to recover a lump sum award as provided by the New Jersey statute, the complaint failed to allege that the amount of the award had been determined by the court of common pleas, and the plaintiff was held not to be entitled to recover. See also Wozneak v. Buffalo Gas Co. 175 App. Div. 268, 161 N. Y. S. 675, an action to determine whether an award to a deceased workman terminated on his death or passed to his personal representatives, wherein the court held that in the event that a lump sum was awarded, regard should be had to the time in which payments were to be made and that the insurance company should be allowed to discharge its liability for a sum less than the total of the weekly payments.

Under the Ohio statute it was held in State v. Industrial Commission, 92 Ohio St. 434, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1162, 111 N. E. 299, L.R.A.1916D 944, that though the statute gives the industrial board the power to commute biweekly payments, a decision of the board ordering compensation to be paid biweekly for six years would not be disturbed. The court said: "As the board in this case awarded the dependent the sum of $1,872 and ordered the same paid in biweekly instalments at the rate of $6 per week, to continue for six years from the date of the death of the employee. it has, in making the award, fully complied with the law, and the court is without power to require it to commute the balance remaining due to one lump sum. That is a matter, under sections 39 and 40, wholly within the discretion of the board, but the petition shows that the board has refused to pay the relator any part of the award since the death of the dependent or to continue the biweekly payments. The writ therefore must order the board to pay to relator the sum of the biweekly payments which have accrued since dependent's death and to continue such payments until the full amount originally awarded is fully paid unless commutation is ordered by the board."

The Texas statute providing for the maturing of an award of instalments has been held not to be applicable to a proceeding pending at the time of its enactment. Texas Employers' Ins. Assoc. v. Bryan, 198 S. W. 342. In Roach v. Texas Employers' Ins. Assoc. 195 S. W. 328, it was held that in an action on an award of weekly payments the recovery must be in accordance with the terms of the award and not in a lump sum.

Under the Washington act, in Sinnes v. Daggert, 80 Wash. 673, 142 Pac. 5, a lump sum award of $1,200 for the loss of several fingers, being within the statutory amount, was sustained.

DALE

v.

SAUNDERS ET AL.

New York Court of Appeals—April 25, 1916.

218 N. Y. 59; 112 N. E. 571.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Theory of Liability.

In a case arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Consol. Laws, c. 67) the doctrine of respondeat superior has no application, nor do the rules of employers' liability for negligence control, but compensation is awarded workmen injured in certain enumerated occupations.

Who Is "Employee" within Act.

The word "employee" as specifically defined in Workmen's Compensation Act, § 3, subd. 4, means a person who is engaged in a hazardous employment in the service of an employer carrying on or conducting the same upon the premises or at the plant, or in the course of his employment away from the plant of his employer.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where an employer hires the services of his team and employee to another to haul sand, the employee is still working for the original employer when he is loading sand in a pit for the purpose of hauling it, and therefore is entitled to compensation from the employer.

[See note at end of this case.]

Review of Facts.

As provided by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, the decision of the workmen's compensation commission is final as to questions of fact, and the court, on appeal from its ruling, is limited to review of questions of law.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916B 475; Ann. Cas. 1918B 647].

Dale v. Saunders, 171 N. Y. App. Div. 528, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Third Judicial Department.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Rose Dale, claimant, and Saunders et al., defendants. Claim allowed by State Industrial Commission. Decision affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Frederick T. Pierson for appellants.

Egburt E. Woodbury and Harold J. Hinman for respondent.

[61] POUND, J.—This is an appeal by Saunders Brothers, the general employer, from an order of the Appellate Division, third department, affirming by a divided court an award of the workmen's compensation commission made to Rose Dale, widow, and to the children, for the death of Frank Dale. The only question in the case is whether Dale was employed by Saunders Brothers at the time of his death within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Saunders Brothers urge that he was the special employee of one Walsh and that the special employer should pay and the general employer should not. The facts are undisputed and are as follows:

On October 10, 1914, the day when Dale received the injuries resulting in his death, he resided at 26 Cornell street, Auburn, New York, and was on that date, and for several years prior thereto had been, employed as a driver of a team and wagon by Saunders Bros., who were engaged in the business of brick making at Auburn, New York. Saunders Bros. also hired out their teams for trucking purposes and furnished drivers with the teams and received therefor $5.50 a day for driver, team and wagon. Walsh owned a sand bank adjoining the brick yard of Saunders Bros. one outlet of which was through the property of Saunders Bros. On said date [62] Walsh requested of Saunders Bros. a team, wagon and driver for the purpose of having some sand delivered to Walsh's customers in the city of Auburn. Saunders Bros. sent Dale with a team and wagon. This arrangement was frequently made between Saunders Bros. and Walsh. Upon receiving from Walsh an order for a team, Saunders Bros. selected the driver to go on the work with the team. The wages of Dale were paid by Saunders Bros., namely, $2.00 per day, Saunders Bros. receiving from Walsh for the team and driver $5.50 per day. The duties of Dale were to go to the Walsh sand pit, load his wagon with sand, and deliver the sand in the city of Auburn at places designated by Walsh. Walsh had no power to discharge Dale nor any control over him except to direct where the sand should be taken. Saunders Bros. saw Dale about every two hours during the day and sometimes gave directions as to how Dale should drive. On said date while Dale was assisting in loading the sand into the wagon on Walsh's premises, a sand bank fell on him, and crushed him against the wagon, causing injuries from which he died the same day.

In negligence cases the question often arises as to the proper application of the doctrine of respondeat superior when an employee whose negligence causes an accident is at the time in the general pay and service of one and under the control and direction of another. The latter has been held liable as a special employer when it could be said that the employee was his servant at the time of the accident in a sense and degree which served to impose liability for negligence. (Higgins v. Western Union Telegraph Co. 156 N. Y. 75, 50 N. E. 500, 66 Am. St. Rep. 699; Howard v. Ludwig, 171 N. Y. 507, 64 N. E. 172.) The question, who is the master, also arises at times in employees' actions for negligent injuries. But the question in this case is not one of responsibility for negligent injury inflicted upon strangers nor upon an employee. The doctrine of respondeat superior has no application here, nor are the rules of employers' liability [63] for negligence controlling. Compensation provided for in the Workmen's Compensation Act is payable for injuries sustained or death incurred by employees engaged in specified hazardous employments carried on by the employer for pecuniary gain (Workmen's Compensation Law, § 3, subd. 5), including the operation on streets and elsewhere of wagons drawn by horses. (Workmen's Compensation Law, § 2, group 41.) The word "employee" means a person who is engaged in a hazardous employment in the service of an employer carrying on or conducting the same upon the premises or at the plant, or in the course of his employment away from the plant of his employer. (Workmen's Compensation Law, § 2, subd. 4; Post v. Burger, 216 N. Y. 544, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, 111 N. E. 351.) Saunders Bros. carried on the business of trucking for pecuniary gain. No claim is made that Walsh was carrying on the business of trucking for pecuniary gain. Dale was working for Saunders Bros. as a teamster when he met the accident that caused his death. He was engaged in teaming, not in "the operation of a sand pit." (Workmen's Compensation Law, § 2, group 19.) The duties of a teamster properly include the loading of his wagon, and are not limited to the driving of the team. (Costello v. Taylor, 217 N. Y. 179, 111 N. E. 755.) All this seems clear, but in any event the decision of the commission is final as to questions of fact. (Workmen's Compensation Law, § 20.) The jurisdiction of this court is limited to the review of questions of law, and if any question is presented upon the facts stated as to whose employee Dale was it is one of fact only. (Howard v. Ludwig, supra; Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation, 203 N. Y. 191, Ann. Cas. 1913A 883, 96 N. E. 406, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 481).

The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, with costs.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., Collin, Cuddeback, Hogan and Seabury, JJ., concur; Hiscock, J., concurs in result.

Order affirmed.

Introductory.

The present note discusses the more recent cases dealing with the question who is a "workman" or "employee" within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act. The earlier cases on the subject are collected in the notes to Walker v. Crystal Palace Football Club, Ann. Cas. 1913C 25, and Hillestad v. Industrial Ins. Commission, Ann. Cas. 1916B 789.

The question to which the present discussion is addressed presupposes an occupation or industry within the scope of the compensation law. For a discussion of what occupations are so included, see the note to Uphoff v. Industrial Board, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1.

English Statutes.

Under the English workmen's compensation act the members of the crew of a fishing boat who are compensated wholly by a share of the catch are not regarded as workmen, but a member of such a crew is none the less a workman within the act because in addition to his wages he is to receive a bonus in case the catch exceeds a certain amount. Duck v. North Sea Steam Trawling Co. [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 529, 9 B. W. C. C. 83.

So in Newstead v. Steam Trawler Labrador, 114 L. T. N. S. 27, it appeared that the chief engineer of a steam trawler was employed under an agreement containing a stipulation that if the earnings of the vessel exceeded a certain sum he as well as the rest of the crew was to receive a bonus. Otherwise his wages were fixed. It was held that he was a "workman" within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act. The court said: "It seems that by the custom of this firm and by the understanding and arrangement between the parties, if the vessel made £100 the skipper was entitled to £1, and in that particular case each member of the crew was entitled to half-a-crown. If the vessel made more—£150, for example—it was double, and so on. What was the effect of that? It was not, as it seems to me, any part of the profits, nor was it concerned with the gross earnings of the working of the vessel, because it seems to me that there is an obligation on the part of the owners of the trawler to pay this half-a-crown (to take that as one instance; it will do just as well as any other) in a certain event, which event is measured by the net earnings of the vessel. I see no ground for holding that it was in any sense of the word a share of the gross earnings of the working of the vessel any more than the actual wages which were payable to the seamen could be treated as being a share of the gross earnings of the vessel, although the sum paid both for wages and for this bonus—the half-a-crown—would figure in the ship's accounts as against the receipts on the other side. In my view this case is not within the authorities which can in any way bind us to say that the deceased was not entitled to the benefit of the act. I agree with the decision of the learned county court judge. I think that it was quite right, and the appeal therefore fails and will be dismissed with costs."

In Oates v. Turner, 115 L. T. N. S. 186, the court stated the facts and its conclusions as follows: "This is an appeal which deals with a very small pecuniary amount. £4, but which is said to be likely to affect a large body of workmen at Sheffield, men who are called 'jobbing grinders.' The proved facts are these: Turner & Co., who are master cutlers, advertised for a jobbing grinder. A jobbing grinder has to provide himself or to have provided for him tools, and he wants to get power to work the trough, and it is customary at Sheffield to make an arrangement with a jobbing grinder similar to, but not in all respects identical with, that which was made in the present case. Oates replied to the advertisement; he saw Turner & Co.; they asked him whether he would buy the tools which his predecessor had left there; they said £20, I think, was the cost; he said: 'Yes, I will buy them and will pay you at the rate of 5s. a week out of my wages.' He entered into a contract which was not in writing, but the terms of which are sufficiently established by the evidence. He was to pay 10s. 6d. a week for the room or the wheel, it may be called, in which he used to work, and in the winter time he was to pay some small sum per week for the use of gas. He was to do work for Turner & Co. as a jobbing grinder when they had work to give him. At that time and for some time afterwards they had a good deal of work, and I gather that substantially all Oates' time was occupied doing work which Turner & Co. were able to give him. But the time came when trade was slack, when they had not the work for him, and then he, with the knowledge and approval—I care not whether it was with the express consent, but with the knowledge and approval—of Turner & Co., took in work from other master cutlers, which he did in the room that he hired from Turners, and at the troughs that were worked by the power supplied by Turners. The time came when Oates did comparatively little work for Turner & Co. themselves, but did a great deal of work for, amongst others, one Ashton. Ashton is the name which is mentioned here. I have assumed for the moment that it was all Ashton's work. While he was engaged upon the work sent him by Ashton he met with an accident. He was injured, and now he claims against Turner & Co. that he is entitled to compensation for an accident which, he says, arose 'out of and in the course of' his employment. Turner & Co. say: 'This was not an accident which arose "out of or in the course of the employment." You were not at this time doing this work for Ashton as part of our contract of service with you.' If it had occurred while he was doing their work it may be, and for the present purpose I assume it would be, true that Turner & Co. might be liable. But what have they to do with an accident that took place while he was doing Ashton's work? I asked Mr. Hewart what was the relation between Oates, Turner & Co., and Ashton. I think he felt some difficulty in answering that question. In my view it is reasonably clear that Turner & Co. cannot be made liable unless it be proved, or unless there be evidence which justifies the inference, that Turner & Co. lent the man Oates to Ashton, in which case Turner & Co. would be the 'employers' within the definition in the act. But there is no particle of evidence to suggest any such conclusion. The question was not asked of Turner & Co.: 'Did you lend this man to Ashton. Did you know anything about Ashton. Did you know whose work he was doing.' It was not asked of the man Oates, and I think it would be wholly wrong to make an inference of that kind for which there is no foundation of fact in the evidence which was taken before the learned county court judge. The learned county court judge treated himself, I will not say as bound by, but as greatly influenced by, a decision which he himself gave some years ago in an unreported case. There may or may not in that case have been evidence that there was a lending, or there may have been evidence which justified the inference that there had been a lending, by the employers there to the person in whose service the accident took place. In my opinion the learned county court judge went wrong in the conclusion at which he arrived. I quite accept what Mr. Hewart has put before us very forcibly, that the question is not whether upon reading these notes I should have come to the same conclusion, but it is this: Was there evidence upon which the reasonable inference could be drawn by the learned county court judge? I am bound to say, with the utmost possible respect for His Honor Judge Benson, who has given us a very careful and excellent note, that I think that the award he made cannot be supported, because there was no evidence to justify the finding at which he arrived."

In Bobbey v. Crosbie, 114 L. T. N. S. 244, it appeared that Crosbie engaged one Watts to supply a gang of men to unload a vessel. The money paid by Crosbie was equally divided among the men, each of whom made a small allowance to Watts in consideration of his supplying the ladders. In sustaining an award against Crosbie in favor of a member of the gang so employed it was said: "The learned county court judge might reasonably say this: Bobbey was not employed by Watts; he was rather in the nature of a worker with Watts, and that he and the rest of the gang agreed—Watts being the spokesman—to do this work for Messrs. Crosbie; in other words, that they were employed by Crosbie to do this work and therefore came within the workmen's compensation act. I think in substance that is what is found by the learned county court judge, and in my opinion there was material which justified him in coming to that conclusion."

In Fraser v. Driscoll [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 222, while the case went off on another point, the court apparently was of the opinion that a temporary cook at a choir boy's school was a casual employee and not within the act.

Statutes in United States.

IN GENERAL.

To bring a person within a workmen's compensation act it has been held that he must not only be employed but must enter on his employment. Bloomington, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 239, 114 N. E. 517. In that case it appeared that certain men were on Friday employed as railroad section men to go to work on the following Monday. They were on the same day sent to a railroad bunk house and on that day one of them was injured by a passing train. It was held that he was not at that time an employee of the railroad.

In Cameron v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 83, 159 Pac. 149, involving the status of an agent who was compensated by salary for certain services and by commission for others, the court said: "Petitioner presents the proposition that Trobitz sustained a dual relationship to him, the one, that of employee, the other, that of 'independent contractor or partner;' that, had he been injured while in pursuance of the duties for which he drew a salary of $60 a month, the award would be correct, but having been injured in the performance of these independent duties petitioner is not liable. We cannot agree with this view. The employer was entitled to all of Trobitz's working hours and was empowered to direct his labor. In either capacity he was an employee. It is not an uncommon thing for retail merchants, for laundrymen, and the like to pay a commission to the drivers of their delivery wagons for all new business which they bring in. It has never been held that this circumstance creates a distinct relationship in law. They are still employees, as was properly held by the court of appeal under similar facts in Summer v. Nevin, 4 Cal. App. 347, 87 Pac. 1105. A certain amount of freedom of action was inherent in the nature of the work which the injured man performed, but this, however, did not change the character of his employment, for the employer himself still had general supervision and control over it."

In Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, Ann. Cas. 1917E 390, 156 Pac. 491, it appeared that one Mason was employed as a night watchman by the Western Metal Supply Company. He was also employed in the same capacity at the same time by five other firms. He made regular rounds of the premises of his employers. He had a separate agreement with each employer. He was killed while trying to prevent the commission of a burglary on the premises of the Western Metal Supply Company. It was held that he was an employee of that company. The court said: "The petitioner argues that the facts above recited do not justify the conclusion that Mason was an employee of the petitioner. On the contrary, it is insisted, he was an independent contractor. Section 13 of the act defines the term 'employer' as 'every person, firm, voluntary association and private corporation . . . who has any person in service under any appointment or contract of hire.' The term 'employee' is defined in section 14 as 'every person in the service of an employer . . . under any appointment or contract of hire.' If it be conceded that the relationship thus described is that of master and servant, as defined in section 2009 of the Civil Code, it must nevertheless be held that the evidence before the commission justified the finding that Mason was a servant of the appellant. 'The real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as the servant of another is to ascertain whether, at the time when the injury was inflicted, he was subject to such person's orders and control and was liable to be discharged by him for disobedience of orders or misconduct.' (Wood on Master and Servant, § 317.) If Mason had been working for the petitioner alone as night watchman, it could hardly be claimed that he was not to be regarded as a servant of such petitioner. He would have been 'in the service' of the employer 'under a contract of hire,' to use the language of the workmen's compensation act, or, if we look to section 2009 of the Civil Code, it might well have been found that he was 'employed to render personal service to his employer otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling,' and in such service remained 'entirely under the control and direction' of the employer. The fact that Mason was working at the same time for different employers is not necessarily inconsistent with the relation of master and servant between any one of such employers and himself. (1 Labatt on Master and Servant, 2d ed. § 2.) The findings and conclusions of the commission on questions of fact are conclusive. (Sec. 84.) If a finding has the support of substantial evidence, it is beyond review here. The most that can be said is that a finding that Mason was an independent contractor might reasonably have been made. But certainly the conclusion to the contrary was one that could have been entertained by a rational mind. It is, therefore, binding upon this application."

In Bargey v. Massaro Macaroni Co. 218 N. Y. 410, 113 N. E. 407, it appeared that Bargey was engaged by the defendant to erect a partition on its place of business. While so employed he was killed by the collapse of the building. The defendant was engaged in the manufacture of macaroni. It was held that Bargey was not an employee of the defendant, the court saying: "Bargey, the deceased, was not an employee, because he was not engaged in the preparation of macaroni. The placing of the partition was not an adjunct of or within a department of the employment of preparing macaroni. It was a specific act for which Bargey was specially employed, which had no relation to the hazardous employment except that it made more useful, within the contemplation of the employer, the building in which the employment was carried on. He was not engaged in the preparation of macaroni, even as in partitioning off a part of the residence of a physician as a professional office he would not be engaged in the occupation of practicing medicine. He was not, within the intentment of the law, an employee of the company."

peared that the deceased had been employed by the defendant for about eight months. His wages were $3.68 per day payable weekly. He had worked on Monday, the day previous to the accident, and came to work a little late on Tuesday, the day of the accident. The superintendent in charge told him that he need not work any more. As he started to leave he fell and received the injuries which caused his death. It was held that he was an employee at the time of the accident within the meaning of the New York workmen's compensation act.

In McPhee's Case, 222 Mass. 1, 109 N. E. 633, it appeared that McPhee was employed by the Atlantic Park Company to protect the latter's property from fire. He organized a fire brigade for that purpose. It further appeared that McPhee was also a regular member of the fire department of the town where the property of the Atlantic Park Company was situated. Prior to the injury a fire broke out in a garage in the vicinity of the company's premises. McPhee went to the fire for the purpose of extinguishing the same and also to protect the company's property. While engaged in extinguishing the fire he was injured. It was held that he was an "employee" of the Atlantic Park Company within the meaning of the Massachusetts workmen's compensation act. The court said: "While the deceased was a member of the town fire department and as such required to attend the fire, it might well be that his paramount duty was owed to the subscriber to protect its property from destruction by fire and to prevent thereby a panic among its patrons and the disaster which might ensue. It does not seem to us possible to say as matter of law that when he had exhausted the chemical of the subscriber and began working in connection with the fire apparatus of the town, he ceased acting primarily in the interests of his employer, who was the subscriber, and began working exclusively for the town. The interests of his general employer in the extinguishment of a fire in such threatening proximity to its property well may have been found to have been so dominant as to absorb the exclusive attention of McPhee and to have rendered him in the direction of his own conduct chiefly concerned to act for its interests as to the means employed and the result to be achieved in the particular service of extinguishing the fire. If this was so, then his efforts were directed to the promotion of the business of that general employer even though it happened that at the same time he was acting in accordance with his obligation to the town fire department."

In Beckmann v. Oelerich, 174 App. Div. 353, 160 N. Y. S. 791, it appeared that the claimant, who was acting as foreman for the defendant corporation, was also the vice-president and a stockholder of that firm. It was held, nevertheless, that he was an employee. The court said: "As to the claim that the claimant was not an employee within the meaning of the act. The claimant spoke of his compensation for services as salary. He was the owner of seven of the 100 shares of stock of the corporation. There is no claim that the payments received by him were dividends upon his stock. The commission found that the weekly payment made him was his weekly wage. Its finding was fully justified by the evidence. While he was vice-president of the corporation his employment was doubtless through the board of directors, of whom he may or may not have been one. Although he was the general foreman, he worked in the various industries of the corporation the same as other workmen, and was doing the work of an ordinary employee at the time he was injured. His being vice-president and a stockholder in no way affected his status as an employee. Connor Workmen's Compensation Law, 31, 96; Aken v. Barnet, etc. Knitting Co. 118 App. Div. 463, 103 N. Y. S. 1078, affirmed 192 N. Y. 554, 85 N. E. 1105."

But in Bowne v. S. W. Bowne Co. 221 N. Y. 28, 116 N. E. 364, reversing 176 App. Div. 131, 102 N. Y. S. 244, the president and majority stockholder of a corporation, injured while temporarily performing manual labor, was held not to be a workman. The court said: "The words of the statute are not clear. A workman in a broad sense is one who works in any department of physical or mental labor, but in common speech is one who is employed in manual labor, such as an artificer, mechanic, or artisan; while an employee in a broad sense is one who receives salary or wages or other compensation from another (Gurney v. Atlantic, etc. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 358), but in common speech the term is usually applied to clerks, laborers, etc., and not to the higher officers of a corporation. The statutory definition speaks of one 'in the service' of an employer. In a broad sense the officers of a corporation serve it, but in common speech they are not referred to as its servants or employees. . . . The claimant in this case is willing, in order to collect a workman's allowance for himself from the insurance carrier, to assume a status that he might be the first to disclaim for any other purpose. Theoretically he was subject to the orders of his corporation and was liable to be discharged for disobedience. Practically he was the corporation, and only by a legal fiction its servant in any sense. Section 30 of the act provides that; 'No benefits, savings or insurance of the injured employee, independent of the provisions of this chapter, shall be considered in determining the compensation or benefits to be paid under this chapter.' But these words are appropriate to the meager advantages of a workman and not to the comfortable dividends of the stockholder. Upon the most liberal construction contended for, consistent with the purpose of the law, the order should be reversed, with costs in this court and in the appellate division against the industrial commission, and the claim dismissed."

DISTINCTION BETWEEN INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR AND WORKMAN.

In a number of cases the question has arisen whether an injured person was a "workman" within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act or was an independent contractor for the work on which he was engaged. In cases of that kind the test applied has been whether any power of superintendence or control was retained by the employer.

Thus in Tuttle v. Embury-Martin Lumber Co. 192 Mich. 385, 158 N. W. 875, a person contracting to haul logs for a lumber company at a stated price per thousand was held to be an employee and not an independent contractor. The court said: "In our opinion there was such control over the work of Tuttle, by the company, as makes it inconsistent to say that Tuttle was an independent contractor. His work was limited by the right of the company to terminate it at any time, and it was for no definite period or amount. The loading and unloading were under control of the company, both as to time and place. True, he was in charge of his team while going from the skidway to the mill, but that it was true of all the drivers, whether working by the month or the thousand."

In Hackel v. Serviss, 167 N. Y. S. 348, it was held that one who for a lump sum agreed to paint a house was a contractor and not an employee.

In Zeitlow v. Smock (Ind.) 117 N. E. 665, a person employed to do certain hauling, over whom no control was retained by the employer, was held to be an independent contractor and not a workman.

In Perham v. American Roofing Co. 193 Mich. 221, 159 N. W. 140, one who undertook to cover a roof for a stipulated price was held to be not an employee but an independent contractor.

In Decatur Ry. etc. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 472, 114 N. E. 915, a person agreeing to unload coal at a stated price per ton, hiring his own help, was held to be an employee and not an independent contractor. The court said: "The plaintiff in error insists that Mulverhill was an independent contractor, because he was not in the unloading of the coal under the supervision and direction of the plaintiff in error as to the manner in which the work should be done; that he hired and paid his own help and that he was paid by the ton. On the other hand, there was evidence that it was the duty of Mulverhill to keep the bins full; that the head fireman directed him where to scoop the coal, when to quit, and when there was not enough coal in certain bins told him to scoop more, and that Mulverhill was under his orders to keep the bins filled. He was subject to discharge at any time within notice and without a reason. The right to control the manner of doing the work is the principal consideration which determines whether the worker is an employee or an independent contractor. This work was very simple. No control would ordinarily be required except to direct where the coal should be unloaded, and this control was exercised. There was nothing in the contract indicating that the company surrendered the right to control the manner in which the unloading should be done. It retained the right to discharge Mulverhill on the instant. The method of payment was not inconsistent with a contract of hiring, and the retention of hospital dues and the giving of a pass tended to establish the relation of employer and employee. There was evidence from which the industrial board might reasonably find that Mulverhill was an employee of the plaintiff in error."

In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, it was held that a person furnishing teams and drivers was an independent contractor though he drove one of the teams. The court said: "It is clear that the contract was not one between employer and employee in the sense of section 14 of the compensation act, but one by which Mr. Stevens agreed to furnish facilities for doing a certain sort of work. There was no stipulation between the contractor who was performing the work for the municipality and Stevens regarding wages. A lump sum was paid for each team and Mr. Tittle knew nothing, so far as the testimony reveals, regarding the amount of wages paid Stevens' driver. Neither did he pay Mr. Stevens a certain sum for use of the teams and another sum for personal services. The amount paid was $12 for two drivers, two teams, and two wagons. After the accident another driver was substituted for the injured man. He continued to perform the work just as his employer had done it, and his name was never given to the Tittle Company nor entered upon the books, but the money due for the two teams was paid to the wife of the injured man."

The case last cited was distinguished in Yolo Water, etc. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 168 Pac. 1146, wherein the person by whom a teamster was employed was held to be a foreman and not an independent contractor. The court said: "In the Western Indemnity Co. case it clearly appears that Stevens was engaged in a permanent business of 'teaming and grading,' and contracted to furnish teams and drivers for the work. In the present case Wallace was not by trade a contracting teamster, and the evidence is too vague and indefinite to warrant a finding that Wallace had contracted to furnish teams. The evidence as a whole indicates rather that Wallace regarded himself as foreman, and in that capacity employed men and teams. Wallace could not have sued petitioner for breach of contract for failing to accept teams tendered by him, nor could petitioner have sued Wallace for failure to furnish teams, because of this indefiniteness. Stevens did not act as foreman for Tittle, hiring and discharging his men, as did Wallace here, but worked under the foreman of the general contractor. Had Stevens been discharged, his teams must necessarily have been ruled off the work with him. But for aught that appears here Wallace could have been discharged, and yet the teams secured by him retained. There are other points upon which the cases can be distinguished, but the above are sufficient to deprive the case cited of the force claimed for it by petitioner. To recapitulate: The evidence shows that Wallace was authorized to employ laborers for petitioner, and, acting under that authority and as the agent for the corporation, he did employ the applicant to do work for said petitioner, and while so engaged as such employee in the very work for which he was employed, said applicant was injured."

EMPLOYEE OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

In most jurisdictions a person employed by an independent contractor is not an employee of the person for whom the latter works, within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act. Sturdivant v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 581, 158 Pac. 222; Western Indemnity Co. v. State Industrial Acc. Commission, 172 Cal. 766, 158 Pac. 1033; Packett v. Moretown Creamery Co. (Vt.) 90 Atl. 638. In the application of that rule the following have been held to be independent contractors:

—a person employed to cut wood at a stated price per cord, Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Brush (Cal.) 168 Pac. 890; Donlon v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715;

—a company employed to install an oil pumping apparatus, Western Indemnity Co. v. State Industrial Acc. Commission, 172 Cal. 766, 158 Pac. 1033;

—a carpenter employed to put up a building, Connolly v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 173 Cal. 405, 160 Pac. 239; Packett v. Moretown Creamery Co. (Vt.) 90 Atl. 638.

Under the Illinois act the principal contractor is liable if he does not require his subcontractors to insure. Parker-Washington Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 498, 113 N. E. 976.

In Massachusetts the owner or principal contractor is required by statute to insure for the benefit of the employees of an independent contractor or subcontractor. White v. George A. Fuller Co. 226 Mass. 1, 114 N. E. 829. Apparently, however, that provision does not apply to municipalities. In the case of In re Clancy (Mass.) 117 N. E. 347, it appeared that a workman was employed by one McGillicuddy as a teamster. McGillicuddy had an arrangement with the city of Springfield, Mass., by which he was to do hauling for that city at the rate of $5.25 per day, sending his team and driver to the city yards to do whatever work was to be done. The driver would inquire what work was to be done. If there was any work the city officials would inform him, but they never gave him any direction as to the manner of doing the work. A driver for McGillicuddy while so acting received injuries from which he died. It was held that he was not an employee of the city of Springfield, within the meaning of the Massachusetts workmen's compensation act. The court said: "The pertinent provision is St. 1913, c. 807, § 6, in these words: 'This act shall apply to all laborers, workmen and mechanics in the service of . . . a . . . city . . . under any . . . contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written.' It is plain that there can be no recovery. The deceased had no contract of any kind with the city. His contract of employment was exclusively with McGillicuddy, who alone was responsible for his wages. This is the plain case where the city hired from another horses, cart and driver to carry material from one place to another as its servants or officers might direct; the driver being left to deal with the horses in his own way. As was said in Peach v. Bruno, 224 Mass. 447, 113 N. E. 279, nothing is better settled under such circumstances, when nothing more appears, than that as matter of law the driver is the servant of the owner of the horses and not of the one who hires them. Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 90 N. E. 392. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648; Tornroos v. R. H. White Co. 220 Mass. 336, 107 N. E. 1015; W. S. Quinby Co. v. Estey, 221 Mass. 56, 108 N. E. 908. This principle of law applies as well to claims arising under the workmen's compensation act as in other branches of the law. Pigeon's Case, 216 Mass. 51, 102 N. E. 932, Ann. Cas. 1915A 737. The case at bar is well within the authority of the first point decided in Comerford's Case, 224 Mass. 571, 113 N. E. 460. The decision of the industrial accident board was right."

An independent contractor is liable for compensation to his employees in case of injury to them. See the reported case. And see Kirkpatrick v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 31 Cal. App. 668, 161 Pac. 274, wherein a contracting teamster was held to be liable to one of his drivers for compensation for injuries received while performing a contract made by the employer to haul for a third person.

CASUAL EMPLOYEE.

It has been uniformly held that one who is casually employed to do odd jobs is not a "workman" or "employee" within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 748, 158 Pac. 1030 (machinist employed to repair farm tractor); Blood v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 30 Cal. App. 274, 157 Pac. 1140 (person employed to paint house and furnish materials for that purpose at agreed price per day); LaGrande Laundry Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 777, 161 Pac. 988 (carpenter's helper assisting in carpenter work on premises of stockholder of corporation by whom carpenter was employed); Carter v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 168 Pac. 1065 (laborer employed for four days to load train); McLaughlin v. Industrial Board, 281 Ill. 100, 117 N. E. 819 (employment for few hours to assist other workmen); Solomon v. Bonis. 167 N. Y. S. 676 (person employed by apartment house owner to do odd jobs of plastering).

In Blood v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 30 Cal. App. 274, 157 Pac. 1140, the court said: "Under the British Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906, the word 'workman' 'does not include a person whose employment is of a casual nature and who is employed otherwise than for the purpose of the employer's trade or business.' As to both clauses within the quotation, it will be observed that there is a material difference between the language used in the British act and that of the California statute. Commenting upon a very similar difference between the Massachusetts and the British acts, the supreme court of Massachusetts has said that this difference in phraseology must be regarded as deliberately designed, and that its effect is to narrow the scope of the Massachusetts act as compared with the English act. 'No one whose employment is "casual" can recover here, while the one whose employment is "of a casual nature" comes within the act, provided it is also for the purpose of the employer's trade or business. It is possible that a distinction as to the character of the employment may be founded upon the difference between the modifying word "casual" used in our act, and the words "of a casual nature" in the English act. The phrase of our own act tends to indicate that the contract for service is the thing to be analyzed, in order to determine whether it be casual, while in the English act the nature of the service rendered is the decisive test. This distinction appears to have been made the basis of decision in Knight v. Bucknill, 6 B. W. C. C. 160, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 175, 57 Sol. J. 245. (In re Gaynor, 217 Mass. 86, 104 N. E. 339, L.R.A.1916A 363.) In the same Massachusetts decision it is noted that the ordinary signification of the word 'casual' as shown by the lexicographers is something which comes without regularity, and is occasional and incidental; that its meaning may be more clearly understood by referring to its antonyms, which are, 'regular,' 'systematic,' 'periodic,' and 'certain.' Tested by this distinction, the contract of employment of Heck by the petitioner to paint his house was casual. It was a mere occasional and incidental contract, not constituting or connected with any regular, systematic, periodic, or certain business. The supreme court of Massachusetts afterward referred to the Gaynor case as follows: 'In addition to what was said there it may be of importance (in determining whether in a particular case the "employment is but casual") to have in mind the reason for this limitation upon the class of persons who are entitled to the benefits of the workmen's compensation act. The scheme created by the workmen's compensation act is a scheme of insurance in which the premiums to be paid by the employer are based upon the wages paid by him to his employees. It may have been thought impracticable to work out a scheme of insurance if persons who are only occasionally employed are to be included among those insured.' Cheevers's Case, 219 Mass. 244, 106 N. E. 861. It appears to us that the Massachusetts decisions we have referred to are based upon sound reasoning and may well be applied in the interpretation of our own statute. We, therefore, have reached the conclusion that the employment of the applicant Heck named in the proceedings here under review was of a nature which did not entitle him to compensation for his injury."

In Thompson v. Twiss, 90 Conn. 444, 97 Atl. 328, L.R.A.1916E 506. It appeared that Twiss employed Thompson to develop the former's land. Twiss furnished the tools and materials. For five or six years prior to the accident Thompson had frequently done odd jobs for Twiss. During the performance of the last work Thompson hired other men to help him but they were never paid by Twiss. It was held that under these circumstances the employment was not casual. The court said: "As we examine compensation acts, we must remember that they differ in their treatment of what is casual employment. Some exclude from its benefits all casual employees; others follow the British act and exclude all whose employment is of a casual nature and not for the purposes of the trade or business. The Massachusetts, Michigan, Wisconsin and Ohio acts belong to the first class, while the Minnesota, Rhode Island, California and Connecticut acts follow the British act. . . . The English authorities early concluded that a hard and fast definition of the term casual as used in the compensation act was inadvisable, and time has confirmed the wisdom of this conclusion. As used in our act, the casual employment means the occasional or incidental employment, the employment which comes without regularity. It is in this sense the word is used in our act, rather than in the sense of an employment arising through accident or chance, which the supreme court of New Jersey has held to be the true meaning of casual in their act. Sabella v. Brazileiro, 86 N. J. L. 505, 91 Atl. 1032. If the employment be upon an employer's business for a definite time, as for a week, or a month, or longer, it is not a casual employment, whether we regard the contract of service or the nature of the service. So, too, if the employment be for a part of one's time at regularly recurring periods of time, it is not a casual employment, whether we regard the contract of service or the nature of the service. Dewhurst v. Mather [1908] 2 K. B. D. 754, 1 B. W. C. C. 328. When the employment continues for a considerable time and promises to continue a considerably longer period, the importance of whether the test is the contract of service or its nature may be large. We need not consider whether under the Massachusetts act, the test of the tenure of the employment whether regular or not, would be met by the facts of this case. We are concerned in determining whether the nature of the employment was an occasional or incidental one, a regular one not measured by tenure of service but by the character of the work. The employment of the plaintiff was in the business of Mr. Twiss, the completion of the work would require at least a number of weeks. If the plaintiff satisfied Mr. Twiss, he would remain to the end. If he choose, he could quit the work at any time. Applying our test to such an employment, we think the common judgment would agree that it was a stable and not an incidental employment, and hence not casual in nature within the meaning of our Act. But the employee who is barred by our act as amended is not merely one whose employment is of a casual nature, but, in addition, one whose employment is not in his employer's trade or business. The development of this land was one of the businesses of Mr. Twiss, not evidently his main business, and yet a very substantial one. The plaintiff was injured in the pursuit of Mr. Twiss' business, and his employment was not of a casual nature within the meaning of our act."

In McLaughlin v. Industrial Board, 281 Ill. 100, 117 N. E. 819, it appeared that one Hiler was engaged to assist other men to clear obstructions. Hiler was not a regular employee of the defendant. He was hired only at odd times. It was held that he was not a "workman" within the meaning of the Illinois workmen's compensation act. The court said: "We are of the opinion, however, that his employment was but a casual employment within the meaning of the statute. From the evidence it appears that the work of dynamiting or blasting stumps had been going on but a few hours, at most, in the morning Hiler was killed, and that work necessarily only could continue for a very short time, and was to end with the blowing out of the stumps on that particular piece of road. The real work for which Hiler was employed in the beginning was to handle a team of Younger in the plowing and grading of the road. Younger had employed at least three teams on the road a part of the time and a part of the time two teams, and at the time Hiler was killed Younger only was employing one team. When Younger had three teams employed he handled one of the teams himself and had another man besides Hiler, who was employed in the same manner that Hiler was to work with a team. When the work of dynamiting was reached only one team was employed, and Hiler was expected to use that team. The work of dynamiting the stumps was a mere casual or incidental employment in connection with the matter of grading and repairing the road, and the evidence does not show that the road district had ever before used dynamite in connection with road grading at any time; and the evidence clearly shows that that work would only continue for a few hours at most. There was no expectancy, so far as the evidence shows, that dynamite would ever be again used by the district in its road work. In the case of Aurora Brewing Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 142, 115 N. E. 207, this court held that the legislature never intended an employee who was engaged for one job lasting only three or four days to be within the terms of the workmen's compensation act, even though the employee had been employed at irregular intervals during several previous years to perform similar work. It was further held in that case that the contract for service is the thing to be analyzed in order to determine whether it be casual, and not the nature of the service rendered. Applying the same test in this case, it is clear that Hiler's employment in the hazardous occupation in this case was a casual employment, an employment that happened by mere chance. Several cases very similar to this one are cited in that opinion where the employment was held to be casual, notably the case of McCarthy v. Norcott, 2 B. W. C. C. 279. In that case a carpenter was employed to make repairs to a private house, and after those repairs were made was engaged to cut down some trees on the ground near the house, in which latter employment he was killed. The case in hand may be likened to the employment of a farm hand by a farmer to do general farming, such as plowing, planting, hoeing and fencing, and after the employment begins the farmer concludes to employ dynamiters to blow a few stumps from his field and orders this farm hand to assist in that work by boring the holes under the stumps. Irrespective of the question whether or not farmers are exempt from the operation of the workmen's compensation act, the employment of the farm hand by the farmer under the circumstances above set forth would be but a casual employment within the meaning of said act. After a careful consideration of the question we have concluded that the employment of Hiler in this case in the extra-hazardous employment was not a regular or stable employment within the meaning of the statute, but was merely a casual employment. Hiler was therefore not an employee within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act, and the industrial board had no jurisdiction of the case."

An employment "to act as foreman over a number of other carpenters in the erection of a 14-room building, involving an engagement of several months of regular and daily recurring labor" is not casual. Miller v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 32 Cal. App. 250, 162 Pa. 651.

In Dyer v. James Black Masonry, etc. Co. 192 Mich. 400, 158 N. W. 959, a person employed by a contractor to oversee from time to time the delivery and unloading of glass was held not to be a casual laborer. The court said: "In the instant case it is fair to suppose that the general contractor knew how much glass was to be delivered at the building. It became necessary in the interest of the business of the general contractor to have the delivery of the glass looked after and supervised, and claimant was employed for that purpose; that, as the glass was to be delivered as the work progressed on recurring occasions, it certainly cannot be said any of the necessary work to be done in furthering the job or enterprises was casual, for it was sure to occur and recur in the operation of the job. There was an element of certainty in the work recurring at times, which, though they could not be fixed definitely, yet were fixed generally by the agreement to look after and assist in unloading the glass as it arrived, from time to time. In our opinion, the employment of the claimant was not casual."

VAUGHAN'S SEED STORE

- v.

SIMONINI.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 24, 1916.

275 Ill. 477; 114 N. E. 163.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Election to Reject Act — Necessity — Non-hazardous Employment.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 1 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 48, § 126), gives to all employers in the state the right to elect to pay compensation to their employees according to the provisions of the act. Section 3 (section 128) provides that in certain enumerated extrahazardous occupations, it shall be presumed that the employer has elected to come under the act, and if he elects not to do so, he is denied the defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and negligence of fellow servants in actions by his employees for injuries. It is held that the voluntary election under section 1 applies to all employees in any branch of the employer's business, but the presumed election under section 3 applies only to those employees engaged in an extrahazardous occupation, so that a farm hand employed on the farm of a corporation which had made no election under the act and which operated a warehouse and office in the city cannot recover compensation for injuries received while doing ordinary farm work, though the corporation's employees in the city might be within the terms of the act.

[See note at end of this case.]

Employments within Act.

To construe Workmen's Compensation Act, § 3 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, § 128), as applying to all the business of an employer, any part of whose business was extrahazardous, would render the act unconstitutional as discriminating against him in that part of his business not extrahazardous.

[See Ann. Cas. 1917D 4.]

Error to Circuit Court, Cook county: TOMLINSON, Judge.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Anchise Simonini, claimant, and Vaughan's Seed Store, defendant. Claim allowed by Industrial Board. Decision reversed by Circuit Court. Claimant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Samuel G. Hamblen for plaintiff in error.
Henry W. Magee and E. W. Adkinson for defendant in error.

[478] DUNN, J.—The circuit court of Cook county having set aside an award of the Industrial Board allowing compensation to Anchise Simonini against Vaughan's Seed

Store and certified that the cause was one proper to be reviewed by the Supreme Court, the claimant sued out a writ of error to reverse the judgment.

The only question argued is the jurisdiction of the Industrial Board, and the facts, so far as material to this question, were stipulated.

Vaughan's Seed Store is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois for the purpose of growing, buying and selling seeds, plants, bulbs, nursery stock and agricultural implements, buying, building and operating greenhouses, and carrying on and doing a general seed, [479] agricultural implement, farming and florist business in all its branches and everywhere, and the acquiring, holding, mortgaging and conveying of estate incidental thereto. It maintains a salesroom at No. 31 West Randolph street, in the city of Chicago, for the purpose of retailing and wholesaling its goods and has an office there, where it keeps its records and books of account. In the building is a freight elevator with corrugated iron doors and caged in with iron network, which is subject to the provisions of an ordinance of the city of Chicago known as the "Building Code," for the regulating and placing of elevators and the safeguarding of individuals. It also owns and operates a private storeroom or warehouse for the purpose of storing farm products, seeds, shrubs and trees at No. 803 West Randolph street, in Chicago. At Western Springs, in the southwest part of Cook county, outside the limits of Chicago, it owns, operates and farms about 120 acres of land as a truck garden, farm and nursery, on which are greenhouses, storehouses, barns and stables. The work on the farm is managed by a superintendent, who lives there and keeps a separate account of the products raised and expenses incurred upon the farm. The products raised are the usual farm products and various seeds, bushes and trees, some of which are delivered to the retail store of the company and some are sold and delivered from the farm to purchasers. A separate account of receipts of such farm products from the farm is kept, as well as separate accounts of receipts from other farms owned by the corporation. The plaintiff in error began working for the defendant in error about January, 1914, on the farm as a farmhand, doing teaming mostly, and received $12 a week for his services. He and one other workman on the farm did most of the teaming, each ordinarily driving two horses in the nursery part of the farm, doing such hauling and other work as they were instructed to do and acting as hostlers for the horses. The applicant was never required to and never did leave the [480] farm in the course of his duties, and on or about August 16, 1914, while at work in a stable on the farm attending the horses, was kicked by one of them on his right leg and injured.

The defendant in error has not filed with the Industrial Board any notice of its election either to provide and pay compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act or to the contrary, and was therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the Industrial Board unless it was engaged in an occupation, enterprise or business mentioned in paragraph (b) of section 3 of that act and declared to be extra-hazardous. It is insisted that it is so engaged within the first, fourth and eighth clauses of that paragraph, which declares the provisions of section 3 are applicable to "an employer engaged in any of the following occupations, enterprises or businesses, namely: 1 The building, maintaining, repairing or demolishing of any structure. . . . 4. The operation of any warehouse or general or terminal storehouses. . . . 8. In any enterprise in which statutory or municipal ordinance regulations are now or shall hereafter be imposed for the regulating, guarding, use or the placing of machinery or appliances, or for the protection and safeguarding of the employees or the public therein." (Hurd's Stat. 1913, p. 1207.)

The plaintiff in error argues that the defendant in error was maintaining a structure,—that is, a greenhouse,—on the farm; that it was operating a warehouse,—that is, the storeroom where it kept its farm products, seeds, shrubs and trees, at No. 803 West Randolph street, in Chicago; and that it was engaged in an enterprise where municipal ordinances were imposed for regulating machinery for the protection and safeguarding of employees and the public,—that is, it had a freight elevator in its store at No. 31 West Randolph street, in Chicago, which was subject to the ordinances of the city of Chicago for the regulating and placing of elevators.

[481] The Workmen's Compensation act is elective on the part of the employer. By the first section any employer is authorized to elect to provide and pay compensation for accidental injuries sustained by any employee arising out of and in the course of the employment according to the provisions of the act, and thereby relieve himself from any liability for the recovery of damages except as provided by the act. His election is entirely voluntary. He has entire freedom of choice whether his relation to his employees and their mutual rights and liabilities shall continue under the common-law system or shall be such as are established by the act. If he does not elect the new system his rights under the old are not affected, and he is subject to the same liabilities and entitled to make the same defenses as before the passage of the act. This applies to all employers except those engaged in an occupation, enterprise or business declared by section 3 of the act to be extra-hazardous. Such employers have not the free election given to others but are presumed to elect the new system, and if they do elect the old, retain it not in its entirety but at the cost of surrendering that part of it which permitted the defenses of assumed risk, injury by the negligence of fellow-servants and contributory negligence. The injury sustained by the plaintiff in error was not one arising out of or in the course of any employment declared to be extra-hazardous. His employment was not different from that of the ordinary farm laborer. His injury arose out of and in the course of that employment, but had no connection with the business of maintaining a greenhouse or operating a warehouse, or with any enterprise where a municipal ordinance regulated machinery. To sustain the jurisdiction of the Industrial Board it is therefore necessary to hold not only that the defendant in error was engaged in a hazardous occupation, but that the presumption of an election to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act, arising out of such hazardous occupation, [482] applied not only to such hazardous occupation but also to all the business of such employer. Assuming, but not deciding or intimating, that maintaining and using the greenhouse, storehouse and elevator was engaging in an extra-hazardous business, we shall consider the latter proposition only: whether the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act applied to all the business of the employer, without reference to its connection with the particular extra-hazardous business.

The authority to elect given by the first section of the act extends to every employer in the State. This section refers to the person and not to the business, and the election by the employer subjects him to the act together with all his employees. The third section refers primarily to the business and not to the person of the employer. Its provisions expressly apply only to employers engaged in the specified extra-hazardous occupations, and provide that in any action to recover damages against such an employer it shall not be a defense that the employee assumed the risk or that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant or by the contributory negligence of the employee. These provisions cannot be extended to apply to causes of action not having any connection with the extra-hazardous occupations mentioned. If a man who was engaged in the business of a building contractor in Chicago and who had elected not to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of the act should also be conducting a dry-goods store in Rockford, and should be sued by a clerk in the store for an injury caused by the negligent arrangement of the stock of goods, the contributory negligence of the clerk, his assumption of the risk or the negligence of a fellow-servant causing the injury would constitute a defense, for this would not be an action against an employer engaged in a hazardous occupation. To give the act any other interpretation would be to render it unconstitutional. [483] The dry-goods merchant who, having no other business, had not elected to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of the act would not be deprived of these common-law defenses, and it would not be a reasonable classification to allow such defenses to one merchant and deny them to another, under precisely the same circumstances, because the latter was also engaged in an extra-hazardous occupation elsewhere. The reasonable interpretation of paragraph (b) of section 3 is, that the provisions of paragraph (a) shall only apply to an employer engaged in the extra-hazardous occupations mentioned, so far as such extra-hazardous occupations are concerned. The object of section 3 was the better protection of employees exposed to greater danger by reason of their employment in these extra-hazardous occupations, and it was not intended that employers engaged in such extra-hazardous occupations should for that reason be subject to any greater liability to their employees not engaged in such occupations than other employers under the same circumstances. The defendant in error was not an employer of the plaintiff in error in any of the extra-hazardous occupations mentioned in section 3, and plaintiff in error was not exposed to any of the dangers arising from such extra-hazardous occupations. Whether or not the defendant in error, as to any part of its business, was subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act, it was not subject to such provisions so far as the plaintiff in error was concerned.

The injury to the plaintiff in error was not within the jurisdiction of the Industrial Board, and the judgment of the circuit court setting aside the award was right and is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to review the recent cases passing on the right to and the effect of an election with respect to the acceptance of the provisions of a workmen's compensation act. The earlier decisions are collected in the note to Crooks v. Tazewell Coal Co. Ann. Cas. 1915C 304.

Right and Method of Election.

RIGHT TO ELECT.

Generally.

Because of the early controversy as to the constitutionality of such legislation, the workmen's compensation acts in most jurisdictions contain some provision rendering it optional with the persons affected to accept the compensation principle provided thereby.

All employers and employees are treated alike by the Illinois act so far as the right of election is concerned, and cities, incorporated villages, and other municipal corporations have the same right of election under the act as other employers. Marshall v. Pekin, 276 Ill. 187, 114 N. E. 497. So it has been held under that act, which provides that every employer included in the act "is presumed to have elected to provide and pay the compensation according to the provisions of this act, unless and until notice in writing of his election to the contrary is filed with the state bureau of labor statistics," and further that "when such election is made by the employer, the employee shall be deemed to have accepted all the provisions of said act and is bound thereby, unless within thirty days after his hiring and the taking effect of the act he shall file a notice to the contrary with the secretary of the state bureau of labor statistics," there is a presumption of law that both the employer and employee are covered by the provisions of the act unless it appears that one or both parties have filed an election to the contrary as provided by the act. Krisman v. Johnston City, etc. Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 612. And see Gibson v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 73, 114 N. E. 515. But the rejection of the act by an employer precludes his employees from accepting it. Favro v. Superior Coal Co. 188 Ill. App. 203. Receivers of a railroad properly appointed to "run and manage" the railroad have authority to elect not to provide and pay compensation according to the provisions of the act, and it is not necessary that they should obtain an order from the United States district court which appointed them receivers to authorize them to reject the provisions of the act, as authority to do so is included in the general management of the business. Devine v. Delano, 272 Ill. 166, Ann. Cas. 1918A 689, 111 N. E. 742.

The Washington act contains the following provision: "All phases of the premises are withdrawn from private controversy, and sure and certain relief for workmen, injured in extrahazardous work, and their families and dependents, is hereby provided regardless of questions of fault and to the exclusion of every other remedy, proceeding or compensation, except as otherwise provided in this act; and to that end all civil actions and civil causes of action for such personal injuries and all jurisdiction of the courts of the state over such causes are hereby abolished, except as in this act provided." That act has been held to be a provision for compulsory insurance for both the employer and the employee so that neither the master nor the servant has any right of election whether he will come under the act if they are engaged in the kind of work which falls under the provision, and neither can exempt himself from the burdens imposed or waive the benefits. Shaughnessy v. Northland Steamship Co. 94 Wash. 325, 162 Pac. 546.

In Montana the compensation act provides that no employer shall be bound by its provisions until he has made an election to that effect, and a public corporation such as a city is declared to be an employer within the meaning of the act. By a further provision it is declared that "where a public corporation is the employer, . . . the terms, conditions and provisions of compensation plan number three shall be exclusive, compulsory, and obligatory on both employer and employee." It has been held that although these provisions are inconsistent, public corporations must be deemed to be subject to the act without any election. Butte v. Industrial Acc. Board, 52 Mont. 75, 156 Pac. 130.

The Texas act provides that the employers' insurance association shall not issue policies unless fifty employers with not less than two thousand employees have subscribed to the plan. Another part of the act provides that any insurance company lawfully transacting liability and accident business shall have the same right as the association to insure the liability to pay compensation provided for, and that when such a company issues a policy the holder of it shall be regarded as a subscriber. It has been held that under this provision every employer has an election to come under the act though sufficient employers have not subscribed to authorize insurance by the association. Marshall Mill, etc. Co. v. Scharnberg (Tex.) 190 S. W. 229.

In Cox's Case, 225 Mass. 220, 114 N. E. 281, it was held that an employer could not elect as to a part only of his business. It appeared that a corporation was both a manufacturer and a retail dealer in shoes, and the question was whether in subscribing as an insurer under the workmen's compensation act the business of conducting a shoe store came within the act. In holding that the shoe store was included, the court said: "The workmen's compensation act does not permit an employer to become a subscriber as to one part of its business and to remain a nonsubscriber as to the rest of a business which is in substance and effect conducted as one business. It has been decided that insurance as to one class of employees of a farmer, engaged as drivers and helpers in the distribution and marketing of his produce, does not require insurance of farm laborers who are expressly exempted from the act.

. . . Such cases, if and when they arise, are to be considered on their own merits. We are dealing here with a case where an employer is conducting under a single general administration the business 'of manufacturing, jobbing at the factory and selling at retail in the factory and in stores.' The circumstances that at the retail stores are sold other shoes and rubbers besides those manufactured at the factory, does not render the retail stores a business separate from the general business which is carried on as a unit made up of numerous parts."

Infant Employee.

It has been held that the legislature has the power to remove the disability of infancy so as to permit an infant old enough to go to work under the labor statutes to make an election whether he will work under the Workmen's Compensation Law. Herkey v. Agar Mfg. Co. 90 Misc. 47, 153 N. Y. S. 369.

So where a statute makes it lawful to employ an infant over fourteen years of age, an infant so employed has a right to bind himself by an election to participate in the benefits of the act. Rhodes v. J. B. B.

Coal Co. (W. Va.) 90 S. E. 796. See to the same effect Adkins v. Hope Engineering, etc. Co. (W. Va.) 94 S. E. 506; Foth v. Macomber, etc. Rope Co. 161 Wis. 549, 154 N. W. 369.

In England, an election to accept compensation under the act, instead of damages, made on behalf of an infant, will be set aside if it is not for the infant's benefit. Ford v. Wren, 115 L. T. J. 357, 5 W. C. C. 48. And see Stephens v. Dudbride Ironworks Co. [1904] 2 K. B. 225, 73 L. J. K. B. 739, 68 J. P. 437, 52 W. R. 644, 90 L. T. N. S. 838, 20 Times L. Rep. 492, 6 W. C. C. 48. In M'Feetridge v. Stewarts [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 773, it appeared that a minor workman who was injured in the course of his employment, agreed without consulting his father to accept compensation under the act. The minor was domiciled in Ireland where the contract of a minor is a nullity; but according to the law of Scotland he has some capacity to contract. In an action for damages for the injuries sustained it was held that a plea by the defendant of "res judicata" could not be sustained and that the arbitrator's award should be set aside. In Burton v. Chapel Coal Co. [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 430, it was held that a minor workman who elects to make a claim for compensation under the act is barred by such election from suing for damages at common law where the arbitrator refuses the compensation on the ground that the miner has been guilty of serious and wilful misconduct.

It has been held that since it is not clear whether a minor may accept or reject the New Jersey act it is doubtful whether he may maintain an action at law; hence a complaint for personal injuries will not be stricken out on motion on the ground that the remedy is under the workmen's compensation act. Young v. Sterling Leather Works (N. J.) 96 Atl. 1016.

METHOD OF ELECTION.

Notice of Acceptance or Rejection.

In General.

Some workmen's compensation acts require a notice of election to come within the act, while others create a presumption of acceptance and require an affirmative notice of rejection. Under an act of the latter class, if the employee sues at common law he has the burden of showing that the employer has rejected the act by proving that the proper notice has been filed. Synkus v. Big Muddy Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 602. And see Krisman v. Johnston City, etc. Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 612.

In Kleet v. Southern Illinois Coal, etc. Co. 197 Ill. App. 243, wherein the plaintiff alleged that the defendant elected not to provide and pay compensation as provided by the act, it was held that it was competent to prove such election by a copy of the notice filed by the defendant with the industrial board as required by the statute.

A copy of the notice of election certified by the person charged with the custody of the original is admissible as the best evidence to prove that the employer has elected to reject the provisions of the workmen's compensation act. Synkus v. Big Muddy Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 602. See to the same effect Bateman v. Carterville, etc. Coal Co. 188 Ill. App. 357. But the original notice without proof of its being filed in accordance with the provision of the act is insufficient. Bateman v. Carterville, etc. Coal Co. 188 Ill. App. 357.

Where an employer files the proper notice rejecting the provision of the act, the notice will stand as a negative election until it is withdrawn; and the fact that the employer does not give a further notice sixty days previous to the first day of the year following, does not constitute an election by him to accept the provisions of the act. Bateman v. Carterville, etc. Coal Co. 188 Ill. App. 357; Synkus v. Big Muddy Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 602.

Under an act providing that every employer who elects to come under the act shall be bound until the beginning of the next succeeding year, and further providing that every employer is presumed to be bound unless notice in writing is filed to the contrary with the industrial board but setting no time for the filing of that notice, it has been held that those who have elected to be bound may withdraw from the act by filing notice sixty days before the expiration of a calendar year, and those employers who are presumed to be bound may file notice to the contrary some time subsequent to the adoption of the act. Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 11, 113 N. E. 173.

Under the Minnesota act an employer is released from liability for an injury to his employees if he posts notices about his place of employment and files a copy of such notices with the commissioner of labor stating that he is insured against liability and by whom he is insured. The statute does not say when the notice shall be filed. It has been held that a notice filed after an accident but three months before a proceeding was instituted to recover compensation was sufficient to bring the employer within the act. State v. District Ct. 133 Minn. 402, 158 N. W. 615.

Before an employer can bring himself within the act in Michigan the notice accepting its provisions must be approved by the accident board, and the election dates from that approval. Bernard v. United Traction Co. 188 Mich. 504, 154 N. W. 565;

Shevchenko v. Detroit United Ry. 189 Mich. 421, 155 N. W. 423; Bendykson v. Lyons Evangelistic Committee (Mich.) 161 N. W. 945.

The statute in Wisconsin allows thirty days to employees in which to elect whether they will come under its provision. Where a workman was injured on the day following the employer's election to come under the act, it was held not to apply to him since his contract of employment was made before the employer came under the act, and the thirty days within which he might elect had not expired when he was injured. Green v. Appleton Woolen Mills, 162 Wis. 145, 153 N. W. 958. Under the provision in that act that an employee becomes subject to the act when "such employee shall have given to his employer notice in writing that he elects to be subject to such provision, or without giving either of such notices, shall have remained in the service of such employer for thirty days after the employer has filed with said commission an election to be subject to the terms of the provision," it has been held that an employee who does not give notice that he elects to be subject to the act becomes subject thereto only when he has remained in the service thirty days after the employer has become subject thereto. Wiesedeppe v. Zweifel, 165 Wis. 84, 160 N. W. 1038. And see Lutz v. Wilmanns Bros. Co. (Wis.) 164 N. W. 1002. The Wisconsin Act of 1913 provided that every employer should be deemed to have elected to accept the law unless prior to September 1 of that year he had filed a notice of his election not to accept it. Under that provision it was held that a notice dated August 30, mailed on September 2, and received by the commission on September 3, was not effective, not having been filed "prior" to September 1. Great Northern R. Co. v. King, 165 Wis. 159, 161 N. W. 371. In that case it was further held that a notice which was not effective because not filed in time and which declared that the employer "elects not to accept the provisions of the law," could not be construed as a withdrawal under the provision allowing an employer to withdraw himself from the operation of the law at the end of the year.

Where the statute provides that its provisions shall not apply unless prior to the injury the employer and employee shall have elected by agreement to be bound by the act, and further that where there is no such express agreement, it shall be implied unless there be an express statement in the contract of hire, made not less than thirty days prior to the accident, that the provisions are not intended to apply, it has been held that a contract of employment which was made less than thirty days before the accident could not contain a notice of election and hence must be governed by the first provision, and excluded from the operation of the act. Woodruff v. Producers' Oil Co. (La.) 76 So. 803.

The statute in Missouri requires that all employers who shall elect to come within its provisions shall do so by filing a statement to that effect with the secretary of state. It has been held that the statement need not be in any precise or technical form, and need not be evidenced with the same formality as a deed or other instrument which transfers property. Piatt v. Swift, 188 Mo. App. 584, 176 S. W. 434. In that case it was also held that it was not necessary to show affirmatively that the officer who filed the statement of election was authorized by his employer to do so, particularly where notices of the election were posted in all parts of the employer's plant long before the injury, and the question of election was raised by attorneys who claimed to have a lien on the employee's cause of action.

In De Pasquale v. Mason Mfg. Co. (R. I.) 97 Atl. 816, it was held that a notice filed with the commissioner of industrial statistics by the treasurer of a corporation accepting the provision of the workmen's compensation act was ratified by the directors of the corporation through their acquiescence and a failure to repudiate the acceptance, although no formal resolution was recorded authorizing the treasurer to file the notice.

Notice to Employees.

By many of the workmen's compensation acts an employer electing to accept the provisions of the act is required to give notice to his employees of that fact, the posting of notices in the place of employment being the method usually prescribed.

In De Pasquale v. Mason Mfg. Co. (R. I.) 97 Atl. 816, it was held that a notice in the English language was as a matter of law sufficient.

Under the workmen's compensation act of Iowa employers are presumed to have elected to come under the act unless notice in writing to the contrary shall have been given by posting the notice conspicuously at the place where the business is carried on. It is also provided that where an employer has given notice of rejection of the act, that election shall continue in force until such employer shall elect to come under the act by giving notice in writing in the same manner as is required in electing to reject the act, which shall become effective when filed with the industrial commissioner. Under those provisions it has been held that a substantial compliance with the act was required of an employer who elected to accept the act after rejecting it; that the filing of the notice with the commissioner without posting the notice as required was insufficient although the notice of rejection previously posted was torn down; that the fact that an injured employee could not talk or read English so that a posted notice would have been unavailing to him, made no difference; and that the defect was not cured by the fact that there was a rumor among the employees that the employer had accepted the act. Pancker v. Enterprise Coal Min. Co. (Ia.) 184 N. W. 1035.

Under a provision in a statute that "each employer electing to pay the premiums provided by this act into the workmen's compensation fund shall post in conspicuous places about his place or places of business typewritten or printed notices stating the fact that he has made such election, and the same when so posted shall constitute sufficient notice to all his employees of the fact that he has made such election," it has been held that an employer must not only have paid the premiums provided thereby, but that the injured employee must have had actual notice that his employer had elected to pay the premiums; that an excuse by the employer that he had applied to the state authorities for such notices and had not received them at the time of the plaintiff's injuries was insufficient to relieve the defendant of the statutory requirement since the statute made no provision for the furnishing of the notices by the state. Daniels v. Charles Boldt Co. 78 W. Va. 124, 88 S. E. 613.

The Texas act provides that the employer in order to be relieved from the common-law liability must give written or printed notice to each employee entering his service that he is a subscriber to the act; but no method is prescribed as to how the notice is to be given. It has been held under that provision that the mere posting of a notice in the employer's place of business to the effect that the employer is a subscriber under the act is not as a matter of law notice to the employee but its sufficiency is a question of fact in any particular instance. Kampmann v. Cross (Tex.) 194 S. W. 437. An employer when sued for an injury must show that such notice as is required was given or that the employee waived the notice. Rice v. Garrett (Tex.) 194 S. W. 667. Proof that a defendant had notices posted around its plant, and that it carried insurance in accordance with the act, has been held not to be subject to the objection that it was an attempt to impress on the jury the fact that an insurance company and not the defendant would be called on to pay the damage assessed. Southwestern Portland Cement Co. v. Presbitero (Tex.) 190 S. W. 776.

In Shafer v. Parke, 192 Mich. 577, 159 N. W. 304, it appeared that a manufacturer of drugs maintained a farm chiefly for the preparation of serums. In accepting the compensation act it neither expressly included nor excluded any particular class of its employees, but posted notices of the acceptance of the act in its laboratories, offices, and places of business in the city of Detroit. No notice was placed on or in the vicinity of the farm. Under those facts it was held that the company did not intend to bring itself within the provisions of the act as to its farm laborers. The court said: "To assume that by such acceptance the employer intended to include a class of employees as to whom he still had the right to retain his common-law defenses would be going, we feel sure, beyond the fair meaning of the acceptance. The statute has made it practically compulsory that employers of laborers other than farm laborers and household domestic servants accept the provisions of the act, and such acceptance has usually in view only those employees as against whom the employers' common-law defenses have been taken away. And to hold that an employer by a general acceptance intends to elect to pay compensation under the act to his farm laborers and household domestic servants would be against the fact. To bring such employees within the acceptance must be held to require an express statement to that effect."

Where an act provides that any insurance company may issue policies relieving the employer from liability, besides the insurance association created by the act, and by another provision requires the employer to give notice that he has provided for the compensation for injuries with "the association," it has been held that the provision for notice applies to either class of insurance as the same reason exists for the notice in both cases. Rice v. Garrett (Tex.) 194 S. W. 667.

A provision in an act that an employee shall be held to have waived his right of action at common law if he shall not have given notice to his employer at the time of his contract of hire that he claimed such right, has been held not to depend on any other condition or circumstance; and hence that it is not necessary that he should have notice of the fact that the employer is a subscriber. Young v. Duncan, 218 Mass. 346, 106 N. E. 1. See to the same effect White v. George A. Fuller Co. 226 Mass. 1, 114 N. E. 829.

A notice of rejection of the compensation act printed on the pay envelope which reached the father of a minor employee has been held to be sufficient to satisfy the provision of the New Jersey act. Brost v. Whitall-Tatum Co. 89 N. J. L. 531, 99 Atl. 315, L.R.A.1917D 71. It has been held, however, that a notice electing not to come under the act by printing the same on a pay envelope was not sufficient to relieve an employer of a minor in the absence of proof that it came to the notice of the parent or guardian. Troth v. Millville Bottle Works, 89 N. J. L. 219, Ann. Cas. 1917C 1031, 98 Atl. 435, affirming 86 N. J. L. 558, 91 Atl. 1031.

It has been held that a failure on the part of the employer to give notice to an employee with whom he is about to enter into a contract of hire that he has provided for compensation by becoming a subscriber to the act, and to file a copy of the notice with the industrial board, does not carry with it any penalty either to him or the employee. Young v. Duncan, 218 Mass. 346, 106 N. E. 1.

Claim for Compensation.

Where a claimant is refused compensation under a workmen's compensation act because he is not a dependent of the deceased workman he is not thereby barred from suing the employer at common law. M'Donald v. Dunlop, Sc. Ct. Sess. 7 F. 533, wherein Lord Adam in his judgment said: "It is quite true that if the option is exercised by a person bringing an action of damages, and the person exercising that option fails in that action, then a claim under the workmen's compensation act must be disposed of by the court at the same time; and for this reason, as it appears to me, that the whole facts of the case are before the court upon which the judge can award compensation; but that is not so in the converse case, and therefore there is no similar provision in the act for dealing with that case. But I see nothing that is to prevent a claim for damages being made." In Beckley v. Scott [1902] 2 Ir. R. 504, a like holding was made where a workman proceeded to have compensation assessed under the act and was defeated by reason of a ruling that his case did not come within the provisions of the act.

It has been held that where a claim is made under the act but is withdrawn before there has been any decision on it, the claimant does not lose his right of action, since there has been no real exercise of the option. The purpose of the act is to prevent the master from being liable to pay twice so that when a claim is made which cannot be enforced because the case does not come within the act, the right of the workman to make any other claim is not lost. Rouse v. Dixon [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 628, 53 W. R. 237, 73 L. J. K. B. 662, 20 Times L. Rep. 553, 68 J. P. 407, 91 L. T. N. S. 436.

The presentation of a claim after beginning a suit at common law is not an election to take under the act and does not preclude the prosecution of the suit. Riche v. Garrett (Tex.) 194 S. W. 667.

Under a provision in the Ohio act that "every employee, who makes application for an award from the state liability board of awards, waives his right to exercise his option to institute proceedings in any court," it has been held that where an employee of an employer who has made payment into the state insurance fund, makes an application for payment out of such fund and this is done on a blank sent to him for that purpose which blank contains the words "First notice of injury and preliminary application," the employee in so acting chooses to accept compensation under the act and cannot thereafter maintain an action against his employer for compensation on account of the same injury. Zileh v. Bomgardner, 91 Ohio St. 205, 110 N. E. 459, affirming Bomgardner v. Zileh, 35 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 292.

Acceptance of Compensation.

The acceptance by an injured workman of compensation offered by the employer under a workmen's compensation act will ordinarily be construed as an election to take under the act.

Thus in Ryan v. MacLellan, Sc. Ct. Sess. 2 F. 387, 37 Scott L. Rep. 287, 7 Scott L. T. 313, it appeared that an injured workman received from his employers weekly payments for a period of six months and signed receipts for the payments some of which bore the words "in full satisfaction of amount due to me as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897." The others were on account of "compensation." These receipts were held to import an election to take under the provisions of the act, precluding an action at law for damages. So in Mehaffey v. Collen, 36 Ir. L. T. 216, wherein it appeared that an employee gave notice of his injury to his employers and received half wages for which he signed receipts, it was held that he could not subsequently bring an action independently of the act.

In Mackay v. Rosie [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 174, 45 Scott L. Rep. 178, 1 B. W. C. C. 52, it appeared that at the end of the week in which a workman was injured he was paid a sum in lieu of wages, and was told that for the next two weeks he would get nothing, but that after that he would be paid half wages. Subsequently, for a period of six months he received each week a sum amounting to slightly more than half his average weekly wage. No receipts were taken for these payments. It was held that he had elected to accept compensation under the act and was barred from maintaining an action for his injuries independently of the act.

An acceptance of compensation under a workmen's compensation act, and the execution of a release after the injury, has been held to be a bar to any action under the federal employer's liability act unless it was shown that the release was not fairly entered into by the parties. Mitchell v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 194 Ill. App. 77.

So it has been held that if an injured seaman subjects himself to the state tribunals and claims and receives the amount awarded under a workmen's compensation act, or if by agreement fairly entered into the amount to be paid under the act is fixed and the seaman accepts it with full knowledge of the extent of his injuries, he cannot later be permitted to maintain an action for the same injuries. Riegel v. Higgins, 241 Fed. 718, wherein it was, however, held that a seaman who was paid and who accepted the proper amount under the California act for the few weeks for which he was able to produce a physician's disability certificate, but who was paid nothing for the temporary partial disability following the period for which he was paid, did not by such acceptance make an election to take compensation under the act so as to preclude him from bringing an action for damages in admiralty.

But in Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Knapp, 233 Fed. 950, 147 C. C. A. 624, it was held that where a railroad company which was engaged in both intrastate and interstate commerce filed an election to come under the Michigan workmen's compensation act, in a case where the federal employer's liability act applied as an exclusive remedy, the fact that the employer paid the employee's hospital and doctor's bills during the first three weeks after the injury as required by the Michigan act, did not establish the employee's acceptance of the act, there having been no assent on his part that such payment was in compliance with the act. See also Waters v. Guile, 235 Fed. 552, 148 C. C. A. 298.

In Oliver v. Nautilus Steam Shipping Co. [1903] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 639, 5 W. C. C. 65, it appeared that an employee signed a receipt for the first four weeks' payment "on account of compensation which may be or become due to me under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of the accident which occurred to me on," etc. The employee was warned by a delegate of his trade union not to accept any future payments without a stipulation that he did so "without prejudice," to which condition the agent of the insurance company who tendered the next payment consented. The condition was not embodied in the receipt. Under the circumstances it was held that the employee had not exercised his option to accept compensation under the act. The court said: "My own view is that, by quietly accepting the reservation or qualification, 'without prejudice,' which he entered in his book and communicated to his principals, the insurance company, without having made any protest or objection to it to the plaintiff, the agent in fact agreed that the qualification was to override the whole of the receipts. Once you arrive at that conclusion, it seems to me there is an end of the defense set up by the third person here. It may be perfectly true to say that where there is a receipt which, without any qualification, acknowledges the payment of money under the workmen's compensation act, there has been a claim or a proceeding within the meaning of s. 6; but, in my judgment, that cannot properly be so where the receipt for the payment in question is not an unqualified receipt of the money, but a receipt given by a sick man who, at the moment of giving it, expressly states that it is given subject to the qualification of 'without prejudice.'"

In Puget Sound Traction, etc. Co. v. Schleif, 220 Fed. 48, 135 C. C. A. 616, two vouchers for a monthly indemnity received by the employee but which he did not execute and on which he received no payment were held not to show that he had made an election to take compensation under the workmen's compensation act.

Where it appeared that a workman who signed receipts, purporting to be payments for compensation, did not know the workmen's compensation act by name or of his rights apart from the act, being imperfectly acquainted with the English language, and the receipts were not read over or explained to him, it was held that there was no evidence to show that the workman had elected to take compensation under the act and hence that he was not barred from maintaining an action at common law. Valenti v. Dixon [1907] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 695. A like holding has been made where a workman at the time he signed the receipts did not know the difference between his rights at common law and his rights under the act. Fowler v. Hughes, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. (Eng.) 394, 40 Scot. L. Rep. 321, 10 Scot. L. T. 583. And where the payments were made under a reservation of any claim the employee might have against the defendant, and on the understanding that should he succeed in obtaining damages he should repay the compensation so received, it was held that the employee was not barred from recovering in an action for the injuries sustained. Kelly v. North British Co. [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 516, [1915] 2 Scot. L. T. 247.

In Huckle v. London County, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 113, affirming 3 B. W. C. C. 536, 26 Times L. Rep. 580, it appeared that an injured workman received several weekly payments from his employers giving them receipts therefor. He subsequently repaid to the employers the amount he received from them and sued the defendant for damages, and at the trial he stated that he did not understand the nature and the terms of the receipts he had signed. The case was dismissed by the county court, holding that the action was barred, because as a matter of law the employee has recovered compensation under the act. On appeal, however, it was held that it was a question for the jury whether the plaintiff understood the nature and effect of the receipts he had signed.

In Blain v. Greenock Foundry Co. Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 893, 40 Scot. L. Rep. 639, 11 Scot. L. T. 92, it was held that an award of compensation under the act to certain relatives of a deceased workman did not render an action at law incompetent at the instance of relatives who had no title to claim compensation under the act, so that a son who was only partially dependent on his father was not by reason of his unsuccessful claim to compensation barred from bringing an action for damages independently of the act against the employers.

Commencement of Action.

A suit at common law by an employee against his employer for personal injuries received in the course of his employment has been held to be an election on the part of the plaintiff not to be bound by the provisions of the workmen's compensation act. Riche v. Garrett (Tex.) 194 S. W. 667.

Under the California statute which makes it optional to the employee either to claim compensation under the act or to maintain an action at law for damages in cases where the injury is caused by the gross negligence or wilful neglect of the employer, the commencement of an action in the superior court has been held not to be a final election of the employee's remedy where the court sustained a demurrer to the allegations of the complaint. San Francisco Stevedoring Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 321, 149 Pac. 586.

The English Act of 1897 gave an option to a workman either to proceed under the act or to take such proceedings as were open to him before the act was passed and further provided that "where an action has been brought to recover damages for personal injuries no compensation can be awarded under the act in respect of the same injuries except in the single case where, upon failing in an action, the plaintiff may then and there apply to the judge who has tried the action to assess compensation under the act." Like provision is made in some Canadian acts. It has been held under these provisions that where a workman has chosen to bring an action and the action has failed, he cannot obtain compensation under the act, except under the express proviso quoted, and the judge in awarding compensation thereunder may deduct from it all the costs which have been caused by the bringing of the action. Edwards v. Godfrey [1899] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 333, 68 L. J. Q. B. 666, 80 L. T. N. S. 672, 15

L. T. 118; Quinn v. Brown, Sc. Ct. Sess. 8 F. 855. But no costs should be allowed for subsequent proceedings in the action. M'Kenna v. United Collieries, Sc. Ct. Sess. 8 F. 960. See to the same effect Skeggs v. Keen, 1 W. C. C. (Eng.) 35; Cohen v. Seabrook, 25 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 176; Ferguson v. Brick, 7 Alberta L. Rep. 337. An application to the court cannot be made where the claimant gives notice of the claim but takes no further proceeding under the act and thirteen months after the accident brings an action for damages which is decided against him. Cribb v. Kynoch [1908] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 551, 77 L. J. K. B. 1001, 99 L. T. N. S. 216, 24 Times L. Rep. 736, 52 Sol. J. 581.

It has been held that where a plaintiff succeeded at the trial but failed on an appeal, the appellate court could not assess the compensation or make any order directing an assessment, but the court intimated that no good reason appeared why an application might not be made to the trial court. McCormick v. Kelliher Lumber Co. 17 British Columbia 422.

If judgment is given against the plaintiff dismissing his action, and the plaintiff appeals and obtains a new trial, the action is not dismissed within the meaning of the act and the judge before whom the action is tried has no jurisdiction to proceed to assess compensation. So if the plaintiff whose action is dismissed applies to the judge to assess compensation, and the judge entertains the claim and makes an award in favor of the employer, and the plaintiff takes an appeal against such award, on obtaining an order for a new trial he is not debarred from proceeding with his action either by his application to the judge to assess compensation or by his appeal to the court of appeal, although the appeal has been stayed at his request and is pending at the time of his application for a new trial. Isaacson v. New Grand [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 539, 72 L. J. K. B. 227, 88 L. T. N. S. 201, 19 Times L. Rep. 150. Following the decision in the foregoing case it has been held that in a case where an action existed at common law and the trial judge merely decided that the employee was entitled to compensation without fixing the same, there was no election by the plaintiff to accept compensation under the act. Klukas v. Thompson, 31 West. L. Rep. (Alberta) 438, 8 West W. Rep. 778, 24 Dominion L. Rep. 67.

In Berge v. Mackenzie, 24 Dominion L. Rep. (Canada) 575, it was held that where an employee exercised his option to proceed independently of the act and a recovery by the plaintiff was reversed on appeal with a direction to fix the compensation payable to the plaintiff under the act, if the plaintiff's action was not commenced within the statutory period his right to compensation was barred. See to the same effect Durkin v. Distillers Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 128. And where the application is made after the dismissal of an action, and the judge accordingly awards such compensation, the plaintiff is estopped by the election to take such compensation and the award thereupon made, from proceeding further with the action, and hence a subsequent application by him for judgment or a new trial in the action will not be entertained. Neale v. Electric, etc. Accessories Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 558, 75 L. J. K. B. 974, 95 L. T. N. S. 592, 22 Times L. Rep. 732.

It has been held that where the application for the assessment is made as soon as it is practically possible under the circumstances, there is a substantial compliance with the provision that it shall be made immediately. Western Trust Co. v. Regina, 9 Sask. L. Rep. 336, 30 Dominion L. Rep. 548. Where an action for damages was dismissed on February 5 and an application was made to assess damages on February 10, it was held that the application was not made in time as required by the act. McGowan v. Smith [1907] Sc. Ct. Sess. 548, following Stewart v. Higginbotham, Sc. Ct. Sess. 3 F. 673, 38 Scot. L. Rep. 479, wherein an application for compensation after the action had failed, was refused, the action having been dismissed on November 29, 1900, and the application for assessment having been made on February 14, 1901.

Where the plaintiff fails in his common-law action the court has power in its discretion to deal with the costs of the action or of the proceedings under the act. Wilson v. Kelly, 14 British Columbia 436.

Where the plaintiff in an action for damages alleged that the accident happened in the course of his employment and through the inexcusable fault of the defendant, praying that the latter should be ordered to pay him an annual rent under the act of Canada or in default of its applicability to pay him the sum of $10,000, it was held that he must on a dilatory motion choose between the two rights of action set forth in the complaint. Lesage v. Henderson, 15 Quebec Pr. 328. But it was held in Wentzell v. New Brunswick, etc. R. Co. 43 N. Bruns. 475, that an action for the death of the plaintiff's relative could proceed under both the compensation act and under Lord Campbell's act, and the damages could be assessed under either act as the evidence might warrant. The court said: "Referring to the claim that the plaintiff should elect whether she would proceed under chapter 79 of the Consolidated Statutes, 1903, or under the workmen's compensation act, in my opinion the action can be brought under both acts, and the damages assessed under either act as the evidence may warrant. The practical difference between the two acts is that under chapter 79 of the Consolidated Statutes, 1903, the defendant company would not be liable if the accident was caused through the negligence of a fellow servant. Under the workmen's compensation act the defendant company would be liable although the accident was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, and there is some difference in the assessment of damages, but that does not arise in the present case." See to the same effect Paskroan v. Toronto Power Co. 25 Ont. W. Rep. 779.

Agreement or Private Scheme for Compensation.

In Lemieux's Case, 223 Mass. 346, 111 N. E. 782, it was held that an agreement between an insurer and an employee for specific additional compensation for twenty-five weeks for the loss of three fingers of the right hand which agreement did not state that it was intended to cover all claims for additional compensation under the act, did not bar an award by the board of specific compensation for an injury to the hand rendering it permanently incapable of use.

Where an injured workman agreed with his employer to accept the full compensation due him under the act as long as he was totally disabled by the accident and further agreed to submit to the medical referee of the district in case a dispute arose as to his fitness for employment, his rights to compensation to cease if he refused to assist in the application for such examination by the medical referee, it was held that the penal clause at the end of the contract was a contracting out of the act contrary to its provisions and was invalid. British, etc. Steam Nav. Co. v. Neil, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 413.

It has been held that an agreement for compensation on the understanding that if the employee's hand got worse so that its usefulness was lost, the accident board would see that he received additional compensation, was properly set aside by the board since the act did not contemplate a settlement on a contingency or a condition that might render it inoperative. Carpenter v. Detroit Forging Co. 191 Mich. 45, 157 N. W. 374.

A refusal to accept an offer of his employer to pay under the compensation act at the rate of one-half of the average earnings until an employee was able to return to work has been held not to be a bar to a proceeding under the act if at the time the offer was made there was a dispute between the parties as to whether the disability of the employee was permanent or only temporary, under an express provision in the act that the employee's right to compensation might in default of agreement or arbitration be enforced by an action in any court of competent jurisdiction. Sillix v. Armour, 99 Kan. 103, 160 Pac. 1021, rehearing 99 Kan. 426, 162 Pac. 278.

An agreement for compensation between the parties may be reviewed by the board and the compensation ended, diminished or decreased according to the law and the facts. On this review the essentials leading up to the award are res judicata, except the physical condition of the injured employee. Winn v. Adjustable Table Co. 193 Mich. 127, 159 N. W. 372, 163 N. W. 906.

In the English act it is provided that an employee may contract with his employer to be bound by and accept compensation under a private scheme of compensation if such scheme has been properly certified by the registrar of friendly societies, and when so certified the scheme is substituted for the act and the employer is to be liable only in accordance with the scheme. Under that provision it has been held that a workman who has joined a scheme duly certified by the registrar, has exercised his option given to him by the workman's compensation act and his personal representatives cannot bring an action under the Employer's Liability Act of 1880. Taylor v. Hamstead Colliery Co. [1904] 1 K. B. 838, 73 L. J. K. B. 469, 68 J. P. 300, 52 W. R. 417, 90 L. T. N. S. 363, 20 Times L. Rep. 338. See to the same effect Horn v. Lords Com'rs of Admiralty [1911] 1 K. B. 24, 4 B. W. C. C. 1; Godwin v. Lords Com'rs of Admiralty [1913] A. C. 638, 6 B. W. C. C. 788, dismissing appeal [1912] 2 K. B. 26, 5 B. W. C. C. 229; Howaith v. Knowles [1913] 3 K. B. 675.

Where the scheme provides that the decision of the committee shall be final and conclusive, the widow of a workman who was a party to the scheme is bound by the decision of the committee, and having failed to obtain an allowance of her claim by the committee she may not bring an action to recover damages for the death of her husband. Allen v. Great Eastern R. Co. [1914] 2 K. B. 243.

The provisions of the scheme are to be read with those of the act and construed together. Thus, a workman who is a member of the scheme is entitled to compensation when he contracts an industrial disease, as the word "accident" which includes such disease under the act also includes such disease under the scheme. Leaf v. Furze [1914] 3 K. B. 1068.

It has been held that a scheme of compensation properly certified under the Act of 1897 must be recertified under the Act of 1906 or it cannot be applied to an accident happening after the taking effect of the latter act, although within the six months at the end of which the scheme is declared to be revoked by the latter act. Moss v. Great Eastern R. Co. [1909] 2 K. B. 274, 2 B. W. C. C. 168. See to the same effect Wallace v. Hawthorne, 1 B. W. C. C. 249.

In Wilson v. Ocean Coal Co. 7 W. C. C. 34, 21 Times L. Rep. 631, it appeared that a workman was a member of a scheme of compensation which had expired. When a renewal scheme was certified the employer posted notices that his workmen might enroll under the scheme. The employee did not enroll under the new scheme. The employer deducted a certain amount from the employee's wages as his contribution under the renewal scheme on the ground that this scheme was binding on the employee unless he gave notice that he would not come under it. It was held, however, that the original scheme having expired the workman was not bound by the renewal scheme unless he agreed to accept it.

Such a scheme is not bad because it purports to oust the jurisdiction of the arbitrator under the act; and on a recertification under the new act it is not necessary that a ballot of the workmen shall be taken before the registrar can certify it. Godwin v. Lords Com'rs of Admiralty [1913] A. C. 638, 6 B. W. C. C. 788, affirming decision of [1912] 2 K. B. 26, 5 B. W. C. C. 229.

A contract to accept a scheme need not be in writing, since it is a question of fact in each case for the judge to decide whether a workman has so contracted. Berry v. Canteen, etc. Co-operative Soc. 3 B. W. C. C. 449.

Effect of Election.

ON REMEDIES OF EMPLOYEE.

It is uniformly provided by the elective workmen's compensation acts that with respect to employees coming within their terms the compensation thereby allowed shall be exclusive of all other remedies against the employer.

Thus the Wisconsin act provides compensation in lieu of any other liability of the employer for any personal injury sustained by his employee where the latter is performing services growing out of his employment, and where the injury is proximately caused by the accident and is not intentionally self-inflicted. Under that provision it has been held that where the right to compensation under the act exists, it is the exclusive remedy against the employer. Milwaukee v. Althoff, 156 Wis. 68, 145 N. W. 238, L.R.A.1916A 327; Smale v. Wrought Washer Mfg. Co. 169 Wis. 331, 151 N. W. 803; Vennen v. New Dells

Lumber Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 293.

Where an employee takes advantage of the benefits of the act and accepts compensation, he cannot subsequently in an action for the injuries sustained claim that he is ignorant of the act, the act having been in force nearly sixty days before the accident. Barry v. Bay State St. R. Co. 222 Mass. 366, 110 N. E. 1031.

An injured workman who, with the advice of counsel and knowing fully that the employer has taken no insurance under the act, files a claim for compensation, cannot subsequently withdraw the claim for the purpose of suing at law for his injuries. Pavia v. Petroleum Iron Works Co. 164 N. Y. S. 790, wherein the court said: "With full knowledge of the situation, therefore, before an award was made, and with competent counsel to guide and advise him, the claimant permitted an award to be made in his favor, and thereby most effectually confirmed his election to accept such remedy as was afforded him by the Workmen's Compensation Law. There is no pretense that he did not fully understand his rights before the award was made. A party cannot experiment with the commission for the purpose of ascertaining how much compensation may be awarded him, and then, if dissatisfied, repudiate the award and seek the other remedy permitted by the statute. His election once made, intelligently and with knowledge of the facts, should be conclusive."

In an action for an injury to an employee where the evidence is conclusive that the case is within the workmen's compensation act the court may properly so charge the jury. Wheeler v. Contoocook Mills Corp. 77 N. H. 551, 94 Atl. 265. And when an employee has once accepted the provisions of the act he is bound by its terms unless he can bring himself within the provisions that except him from the operation of the act. Burnes v. Swift, 186 Ill. App. 460. See to the same effect Jenkins v. Carman Mfg. Co. 79 Ore. 448, 155 Pac. 703.

The English Act of 1906 provides as follows: "If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this act. (2.) Provided that . . . (b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or take proceedings independently of this act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid." Under those provisions it has been held that where a workman has been injured by an accident under circumstances which would give him, or in case of his death his dependents, a claim for compensation under the act and also for negligence independently of the act, the workman or his dependents can pursue either remedy but not both remedies. The claimant has an option as to which he will choose, and having elected either alternative, he is bound by his election. Codling v. Mowlem [1914] 2 K. B. 61, 83 L. J. K. B. 445, 108 L. T. N. S. 1033, 29 Times L. Rep. 619, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 1, affirmed by court of appeals in [1914] 3 K. B. 1055, 111 L. T. N. S. 1086.

The "option" given by the foregoing act is not an option binding only in the case of success, and when a decision is given either way the workman must be considered as having made his election which is final and conclusive. Cribb v. Kynock [1908] 2 K. B. 551, 77 L. J. K. B. 1001, 99 L. T. N. S. 216, 24 Times L. Rep. 736, 52 Sol. J. 581.

It has been held under the act in New York which provides for the release of employers from liability on securing compensation through the state fund that an employee after receiving compensation from the employer under the act cannot sue for further compensation for pain and suffering or disfigurement. Connors v. Semet-Solway Co. 94 Misc. 405, 159 N. Y. S. 431, wherein the court said: "In view of these sections of the statute it seems to me that the legislature plainly intended to take advantage of the amendment to the constitution and to provide a remedy for the benefit of injured employees exclusive of all other rights and remedies. The wrong which it sought to obviate was the constant litigation between master and servant with the uncertainty of its results. The act was designed to allay class feeling, to protect the master against annoyance and unjust verdicts, to see that the employee injured by the hazards of the business, and those dependent upon him, should not, as so often happened, bear the whole loss. Both gave up something. The master was no longer free if the servant failed to prove that the accident happened because of his negligence or negligence attributable to him. The right of the servant, on the other hand, to recover was limited and defined. The whole object and purpose of the legislature would be overthrown if the servant might, after obtaining compensation from his master, as provided by the statute, then sue in the courts for further compensation because of disfigurement or pain and suffering."

Contracts by which the parties undertake to deprive themselves in toto of the right to resort to the courts to settle controversies between them, in which are stipulated away all the rights of each or either to resort to the tribunals created by law, have been condemned. See 6 R. C. L. tit. Contracts, p. 752. But it does not follow that an acceptance of the workman's compensation act which is a contract to abide by the provisions of the act is objectionable. The acceptance of the statute operates, in a sense, to take from the courts so much of the controversy as is determined by the applying of the statute schedules, through the agency of the statute arbitrators. So where the act is accepted there is a contract which takes some powers from the court but is not an agreement to oust them of all jurisdiction. Hence, where the act is rejected by the parties the courts are in no sense ousted of jurisdiction as the full dispute between the parties is still submitted by ordinary proceedings and tried in the usual way, although some rules of procedure are changed. Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Ia. 245, Ann. Cas. 1917E 803, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145, L.R.A.1917D 15.

It has been held that when both employer and employee have elected to operate and work under a workmen's compensation act, the act becomes a part of the contract of employment and can be enforced as between the parties as such and each party is bound to perform whatever is required by the contract. A failure on the part of either to do the things required of him by the statute constitutes a breach of contract. Reese v. Bartlett, 197 Ill. App. 272.

Where both employer and employee have accepted a workmen's compensation act, an employee who sustains injuries in the course of his employment may maintain an action for breach of contract and need not resort to an action of mandamus to compel the employer to name an arbitrator, if the employer after being requested to do so does not comply with the request. The plaintiff is entitled to the speedy relief afforded by an action of assumpsit if the employer refuses to submit the dispute to arbitrators as required. Reese v. Bartlett, 197 Ill. App. 272; Rushing v. Bartlett, 197 Ill. App. 278.

An express or implied acceptance of the provisions of a workmen's compensation act, as permitted by its provisions, makes the provisions a part of the contract of employment. The consideration on the part of the employer is to pay the compensation for an injury as provided by the act and that of the employee is to accept such compensation in full for all rights and claims arising out of the injuries sustained in the course of his employment. Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 372, L.R.A.1916A 436.

It has also been held that a workmen's compensation act fixes the scope of the insurance so far as the rights of the employee are affected. If the employer becomes a subscriber the rights of the employee cannot be narrowed by a contract between the parties as the terms might be so narrow as not to bring the employer within the act. Cox's Case, 225 Mass. 220, 114 N. E. 281.

An attempt by the plaintiff to settle by agreement or arbitration is not necessary to maintain an action under a provision that "a workman's right to compensation under this act may, in default of agreement or arbitration, be determined and enforced by action in any court of competent jurisdiction." The words "in default of agreement or arbitration" mean practically the same as the words "in the absence or omission of an agreement or arbitration." Halverhout v. Southwestern Milling Co. 97 Kan. 484, 155 Pac. 916.

Under a provision in a workmen's compensation act that it shall be optional with the employee to settle for such compensation or to retain the right to sue the employer, it has been held that the theory on which the compensation law is to operate is that of contract and the employee's personal consent. So that where a workman has not elected to settle for the compensation provided by the act, his personal representative cannot maintain an action under the act, but is relegated to an action for damages sustained by his estate by reason of his death. Behringer v. Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. 17 Ariz. 232, 149 Pac. 1065, wherein the court said: "The remedy under the constitutional provision for compensation is restricted, as we see it, to the workman, and the legislative power under the mandate is limited to legislation for its efficient enforcement by him, or his personal representative, in case he dies after electing to accept compensation. Unless there was an election of this remedy in his lifetime by the deceased, the personal representative cannot maintain the action for compensation: it being a condition of the right to maintain such a suit against the employer that the employee should himself elect that remedy. The employer is entitled to insist, after an election by the employee, upon settlement for compensation, but, when the workman dies without making such election, his rights thereunder die with him. His personal representative is then relegated to an action for damages sustained by his estate by reason of his death under the so-called Lord Campbell's Act (title 23, supra), or an action under the Employers' Liability Act (chapter 6, tit. 14. Civil Code), according as his facts fall within the one or the other."

A provision in the Oklahoma act for compensation to employees for injuries received in the course of employment and abrogating the right of action for personal injuries not resulting in death arising and occurring in "hazardous" employments as defined by the act has been held not to cover wilful injuries caused by the employer, but leaves the injured employee to his remedy as it existed when the act was passed. Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. (Okla.) 162 Pac. 938, wherein the court said: "A wilful or intentional injury, whether inflicted by the employer or employee, could not be considered as accidental, and therefore is not covered by the act. If it were merely intended to cover accidental injuries for which the employee had no right of action, no reason is perceived why the legislature would abolish the defenses of contributory negligence, negligence of a fellow servant, or assumption of risk, or why it should abrogate the employee's right of action for damages for injuries not resulting in death occurring in said hazardous occupation. The compensation afforded by the act and the procedure by which the same is determined was intended to be exclusive as to all of the injuries therein embraced, and the right of action theretofore possessed by the injured employee was abolished, leaving to him such right of action in the courts for wilful injuries as he may have had prior to its passage, and the act, as thus construed, does not deprive plaintiff of the equal protection of the laws."

Under a provision in a workmen's compensation act to the effect that the failure to secure the payment of compensation shall authorize the injured employee or his dependents to maintain an action for damages as prescribed by another section of the act, which provides that an injured employee or his legal representatives, in case death results from the injury, may at his option elect to claim compensation or maintain an action in the courts for damages, it has been held that by "legal representatives" is meant the dependents and not the executor or administrator since the legal representatives could have no interest in the award except to represent the estate and among other things to pay debts to creditors; but the object of the act is to provide a speedy mode of relief for the workman and his dependents. Dearborn v. Peugeot Auto Import Co. 170 App. Div. 93, 155 N. Y. S. 789.

Where a workmen's compensation act provides that every contract of hiring shall be presumed to have been made under the act and shall be governed thereby unless otherwise provided in the contract, or a notice to that effect shall have been given by one party to the other, and further that the provision for compensation thereunder shall not apply to alien dependents not residents of the United States, it has been held that on the death of an employee where nothing has been done to prevent the application of the statute, the administrator cannot maintain an action against the employer under any other law and where the dependents are nonresident aliens they cannot recover under the act, that right being purely statutory. DeBiasi v. Normandy Water Co. 228 Fed. 234 (construing New Jersey act).

Where a workman at the time of his death was engaged in a class of work to which the act applied and which provided for compensation to a widow or certain next of kin, it was held that brothers and sisters of the deceased who were not entitled to compensation under the act had no right of action under the code for the death of their brother. Shanahan v. Monarch Engineering Co. 219 N. Y. 469, 114 N. E. 795, reversing order 172 App. Div. 221, 159 N. Y. S. 257. Following the decision in the foregoing case it was held in Maloney v. Levy, etc. Co. 176 App. Div. 470, 163 N. Y. S. 505, that if the injury causing the employee's death and the employment in which the servant was engaged were covered by the act the surviving widow had no right of action or other remedy, but must resort to compensation under the act.

However, it has been held that where the statute provides for compensation to certain relatives and total dependents but makes no provision for partial dependents, one who does not come within that provision but who was entitled to compensation before the act was passed is not barred from recovering at common law. Lamontagne v. Quebec R. etc. Co. 50 Can. Sup. Ct. 423.

ON LIABILITY OF EMPLOYER.

In General.

As an inducement to employers to accept the provisions of a workmen's compensation act it is usually provided that those who refuse to accept it cannot interpose the common-law defenses of contributory negligence, assumption of risk and the negligence of a fellow servant in actions for personal injuries.

Wisconsin.—Cavanaugh v. Morton Salt Co. 152 Wis. 375, 140 N. W. 53.

The court in Hagenback v. Leppert (Ind.) 117 N. E. 531, said: "The language of the foregoing sections is clear and definite. The acceptance of the act is not compulsory, but voluntary. There is nothing in the record to indicate or even suggest that either party gave notice of exemption as provided in section 3; and it is therefore conclusively presumed that they accepted the provisions of the act. Having elected to accept the act, every provision thereof became a part of the contract of service. By the terms of the statute the element of tort is eliminated; all remedies at common law or otherwise are excluded, and the employee's right to compensation arises out of the contract. This right, being contractual, accompanies the employee wherever he goes and abides with him until the contract of service is terminated."

The West Virginia statute provides that an employer subject thereto who does not elect to pay into the fund the premiums provided, or having so elected shall be in default of payment, is liable to his employees for the damages suffered by reason of personal injuries sustained in the course of their employment, and the employer is not permitted to avail himself of the common-law defenses. De Francesco v. Piney Min. Co. 76 W. Va. 756, 86 S. E. 777.

Particular Defenses.

The abolition of the doctrine of assumption of risk as to employers who do not elect to come under the compensation act does not impose liability without negligence on the part of the employer. It merely forbids the application of a principle of waiver based on the servant's continuance in the service with knowledge of an act of negligence rendering his service dangerous. So, although the statute abolishes the common-law defense of assumption of risk, the servant assumes the risks incident to his employment other than those occasioned by the master's negligence. Louis v. Smith-McCormick Constr. Co. (W. Va.) 92 S. E. 249. See to the same effect Spevak v. Independent Sash Co. 173 Cal. 438, 160 Pac. 565; Stornelli v. Duluth, etc. R. Co. 193 Mich. 674, 160 N. W. 415; Lindebauer v. Weiner, 94 Misc. 612, 159 N. Y. S. 987. So it has been held that there must be some duty to perform before there can be negligence. A workmen's compensation act does not enlarge the duty of an employer who is not a subscriber or transform into negligence conduct which, apart from the statute, would impose no liability on him. Mammott v. Worcester Consol. St. R. Co. 228 Mass. 282, 117 N. E. 336.

A provision in a workmen's compensation act abrogating the common-law defenses of contributory negligence and the fellow-servant rule does not enlarge the basis of recovery on the grounds of negligence beyond that which existed at common law and the employer is required to exercise only ordinary care under all the circumstances of the case. Gerthung v. Stambaugh-Thompson Co. 34 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 385.

In Iowa an employer who rejects the workmen's compensation act is presumed to be guilty of negligence in case of an injury to an employee in the course of employment; and the burden of proof to overcome the presumption is on the employer. Mitchell v. Phillips Min. Co. (Ia.) 165 N. W. 108, wherein the court said: "The legislature, in passing the Iowa law, did not make it compulsory, but rather an elective plan. Before the passage of the law, an injured workman had the burden of proving negligence. In many instances this was difficult or impossible. Ordinarily, the facts and conditions were within the knowledge of the employer, unless it was in the employee's working place. Under the act, the employer was given the right to elect whether he would reject the compensatory features of the law, and in that case he was deprived of the benefit of certain common-law defenses." See to the same effect Mitchell v. Des Moines Coal Co. (Ia.) 165 N. W. 113.

The Wisconsin act as enacted in 1911 abolished the defense of assumption of risk and also that of the negligence of a fellow servant causing the injury, but the defense of contributory negligence was left open to employers. The defense of contributory negligence was abolished by the legislature at the next session by an express enactment that it should not be a defense in an action within the scope of the statute "that the injury or death was caused in whole or in part by the want of ordinary care of the injured employee where such want of ordinary care was not wilful." It has been held, however, that the amendment did not benefit an employee who brought his action under the original provision. Besnys v. Herman Zohrlaut Leather Co. 157 Wis. 203, 147 N. W. 37.

In Watts v. Ohio Val. R. Co. 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659, it was held that if there was evidence that a fellow servant was negligent the employer was liable although there was no proof that he himself was negligent or that he omitted to perform any duty he owed the plaintiff and although there was proof of the plaintiff's negligence, since under the West Virginia act the defense of contributory negligence was abolished.

Assumption of risk has been abolished as a defense by the Massachusetts workmen's compensation act for such employers as are not subscribers and are not excepted from its operation. Bernabeo v. Kaulback, 226 Mass. 128, 115 N. E. 279. It has been held, however, that although an employer who is not a subscriber to the act cannot avail himself of any common-law defense, if the evidence shows that the employee assumed the risk attached to the employment, by virtue of his contract of hiring, the removal of such defenses under the act has no application. Ashton v. Boston R. Co. 222 Mass. 65, 109 N. E. 820, L.R.A.1916B 281. See also Walsh v. Turner Centre Dairying Assoc. 223 Mass. 386, 111 N. E. 889. It has also been held that a voluntary assumption of risk as distinguished from a contractual assumption of risk was a matter of defense where the master was negligent in respect to some matter outside of the risk assumed under the servant's contract of hiring; that in such a case the conduct of the servant in assuming the risk was a voluntary assumption and he could not recover for the injuries received. Ashton v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 222 Mass. 65, 109 N. E. 820, L.R.A.1916B 281. In an action for the death of a freight conductor it has been held that the defense of a contractual assumption of risk could not be relied on if the contract of hire did not refer to the particular defects in the employer's works or machinery, where the employer was not a subscriber to the act which makes the defense of contributory negligence unavailable to employers who do not subscribe. Boston, etc. R. Co. v. Baker, 236 Fed. 896, 150 C. C. A. 158 (construing Massachusetts Act.)

Under a provision in the Michigan act that an employer electing not to be governed by it cannot defend on the ground of assumption of risk arising from the failure of the employer to provide and maintain safe premises and suitable appliances, an employer cannot defeat an action for the wrongful death of the employee on the ground that the employee, who was injured by the defendant's mule, knew that the mule which kicked him was vicious. Robbins v. Magoon, etc. Co. 193 Mich. 200, 159 N. W. 323, wherein the court said: "But to hold that conduct which is not negligent because the employee assumes or consents, impliedly or actually, to share a risk, is not negligent in view of the statute is to allow a defense which the statute refuses. The employer may not now safely invite the employee to share with him 'the risks . . . arising from the failure of the employer to provide and maintain safe premises and suitable appliances.' It is said the cause of death is purely conjectural. There was, however, testimony supporting the conclusion that the cause of death was that alleged, namely, a kick by a vicious mule."

Rule in Illinois.

In Illinois no penalty for a failure to accept the workmen's compensation act is imposed on employers other than those engaged in an extrahazardous business. An employer so engaged who elects not to accept the act may not in an action for personal injuries avail himself of the defenses of contributory negligence or assumption of risk or of the fellow-servant doctrine, except that these may be shown to reduce the damages. Devine v. Delano, 272 Ill. 166, 111 N. E. 742; Bell v. Toluca Coal Co. 272 Ill. 576, 112 N. E. 311; Von Boeckmann v. Corn Products Refining Co. 274 Ill. 605, 113 N. E. 902; Price v. Clover Leaf Coal Min. Co. 188 Ill. App. 27; Favro v. Superior Coal Co. 188 Ill. App. 203; French v. Cloverleaf Coal Min. Co. 190 Ill. App. 400; Synkus v. Big Muddy Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 602; Erickson v. American Well Works, 196 Ill. App. 346; Kleet v. Southern Illinois Coal, etc. Co. 197 Ill. App. 243; Bednar v. Mt. Olive, etc. Coal Co. 197 Ill. App. 251. And see the reported case.

It has been held that an employer who has elected to reject the provisions of the act is deprived of his common-law defenses although the employee has not elected to come under the act. Synkus v. Big Muddy Coal, etc. Co. 190 Ill. App. 602. An employer who is engaged in an extrahazardous occupation and who has made no election to come under the workmen's compensation act cannot be subjected to the forfeiture of defenses imposed by the act as to an employee injured in an occupation not deemed extrahazardous under the act simply because such employer is also engaged in an extrahazardous employment in which the employee is not engaged. Marshall v. Pekin, 276 Ill. 187, 114 N. E. 497.

An agreement between employer and employee that the latter shall assume all risk attached to an employment of an extrahazardous nature relieving the employer from liability, has been held to be against public policy. Chicago Rys. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 534, wherein the court said: "The workmen's compensation act is the declared public policy of the state upon the subject embraced in the statute, and provides a method by which employers may exempt themselves from providing and paying compensation under the act to employees for accidental injuries sustained and arising out of and in the course of the employment. It is contrary to the policy of the act to allow an employer, while choosing to come under the provisions of the statute by not filing an election in writing to the contrary, to relieve itself from liability under the act by private agreement or contract with the employee."

One of the hazardous occupations brought under the Illinois act in the absence of an election is "carriage by land or water and loading and unloading in connection therewith." It has been held that street railways are included in that provision and the words "loading and unloading" in common use and understanding apply as well to passengers as to freight and to street railways as well as to steam railways; so that persons engaged in such employment are within the provisions of the act. Chicago Rys. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 534.

The provision in the statute making the "business or enterprise of carriage by land" a hazardous employment has been held to include an employer engaged in hauling crushed stone for paving, which is to be done by another, since hauling is not a mere incident to the business but is the enterprise itself in which the employer is engaged. Parker-Washington Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 498, 113 N. E. 976.

OCEAN ACCIDENT AND GUARANTEE CORPORATION, LIMITED, ET AL.

Maryland Court of Appeals—June 26, 1917.

180 Md. 572; 101 Atl. 529.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Termination of Allowance — Marriage of Beneficiary.

Under Workmen's Compensation Law (Acts 1914, c. 800), § 35, fixing compensation for partly dependent persons, and providing for determination of questions of dependency according to the facts existing at the time of the injury resulting in death to the employee, section 42, providing that on marriage of a dependent widow her compensation shall cease, and section 53, giving the commission power to change or modify former findings or orders, the subsequent marriage of a partly dependent sister of a deceased employee does not determine her right to compensation awarded her by the commission and authorize the commission to abate it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington county: KEEDY, Judge.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Mary Brenner Adleman, claimant, and Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, et al., defendants. Claim allowed by State Industrial Accident Commission. Decision reversed by Circuit Court. Claimant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Frank G. Wagaman for appellant.

Frank Gosnell and Alexander Armstrong, Jr., for appellees.

[573] THOMAS, J.—On the 5th of December 1914, Morris Brenner, an employee of the Reliable Junk Company, of Hagerstown, Maryland, died as the result of an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment by said company. His mother, Toba Brenner, and his sister, Mary Brenner, filed a claim for compensation as dependents under the Act of 1914, Chapter 800, known as the Workmen's Compensation Law, and the State Industrial Accident Commission, on April 7th, 1915, passed an order awarding them as partly dependent upon the deceased, the sum of $12.50 per week, which the Commission apportioned between the claimants, giving each of them $6.25 per week, payable weekly, for the period of four years and thirty-two weeks from the 5th day of December, 1914.

On the 10th of June, 1916, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, the insurer in the case, filed a [574] petition alleging that Mary Brenner was married to Nathan Adleman on the 19th of June, 1915, and that she had concealed her marriage from the petitioner until the 1st day of June, 1916, and praying that the compensation awarded her be abated by the Commission as of the 10th of June, 1915. After a hearing, at which the facts stated in the petition, except the alleged concealment of the marriage, were admitted, the Commission passed an order denying the relief prayed and dismissing the petition. From that order the petitioner appealed to the Circuit Court for Washington County, and that Court on the 10th of January, 1917, passed an order reversing the order of the Commission and abating the compensation awarded Mary Brenner as of the 19th day of June, 1915.

This appeal is from the order of the Circuit Court, and the single question involved is whether the subsequent marriage of a partly dependent sister of a deceased employee determines her right to compensation awarded her by the Commission and authorizes the Commission to abate it. The answer to this question must, of course, be found in the provisions of the Act under which the award was made. The Commission took the view that if it had no authority to grant the relief prayed, while the Circuit Court held that under a proper construction of the Act the subsequent marriage of Mary Brenner determined her right to the compensation, and that the Commission, and the Circuit Court on appeal, were authorized to abate it.

The Act, after declaring its purpose to provide "sure and certain relief for workmen injured in extra-hazardous employments and their families and dependents . . . regardless of questions of fault and to the exclusion of every other remedy," except as therein provided, and after providing for a commission to administer the law, declares in section 14: "Every employer, subject to the provisions of this Act, shall pay or provide as required herein compensation according to the schedules of this Act for the disability or death of his employee, resulting from an accidental personal injury sustained [575] by the employee, arising out of and in the course of his employment, without regard to fault as a cause of such injury," etc.

Other sections of the Act require the employer to secure the payment of the compensation referred to in Section 14, and provide how he may do so.

Section 35 declares that, "Each employee (or in case of death his family or dependents), entitled to receive compensation under this Act shall receive the same in accordance with the following schedule, and except as in this Act otherwise provided, such payment shall be in lieu of any and all rights of action whatsoever against any person whomsoever." After providing for permanent and temporary total disability and permanent and temporary partial disability, this section contains the following provisions for cases where the injury causes the death of the employee within two years:

"If there are wholly dependent persons at the time of the death, the payment shall be fifty per cent of the average weekly wages, (of the employee), and to continue for the remainder of the period between the date of the death and eight years after the date of the injury, and not to amount to more than a maximum of four thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, nor less than a minimum of one thousand dollars."

"If there are partly dependent persons at the time of the death, the payment shall be fifty per cent of the average weekly wages and to continue for all of such portion of the period of eight years after the date of the injury, as the Commission in each case may determine, and not to amount to more than a maximum of three thousand dollars."

"The following persons shall be presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee: A wife or invalid husband ('invalid' meaning one physically or mentally incapacitated from earning), a child or children under the age of sixteen years (or over said age if physically or mentally incapacitated from earning) living with or dependent upon the parent at the time of the injury or death."

[576] "In all other cases, questions of dependency, in whole or in part, shall be determined in accordance with the facts in each particular case existing at the time of the injury resulting in the death of such employee, but no person shall be considered as dependent unless such person be a father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, stepchild or grandchild, or brother or sister of the deceased employee, including those otherwise specified in this section."

Under these sections, where the employee, engaged in any one of the employments covered by the Act, dies as the result of an "accidental personal injury . . . arising out of and in the course of his employment," within two years, leaving at the time of his death persons within the class mentioned who were, at the time of the injury, partly dependent upon him, the Act imposes upon the employer a liability to pay to such dependents fifty per cent of the average weekly wages of the employee, to continue for all or such portion of the period of eight years after the date of the injury as the Commission may determine, not to amount to more than a maximum of three thousand dollars. Except as to those presumed to be wholly dependent, the question of dependency, in whole or in part, and the portion of the period of eight years after the date of the injury during which fifty per cent of the average weekly wages of the employee is to be paid to those partly dependent, is left to the determination of the Commission, but when so determined the obligation of the employer to pay, and the right of the beneficiaries to receive the compensation provided, becomes definite and certain. This obligation to pay and the right to receive are not, by the terms of the Act, made conditional upon the beneficiary remaining unmarried, or dependent upon his or her subsequent state of dependency, and nowhere in the Act is there found express authority to the Commission to abate the compensation. The relief to the dependents of the deceased employee provided by the Act is in lieu of that afforded by the common law, and sub-section 11 of section 62 of the [577] Act defines 'Beneficiary' as "a husband, wife, child, children or dependents of an employee in whom shall vest a right to receive payment under the Act." The Act defines the duties and powers of the Commission, and in the absence of a clear grant of such power, we would not be justified in holding that it is authorized to abate compensation expressly provided by the Act as "sure and certain relief" for those who were partly dependent upon a deceased employee, and whose right thereto has been determined and has vested in accordance with the terms of the Act. When we speak of the right to the compensation as vesting in the beneficiary we do not mean to indicate that the right of those partly dependent to the compensation awarded them is a vested right in the sense that if they should die before the completion of the weekly payments allowed them their right to the same would devolve upon their personal representatives. That question is not presented by the record and we are not to be understood as expressing any opinion in regard to it. But that the right to the compensation provided by the statute vests in such beneficiaries in the sense that it is not conditional upon their remaining unmarried, and that the marriage of such a beneficiary does not authorize the abatement of the compensation by the Commission we think is free of doubt.

The appellee relies and the learned Court below based its conclusion upon section 53, which provides that: "The powers and jurisdiction of the Commission over each case shall be continuing and it may from time to time make such modifications or change with respect to former findings or orders with respect thereto as in its opinion may be justified." A reference to several other sections of the Act will show the purpose and application of this section. For instance, under section 41 compensation may be suspended by the Commission where an employee refuses to submit to a medical examination. Under section 42, in case of aggravation, diminution or termination of disability, the Commission may readjust the rate of compensation, and, in a proper case, terminate [578] the payments, and under section 43, if a beneficiary has been a non-resident of the State for one year the Commission may convert weekly payments into a "lump sum payment." These and other provisions indicate the power granted to the Commission in the exercise of its continuing jurisdiction, but they afford no support for the contention here made by the appellee. If we assume that under section 53 the Commission may make such modifications or change in its former findings in reference to those partly dependent upon a deceased employee, or its orders in respect thereto, as in its opinion may be justified, the change or modification made must nevertheless be such as is authorized by the Act. Sub-section 4 of section 35 declares in explicit terms that in all cases, other than those in which the law presumes the claimants to be wholly dependent, the question of dependency, in whole or in part, shall be determined in accordance with the facts existing at the time of the injury resulting in the death of the employee. It is clear that if the question of dependency is to be determined upon the facts existing at the time of the injury, any modification or change by the Commission of its former finding upon that question must likewise be based upon the facts existing at the time of the injury, and cannot be made to rest upon or to conform to conditions arising and existing subsequent to the date of the injury, provided, of course, the award is to those living at the time of the death of the injured employee. Here the application is not for a correction or modification of the finding of the Commission upon the facts existing at the date of the injury, but the petitioner, in the face of the express terms of the statute, seeks to have the question of dependency of Mary Brenner determined by the Commission upon a state of facts arising after the injury, the death of the employee and the award of the Commission, and to have the former finding an order of the Commission changed accordingly. In dealing with a similar provision in the Ohio statute, where it was claimed that it conferred upon the Board of Awards [579] power to abate an award to one wholly dependent upon a deceased employee, the Supreme Court of Ohio said in State v. Industrial Commission, 111 N. E. 299: "If section 39 could be construed as giving the board power to abate an award made under paragraph 2 of section 35, in case of the death of a dependent prior to completion of payments, it necessarily follows that it could be construed also as giving the board power and jurisdiction to determine dependency at any time during the period covered by the payments; instead of having its determination expressly limited by the statute, although it is, to dependency at the time of death, and, as the statute is inflexible as to amount of award, abate the award at any time the person to whom the compensation was granted ceased to be a dependent. This construction would be directly contrary to the statutory requirements."

Section 49 provides: "The benefits in case of death shall be paid to such one or more of the dependents of the decedent for the benefit of all the dependents as may be determined by the Commission, which may apportion the benefits among the dependents in such manner as it may deem just and equitable." It is suggested that under this section and section 53 the Commission may reapportion the compensation among the dependents, and it is argued that if the Commission has the power to change the award to one of the beneficiaries it may abate it entirely. We are not required in this case to determine whether the Commission has the power to change its award for the purpose of reapportioning the compensation among the dependents. The statute fixes the amount of the weekly payments the employer is required to make to the beneficiaries at fifty per cent, of the average weekly wages of the deceased employee. That amount cannot be changed by the Commission, but must be paid to one or more of the dependents for the benefit of all, or may be apportioned among them as the Commission may deem just and equitable. Toba Brenner, the other beneficiary, is not asking for a reapportionment of the weekly payment fixed [580] by the statute, but the petitioner, the insurer, is in effect seeking to have the statutory allowance reduced to the extent of one-half. The terms "just and equitable" used in section 49, relate not to the amount of compensation to be paid by the employer or insurer, but to the apportionment of the same among the beneficiaries. In that the petitioner can have no interest.

Section 42 provides that "In case of the remarriage of a dependent widow of a deceased employee without dependent children, all compensation under this act shall cease," etc., but there is no such provision in reference to other dependents mentioned in the Act, and it is reasonable to conclude that if the Legislature, while dealing with the subject of abatement of compensation, had intended the compensation provided for a sister to abate upon her marriage it would have so declared in plain terms.

We have examined the other cases cited by counsel but they furnish very little aid in arriving at the proper conclusion in the case before us. Those determining the effect of the marriage of a dependent are based upon statutes unlike the Maryland law, while in the others the question involved was the right of the personal representatives of a deceased dependent to the compensation awarded or provided by statute.

As the Maryland Act does not provide for the abatement of compensation awarded to a partly dependent sister of a deceased employee upon her marriage, or authorize the Commission to abate it on that ground, we must reverse the order of the Court below.

Order reversed, with costs to the appellant, Mary Brenner Adleman.

Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to review the recent decisions on the right to obtain an increase, decrease, termination or suspension of an allowance of compensation made under a workmen's compensation act. The earlier cases are collected and discussed in the note to Beckwith v. Spooner, Ann. Cas. 1916E 886.

Sections of the various workmen's compensation acts which permit a review of an award on the application of an employer or an employee, and provide that an award may be varied on such a review, are not intended to afford a method of correcting errors made in fixing the amount of an original award, but are designed to afford a means of enabling a workman or his employer to obtain an increase, decrease, termination, or suspension of the award, because of a change in the workman's physical condition or a change of circumstances subsequent to the entry of the original award. Crossfield v. Tanian [1909] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 629, 69 L. J. Q. B. 790, 82 L. T. N. S. 813, 48 W. R. 609, 16 Times L. Rep. 476, 2 W. C. C. 141; Mead v. Lockhart, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 398; Corbet v. Haines [1912] W. C. Rep. (Eng.) 288, 5 B. W. C. C. 372; State v. District Ct. 136 Minn. 147, 161 N. W. 391.

An award to an injured workman may not be varied to meet the fluctuations of wages paid to workmen in the class of work in which he was engaged before the injury. James v. Ocean Coal Co. [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 213, 73 L. J. K. B. 915, 80 L. T. N. S. 834, 20 Times L. Rep. 483, 68 J. P. 431, 52 W. R. 497, 6 W. C. C. 128.

But a general increase or decrease of wages in an occupation is a sufficient change of circumstances to authorize the assumption of jurisdiction of an application for a review of a prior award. See infra, the subdivision Increase—Circumstances Warranting Increase.

Increase.

JURISDICTION.

In construing the first and second sections of schedule two of the English Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, it has been held that, on the objection of either an injured workman or his employer to a review of its original award by a committee chosen by the workman and employer under a provision of that act, a county court judge may assume jurisdiction of an application to review and increase the award before the committee meets to consider the matter. Rex v. Templer [1912] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 444, 81 L. J. K. B. 805, [1912] W. C. Rep. 209, 5 B. W. C. C. 455, 106 L. T. N. S. 855, [1912] W. N. 135, 28 Times L. Rep. 410, 56 Sol. J. 501.

CIRCUMSTANCES WARRANTING INCREASE.

The various workmen's compensation acts make provision for an increase of an allowance awarded because of an increased disability, or a change in the circumstances, of an injured workman warranting such action. The circumstances warranting such an increase have been discussed in the following recent cases:

England.—Irons v. Davis [1899] 2 Q. B. 330, 333, 1 W. C. C. 26, 68 L. J. Q. B. 673, 80 L. T. N. S. 673, 47 W. R. 616; Chandler v. Smith [1899] 2 Q. B. 506, 516, 68 L. J. Q. B. 909.

California.—Hey v. Pacific Casualty Co. 1 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 38 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 679]; Karas v. Northwestern Pac. R. Co. 2 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 84 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 679]; Manfredi v. Union Sugar Co. 2 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 920 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 678]; Massachusetts Bonding, etc. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 168 Pac. 1050.

Illinois.—Arnold, etc. Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 295, 115 N. E. 137; Casparis Stone Co. v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 77, 115 N. E. 822.

Michigan.—Winn v. Adjustable Table Co. 193 Mich. 127, 159 N. W. 372, 163 N. W. 906.

Minnesota.—State v. Nye, 136 Minn. 50, 161 N. W. 224; State v. District Ct. 136 Minn. 147, 161 N. W. 391.

New Jersey.—Safety Insulated Wire, etc. Co. v. Hudson County, 90 N. J. L. 114, 100 Atl. 846; E. I. Du Pont Nemours Powder Co. v. Spocidio, 90 N. J. L. 438, 101 Atl. 407.

-New York.—Wozneak v. Buffalo Gas Co. 175 App. Div. 268, 273, 161 N. Y. S. 675.

Washington.—See Chalmers v. Industrial Ins. Commission, 94 Wash. 490, 162 Pac. 576.

The failure of an employer to find employment for an injured workman, which was made a condition of the award, is justification for an increase of the allowance. Thomas v. Fairbarn, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 195.

The inability of a workman to obtain employment because of injuries received in a former occupation entitles him to an increase of an allowance previously reduced to a nominal award on his recovery from his injury. Brown v. Thornycroft, 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 386; MacDonald v. Wilson, etc. Coal Co. [1912] A. C. (Eng.) 513, 5 B. W. C. C. 478, 81 L. J. P. C. 188, [1912] W. C. Rep. (Eng.) 302, 106 L. T. N. S. 905, 56 Sol. J. 550, 28 Times L. Rep. 431.

The inability of a workman to establish increased disability is sufficient to bar an allowance of increased compensation. Holt v. Yates, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 75; Henshaw v. Fielding [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 326; Paulizky v. Wandsworth, etc. Gas Co. 9 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 206, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 127; Bloomington, etc. R. Co. v. Industrial Board, 276 Ill. 120, 114 N. E. 511.

Thus, in the case last cited, the court said: "On the hearing before the board Parks was permitted to prove his condition from the time of the injury until the hearing. From his testimony it appears that he was in the same condition at the time of this hearing as he was at the time of the hearing before the committee of arbitration and that he had grown no worse since that time. In that state of the record, even had the transcript of the proceedings before the committee of arbitration been introduced in evidence, the industrial board should have dismissed the petition upon the motion of plaintiff in error, for the reason that Parks did not show that his disability had recurred since the hearing which resulted in the decision of July 3, 1915."

The failure to give the employer the notice required by the statute before filing a claim for increased compensation is a fatal error, justifying a dismissal of the application. Casparis Stone Co. v. Industrial Board, 278 Ill. 77, 115 N. E. 822.

The failure of an injured employee to enter a claim in his original application for compensation for all of the injuries received by him, does not justify favorable action on a subsequent petition for an increase of the allowance granted, because of the omitted injuries. Such claims must be fully presented in the original application and within the period allowed by the act. Erhart v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 172 Cal. 621, 158 Pac. 193; McCarthy's Case, 226 Mass. 444, 115 N. E. 764.

A general increase of the wages in the claimant's occupation has been held not in itself sufficient to entitle him to an increase of an allowance granted to him because of injuries sustained in his employment. Malcolm v. Spowart [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 523. See also Woodilee Coal, etc. Co. v. McNeill [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 129; Cory v. Tarr [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 271.

In Ogden v. South Kirby, etc. Collieries [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 463, 6 B. W. C. C. 1, the court refused an increase of compensation on the ground that the workman was malingering.

ALLOWANCE TO MINOR.

The English Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 provides that the weekly compensation of a workman injured during his minority may be increased, not sooner than twelve months after the award has been made and after the workman has attained his majority, to fifty per cent of the weekly amount which he would have been capable of earning at that age had he remained uninjured. Edwards v. Alyn Steel, etc. Co. 3 B. W. C. C. 141; Evans v. Vickers [1910] 1 K. B. 554, 3 B. W. C. C. 196, affirmed [1910] A. C. (Eng.) 444, 3 B. W. C. C. 403, 79 L. J. K. B. 954, 103 L. T. N. S. 292, 26 Times L. Rep. 548, 54 Sol. J. 651.

As to female employees, the increased allowance under this section of the act apparently may be granted when the employee reaches the age of eighteen. Ambridge v. Good, 5 B. W. C. C. 691, [1912] W. C. Rep. 374.

However, this section was not considered by the court in a case in which the employee was sufficiently recovered to perform light work and was offered suitable employment at wages greater than she was receiving before the injury, though the facts seemed to bring the case within its provisions. Clarke v. Knox [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 664, 57 Sol. J. 793, 6 B. W. C. C. 695.

In construing this section of the act it has been held that on an application to review and increase an allowance, the compensation need not be determined with reference to the work in which the injured employee was engaged at the time of the injury, but he may be awarded the percentage provided by the act of the better wages which he probably would have been capable of earning in any other occupation for which he was qualified, had it not been for the injury sustained. Evans v. Vickers [1910] 1 K. B. 554, 3 B. W. C. C. 196, affirmed [1910] A. C. 444, 3 B. W. C. C. 403, 79 L. J. K. B. 954, 103 L. T. N. S. 292, 26 Times L. Rep. 548, 54 Sol. J. 651.

An arbitrator is not bound, under this section, to limit his award to the difference between what the workman actually earned before he received his injury and the amount which he is probably capable of earning at the time of his application for a review and increased compensation. Edwards v. Alyn Steel, etc. Co. 3 B. W. C. C. 141.

Decrease.

A decrease of an allowance made under a compensation act is ordinarily proper on a showing that the injured workman has recovered sufficiently to enable him to perform light work.

Minnesota.—State v. Nye, 136 Minn. 50, 161 N. W. 224; State v. District Ct. 136 Minn. 147, 161 N. W. 391.

New York.—Wozneak v. Buffalo Gas Co. 175 App. Div. 268, 273, 161 N. Y. S. 675.

Where there has been a change of circumstances justifying such action, an allowance may be decreased. Taff Vale R. Co. v. Lane, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 297; Guest v. Winsper, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 289.

But, where there has been no improvement in the injured workman's condition, it is not proper ordinarily to reduce the compensation awarded. Southampton Gas-Light, etc. Co. v. Stride, 115 L. T. N. S. 498, 9 B. W. C. C. 555, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 285, 32 Times L. Rep. 680.

However, though the workman remains incapacitated and shows no sign of improvement, if such continued disability is due even partly to his failure to act on the advice of his physicians, his compensation should be decreased. Rouse v. Hutchinson [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 299.

The burden of proving a change in a workman's condition enabling him to perform light work, justifying a reduction of compensation, is, in the case of an application for a review of a previous allowance, on the employer. Thornber v. Durkin [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 341, 7 B. W. C. C. 548; Round v. Wathen [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 134, 116 L. T. N. S. 97. See also Williams v. Ruabon Coal, etc. Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 32, 7 B. W. C. C. 202.

Thus, in the case last cited, the court, by way of dictum, said: "There is a great distinction between an original application for compensation and an application to review the compensation which has previously been awarded. In the latter case the employer comes for a review and says in effect that the workman is no longer suffering from total incapacity, but can do light work. He has to show such a change in the condition of the workman since the original award that the man can do light work, and then, if the man's position is that he is such an 'odd lot' that the range of the labor market open to him is restricted, the employer has to show that there is work available for him to do."

The burden of proving that the injured employee is able to obtain light work is on the employer, and compensation may not be reduced until that fact is established. Anglo-Australian Steam Nav. Co. v. Richards, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 247; Osborne v. Tralee, etc. R. Co. [1913] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 133, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 391. However, this does not relieve the employee entirely from giving evidence as to his capacity for work and the prospects of obtaining it. Gray v. Reed [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 127, 108 L. T. N. S. 53, 6 B. W. C. C. 43.

It is not necessary for an employer, in order to make out a prima facie case justifying a reduction of compensation, to guarantee the injured workman suitable employment, even where the possibility of his obtaining light work at his trade elsewhere is very remote. Gray v. Reed, 108 L. T. N. S. 53, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 127, 6 B. W. C. C. 43.

Under the California act, to justify a reduction of compensation from that for total disability to compensation for partial disability, it has been held that it is necessary to prove that the disability of the injured workman does not entirely prevent his obtaining employment elsewhere. Raily v. Island

Transp. Co. 2 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 608 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 678].

An offer of employment in another city, some distance from that in which the injured workman resides, has been held to be an offer of suitable employment justifying a reduction of compensation, in view of the facts that the employer had closed his establishment in the latter city, and the workman's condition had improved. Wallis v. M'Neice, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 445.

It is not proper to reduce the compensation awarded where, though there is a sufficient recovery of the workman so that he is able to perform work of a different nature, no such suitable work has been offered him by the employer. Bryce v. Connor, Sc. Ct. Sess. 7 F. (Eng.) 193, 42 Scott. L. Rep. 154; Dinnington Main Coal Co. v. Bruins [1912] W. C. Rep. (Eng.) 173, 5 B. W. C. C. 367. And, where the possibility of a workman's obtaining employment elsewhere has been lessened as a consequence of his injuries, it has been held on an application for a review of an allowance previously decreased that the allowance should be restored. Clark v. Gas Light, etc. Co. 21 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 184. Compare Arnott v. Fife Coal Co. [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 1262, [1912] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 355, 6 B. W. C. C. 281; Gray v. Shotts Iron Co. [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 1267, [1912] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 359, 6 B. W. C. C. 287.

But in order to justify the refusal of a reduction of an award, the inability to obtain employment must be the result of the incapacity due to the injury and not to the condition of the labor market. Dobby v. Wilson, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 370.

When an injured employee has become established in a private business of his own, on an application to decrease an allowance awarded to him under the workmen's compensation acts, the action of the arbitrator should be determined, not by the amount of the profits from the former employee's business enterprise, but by the value of any services being rendered or capable of being rendered by the former workman in his business, or, in his stead, by some one else employed by him. Norman v. Walder [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 27, 73 L. J. K. B. 461, 90 L. T. N. S. 531, 20 Times L. Rep. 427; Paterson v. Moore, 47 Scott. L. Rep. (Eng.) 30, [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 29, 3 B. W. C. C. 541; Duberly v. Mace [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 199, 6 B. W. C. C. 82; Moore v. Peet Bros. Mfg. Co. 99 Kan. 443, 162 Pac. 295. See also Calico Printers' Assoc. v. Higham [1912] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 93, 81 L. J. K. B. 232, 105 L. T. N. S. 734, 28 Times L. Rep. 53, 5 B. W. C. C. 97.

It has been held that the fact that an injured workman's present wage, and the allowance awarded to him under the workmen's compensation act, do not equal his average earnings before his injury, is not in itself sufficient to justify a refusal to decrease the allowance. Pryde v. Moore [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 457, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 100, 50 Scott. L. Rep. 302, 6 B. W. C. C. 384.

To authorize a reduction of compensation it is not necessary to show the specific wage which the injured man is capable of earning. Carlin v. Stephen [1911] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 901, 5 B. W. C. C. 486, 48 Scott. L. Rep. 862.

On an application to diminish an allowance to an injured workman, the arbitrator should take into consideration a general increase in the wages paid to those in like occupations. Woodilee Coal, etc. Co. v. McNeill [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 129.

The fact that an injured workman is earning, at the time of an application for a review, nearly as much wages as he earned before the injury, is not in itself a change of conditions such as would justify a reduction of the compensation awarded because of the injury. Bryson v. Dunn, Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 8 F. 226, 43 Scott. L. Rep. 236.

As to the date from which an arbitrator may reduce an allowance, Kennedy, L. J., said in Tyne Tees Shipping Co. v. Whilock [1913] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 642, [1913] W. N. 237, 6 B. W. C. C. 559, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 579, 109 L. T. N. S. 84, 57 Sol. J. 716, 82 L. J. K. B. 1091: "On these applications it is certainly open to the employer to ask for not only a reduction of the amount of the weekly payment from the date of the hearing, but he is entitled, as I think this court has decided, to get a reduction at any rate from the date of the application if the improvement in the workman's condition is shown to have existed at that date. Although I am not sure whether there is a decision to that effect, it has certainly not been decided that, if the claim for review gave precisely an earlier date than the date of application as the date on which the incapacity had ceased or been diminished, he might not get an order for reduction as from that earlier date." See also Morton v. Woodward [1902] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 276, 4 W. C. C. 143, 71 L. J. K. B. 736, 86 L. T. N. S. 878, 51 W. R. 54, 66 J. P. 660.

An agreement between an employer and employee to reduce the compensation awarded does not preclude a review for the purpose of obtaining an additional reduction of the award. Cawdor, etc. Collieries v. Jones, 3 B. W. C. C. 59.

An application by an employer for a review and modification of an award must be heard notwithstanding there has been no change of circumstances since the original award. Thranmere Bay Development Co. v. Brennan, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 403.

Termination.

IN GENERAL.

If it can be established that the workman's incapacity no longer exists, an allowance made to him under a workmen's compensation act because of such incapacity, resulting from injuries received while employed, may be terminated.

New York.—Wozneak v. Buffalo Gas Co. 175 App. Div. 268, 273, 161 N. Y. S. 675.

Where the incapacity resulting from an injury received in his employment by a workman is prolonged because of a disease contracted by him before the injury, payments to him under the workmen's compensation acts may be terminated. Westcott, etc. Lines v. Price, 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 430, [1912] W. C. Rep. 280; Cianetti v. Fremont Consol. Min. Co. 2 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 947 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 679].

It has also been held that the death of an injured employee, from causes other than the injuries sustained by him in his employment, terminates his employer's liability to make further periodical payments awarded under the workmen's compensation acts. Kilbride v. Pratt, etc. Co. 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 688; Erie R. Co. v. Callaway (N. J.) 102 Atl. 6.

The workmen's compensation act of Illinois (§ 21) specifically provides for the abatement of an unpaid allowance to an injured workman on his death occurring from causes having no relation to the injury sustained. Ticzkus v. Standard Office Co. Bulletin No. 1, Ill. 176 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 675].

It has been held that an award of a specific sum, to be apportioned and paid in periodical instalments to an injured workman during a definite period, terminates on his death, from causes unconnected with the injury, before the expiration of the period during which the allotment was to continue. Wozneak v. Buffalo Gas Co. 175 App. Div. 268, 161 N. Y. S. 675.

Also, where death, though not immediate, is the result of an injury, a periodical allowance to an injured workman during his incapacity terminates at his death. Burns's Case, 218 Mass. 8, Ann. Cas. 1916A 787, 105 N. E. 601.

Where a workman's injured fingers were still tender the compensation has, nevertheless, been held to have been properly terminated. Goodall v. Kramer, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 315.

An award has been terminated where it was found that a workman, whose knee had been injured, was fit for work provided he wore a knee cap, though the injury would recur if the use of the knee cap were discontinued. Anderson v. Darnagvil Coal Co. [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 456, 47 Scot. L. Rep. 342.

Where the prolonged unfitness of a workman to perform his former heavy work was due to the softened condition of his muscles resulting from his long idleness, it has been held that the employer properly terminated compensation paid to the workman, during his incapacity, without any award or recorded agreement. David v. Windsor Steam Coal Co. 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 177.

Where an incapacity has not been shown to have been removed, the compensation allowed may not properly be discontinued.

Kansas.—Moore v. Peet Bros. Mfg. Co. 99 Kan. 443, 162 Pac. 295.

Compensation may not be terminated while a disability lasts, unless the employer can establish that the continued incapacity of an injured workman is not the result of his injury, but is due to some other cause. McCallum v. Quinn, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 339, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 141, [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 227.

In Brown v. George A. Fuller Co. (Mich.) 163 N. W. 492, it was held that the fact that the defendant had no further work for the plaintiff did not entitle it to terminate the weekly payments awarded to him under the workmen's compensation act for injuries sustained while in the defendant's employ. The court said: "Defendant elected to take claimant back into its employment, and up to the time that it discharged him, in September, 1915, it complied with the order. After that date it has not complied with the order, but for some reason assumes that its duty was at an end when the hotel was finished and it had no further work for the plaintiff. It is said he was given work as long as defendant had work to give him. The fact that it did or did not have employment for claimant would not terminate his right to compensation. The fact that it did not have any further work for claimant after September, 1914, would, doubtless, change the method of complying with the order; but it would not take away claimant's right to the compensation allowed him by the board."

Where a refusal to exercise an injured member is found not to be unreasonable, as where the workman's own physician advised him that the exercise would not better his condition, interference with an award has been refused. Burgess v. Jewell, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 145; Moss v. Akers, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 294.

It has been held to be error for an arbitrator to terminate an allowance to an injured workman without any consideration of the effect of his injured condition on his ability to obtain future employment. Arnott v. Fife Coal Co. 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 361, [1911] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1029, 48 Scott. L. Rep. 828; Petrie v. Smith [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 378. Compare Gray v. Shotts Iron Co. [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 1267, [1912] W. C. Rep. 359, 6 B. W. C. C. 287.

An arbitrator is without jurisdiction to terminate an employer's liability where such action has not been requested by the employer. Henshaw v. Fielding [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 326.

It has been held to be error for an arbitrator to terminate an award of compensation for injuries received by a workman, on the ground that a disease subsequently contracted, and not the injury, was the cause of the continued incapacity, without first determining whether the illness itself was in fact a result of the injury within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act. Ystradowen Colliery Co. v. Griffiths [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 533, 78 L. J. K. B. 1044, 100 L. T. N. S. 869, 25 Times L. Rep. 622, 2 B. W. C. C. 357.

In reviewing an award, on an application to terminate an allowance of compensation under a workmen's compensation act, an arbitrator should take into consideration the nervous and mental condition of the workman as well as his physical condition in estimating the extent of his recovery. Wall v. Steel [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 117, 84 L. J. K. B. 1599, 112 L. T. N. S. 846.

Where such nervous and mental condition is not considered, it is error for an arbitrator to terminate an award. Southampton Gas Light, etc. Co. v. Stride [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 285, 115 L. T. N. S. 498, 32 Times L. Rep. 680, 9 B. W. C. C. 555; Eaves v. Blaenlydach Colliery Co. [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 73, 78 L. J. K. B. 809. Thus, in the case last cited, the court said: "The learned judge says he thinks that, although the man honestly believes he is not able to do the work, and although he is not shamming or malingering, it is sufficient for the employers to show that the muscular mischief is at an end. I am entirely unable to assent to that view. The effects of an accident are at least twofold: they may be merely muscular effects —they almost always must include muscular effects—and there may also be, and very frequently are, effects which you may call mental, or nervous, or hysterical, whichever is the proper word to use in respect of them. The effects of this second class, as a rule, arise directly from the accident from which the man suffered just as much as the muscular effects do, and it seems to me entirely a fallacy to say that a man's right to compensation ceases when the muscular mischief is ended, though the nervous or hysterical effects still remain."

However, in the United States, the contrary opinion has been held and compensation has been discontinued where, though the workman had recovered physically, he still suffered from mental depression due to his injury and was incapacitated for work because thereof. Tatta v. Capitol City Lumber Co. 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 161, wherein it was said: "I might add that cases of lassitude, mental depression, imaginary pain and kindred neurotic conditions are of occasional occurrence among employees accustomed to active work who have sustained an injury, or been subjected to an operation. Assuming that such a condition resulted from an injury arising out of and in the course of employment, compensation might under certain circumstances be awarded. The human organism is a unit, and the mind cannot be disassociated from the body; but in this case, as in a great majority of such cases, the proper treatment is a gradual return to normal activities. For the commissioner to adopt a policy of awarding compensation on the basis of psychic depression would not only be a wrong to the employees whom the policy was intended to benefit, but would also open the door to grave abuses of the principles of the act."

Where the condition of an injured workman was the result of constitutional nervousness intensified by the accident causing his injury, it was held that compensation was improperly ended. Smith v. Coed Taton Colliery, 2 W. C. C. (Eng.) 121.

The fact that an injured employee at the time of a review is earning the same wages as he received before the injury, is not conclusive of the employer's right to a termination of the compensation awarded to him. Warwick Steamship Co. v. Callaghan, 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 283; Keevans v. Mundy [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 180. Compare Bowhill Coal Co. v. Malcolm, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 562, [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 447, 47 Scott. L. Rep. 449. However, it has been held that this is true only in case the injured employee is a minor. Bowhill Coal Co. v. Malcolm, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 562, [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 447, 47 Scott. L. Rep. 449.

Unpaid compensation to an injured workman, which has accrued prior to his death, may be collected by his personal representative as a part of his estate. Kilbride v. Pratt, etc. Co. 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 688; Schoenreiter v. Quincy Min. Co. Mich. Wk. Comp. Cas. [1916] 32 [cited in Honold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 674].

On an application to review weekly payments allowed under the workmen's compensation act, it has been held in England that an arbitrator has no jurisdiction to make a prospective award terminating the said payments on a certain future date. Baker v. Jewell [1910] 2 K. B. 673, [1910] W. N. 180, 79 L. J. K. B. 1092, 103 L. T. N. S. 173, 3 B. W. C. C. 503; Allan v. Spowart, Sc. Ct. Sess. 8 F. 811, 43 Scott. L. Rep. 599. Compare Evans v. Barrow Hematite Steel Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 355. Thus, in Baker v. Jewell, supra, the court said: "In my opinion it is not competent for an arbitrator to make such an award. It has two defects, and it has two results. One is that the arbitrator is taking upon himself the function of a prophet, which is not what he ought to do; and the next is this, which to my mind is a more serious matter: it shifts the onus of proof in a mode which is, or which may be, very unfair to the workman. The duty of the arbitrator is to say what, upon the evidence adduced before him at the time of the hearing for a review, is the condition of the workman, and on that footing he ought to make an award of so much per week during the incapacity. Then, if there is a change, if the man is getting better, it is for the employer to seek to review the weekly payments on the ground that the incapacity has ceased or determined, or whatever the case may be. The burden is thus thrown upon the employer to show that there is a change of circumstances. If, however, the award is made in the manner in which it is made here, namely, so much a week for a certain time, and then only a penny a week, and if the man's condition should, at the end of the first period, be substantially the same as before, the burden is thrown upon the workman, and not upon the employer, and the workman would in that case have to get the award reviewed."

However, in the United States, in Hunnewell's Case, 220 Mass. 351, 107 N. E. 934, such an award appears to have been made.

After the expiration of the period allowed by the act within which to take an appeal from the decision of an arbitrator terminating an award to an injured workman, the matter is res judicata. Green v. Cammell [1913] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 665, 6 B. W. C. C. 735, 29 Times L. Rep. 703; Linthorpe Dinsdale Smelting Co. v. Hoy [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 212, 86 L. J. K. B. 995; Cadenhead v. Ailsa Shipbuilding Co. [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1129, 47 Scott. L. Rep. 784, 3 B. W. C. C. 581; Evans v. Barrow Hematite Steel Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 355.

Thus, after a finding on an original application that the incapacity for which compensation was sought was the result of an injury received by a workman in his employment, and an award was made accordingly, it has been held that a court has no jurisdiction at the instance of an employer to entertain an application for a review and termination of the award on the ground that the incapacity resulting from the injury has ceased, where it developed subsequent to the award that the cause of the disability may have been an illness which the workman contracted during infancy and not the accident and injury. Linthorpe Dinsdale Smelting Co. v. Hoy [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 212, 86 L. J. K. B. 995.

On an application for a review and termination of an award under a workmen's compensation act, it has been held to be erroneous for an arbitrator to take the view that his holding on the original application that the employee was suffering from a "permanent partial incapacity" was res judicata, and dismiss the application. Dundee, etc. Shipping Co. v. Wilcock [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 225, 9 B. W. C. C. 471.

It is not necessary, in order to give an arbitrator jurisdiction of an application for a review and termination of an award, that a dispute shall have arisen between the parties thereto. Tyne Tees Shipping Co. v. Whilock [1913] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 642, [1913] W. N. 237, 6 B. W. C. C. 559, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 579, 109 L. T. N. S. 84, 57 Sol. J. 716, 82 L. J. K. B. 1091; Malcolm v. Bowhill Coal Co. 3 B. W. C. C. 562, [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 447, 47 Scott. L. Rep. 449.

The fact that an injured workman, believing himself recovered, returns to his work and continues to perform his duties for a considerable period thereafter, without any agreement as to further compensation in the event of a recurrence of his disability, does not warrant a finding by the arbitrator of an implied agreement to terminate the weekly payments which the workman was allowed, and to end the liability of his employer incurred as a result of the injury. Williams v. Vauxhall Colliery Co. [1907] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 433, 76 L. J. K. B. 854, 23 Times L. Rep. 591, 97 L. T. N. S. 559, 51 Sol. J. 582, 9 B. W. C. C. 120; O'Callaghan v. Martin, 38 Ir. L. T. 152; Baird v. Dempster [1906] Sc. Ct. Sess. 722, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 119, 1 B. W. C. C. 62.

However, under a similar statement of facts, the compensation was held to have been terminated by mutual consent. Bradbury v. Bedworth Coal, etc. Co. 2 W. C. C. (Eng.) 138.

In an answer to an application by a workman to increase his compensation under the workmen's compensation act, the employer may properly request a termination of such payments. Paulfziky v. Wandsworth, etc. Gas Co. [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 127, 9 B. W. C. C. 206; Linthorpe Dinsdale Smelting Co. v. Hoy [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 212, 86 L. J. K. B. 995.

In entering a judgment on an application to diminish or terminate an award of compensation, it has been held to be error for an arbitrator to base his decision even partly on the result of a private interview had with the workman, during which the employers or their legal representatives were not present, and a new trial should be granted. Earle's Shipbuilding, etc. Co. v. Walker [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 54, 10 B. W. C. C. 73.

RETROACTIVE TERMINATION.

It has been held in England that an arbitrator under the workmen's compensation act has no jurisdiction to terminate the compensation awarded to an injured workman as from a date antecedent to an application for a review thereof, where the workman's capacity or incapacity for any period prior to the said application is not disputed and the point is not raised before the arbitrator on the review of the former award. Upper Forest etc. Steel, etc. Co. v. Thomas [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 631, 2 B. W. C. C. 414, 78 L. J. K. B. 1113; Charing Cross, etc. R. Co. v. Boots [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 640, 2 B. W. C. C. 385, 78 L. J. K. B. 1115, 101 L. T. N. S. 53, 25 Times L. Rep. 683.

Thus, in Upper Forest, etc. Steel, etc. Co. v. Thomas, supra, the court said: "I think that the arbitrator had no jurisdiction to make this award. It was not referred to him to ascertain what was the state of the injured man at a previous date. It is really unnecessary for the court to consider whether, if the matter had been referred to the arbitrator, it would have been competent to him to decide that the incapacity had ceased at a previous date. I desire to leave that an open question, and I must not be taken as indicating a view one way or the other upon the point. That was not the question referred to the arbitrator upon this application."

However, where there is a dispute between the workman and his employer as to the time when the former's incapacity ceased, and that point is raised before the arbitrator, that official has jurisdiction to inquire at what date since the making of the original award the workman's incapacity diminished, and to make his award accordingly. Morton v. Woodward [1902] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 276, 4 W. C. C. 143, 71 L. J. K. B. 736, 86 L. T. N. S. 878, 51 W. R. 54, 66 J. P. 660. See also Tyne Tees Shipping Co. v. Whilock [1913] 3 K. B. The early decisions of the courts of Scotland held that the authority of an arbitrator to end compensation allowed under the workmen's compensation act exists only as from the date of his decision on an application for a review of such allowance, where an agreement between the employer and his workman providing for such compensation has been recorded as required by the act. Southhook Fire-Clay Co. v. Laughland, 1 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 405, [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 831, 45 Scott. L. Rep. 664; Baird v. Stevenson [1907] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 1259, 44 Scott. L. Rep. 864; Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co. 40 Scott. L. Rep. (Eng.) 205, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 244; Pumpherson Oil Co. v. Cavoney, 40 Scott. L. Rep. (Eng.) 724, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 963; Fife Coal Co. v. Lindsay [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 431, 45 Scott. L. Rep. 317, 1 B. W. C. C. 117. But the foregoing decisions were subsequently overruled, and the law as laid down by the session court of Scotland is that, in the case of recorded agreements, compensation may be terminated as from the date of the application for a review, but not before then. Donaldson v. Cowan, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 390, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 920, [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1292. It appears, however, that in the case of an unrecorded agreement between an employer and an injured workman affecting his compensation, the payments may be terminated as from the date on which the incapacity ceased, and such ending of the payments may antedate the filing of the application for a review. Tigue v. Coleville, Sc. Ct. Sess. 8 F. 179, 43 Scott. L. Rep. 129; Lochgelly Iron, etc. Co. v. Sinclair [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 922, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 665; Nelson v. Summerlee Iron Co. [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 360, 47 Scott. L. Rep. 344; Rosie v. Mackay [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 714, 47 Scott. L. Rep. 664; Thomson v. Watson [1916] Sc. Ct. Sess. 23, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 498; Finnie v. Fulton, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 665, [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 938. See also Keevans v. Mundy [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 180.

Where the aggravated disability of the injured workman is due to his own negligence, an award of compensation may be terminated as of the date on which the workman probably would have recovered were it not for his negligence. Smraker v. Pacific Lumber Co. 2 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 87 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 680]; Kelliher v. Great Western Power Co. 2 Cal. I. A. C. Crow's Nest Pass Coal Co.* 22 British Columbia 514, 26 Dominion L. Rep. 317, 34 West. L. Rep. 32, affirming 23 Dominion L. Rep. 57, 32 West. L. Rep. 218.

TERMINATION OF ALLOWANCE TO DEPENDENT.

It appears that an award of a lump sum to a dependent relative under a workmen's compensation act, to be paid in instalments periodically, terminates on the death of such dependent, though it is not so provided in the act. Ivey v. Ivey [1912] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 118, 81 L. J. K. B. 819, [1912] W. C. Rep. 293, 106 L. T. N. S. 485, 5 B. W. C. C. 279; Matecny v. Vierling Steel Works, 187 Ill. App. 448; Murphy's Case, 224 Mass. 592, 113 N. E. 283.

Thus, in Matecny v. Vierling Steel Works, supra, the court said: "The appellee contends that, even if it be held that the mother was the sole beneficiary, still her right to the entire compensation became vested upon the death of Joseph Matecny, and the appointment of an administrator for his estate, and that this right would survive her death and inure to the benefit of her estate. After a careful consideration of this question, we have arrived at the conclusion that the contention of the appellant is correct, and that the obligation of the appellant to pay compensation to the administrator would be extinguished on the death of the mother. We do not believe that the act contemplates that the employer shall pay any money to nondependent heirs."

However, it has also been held that, on the death of such a dependent relative, in the absence of any provision in the act to the contrary, his or her personal representatives are entitled to recover any unpaid balance of a lump sum, or weekly allowance for a definite period, awarded to such deceased dependent under a workmen's compensation act. Darlington v. Roscoe [1907] 1 K. B. 219, 9 W. C. C. (Eng.) 1; In re Jones, 217 Mass. 192, 104 N. E. 556; State v. Industrial Commission, 92 Ohio St. 434, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1162, 111 N. E. 299, L.R.A.1916D 944. Thus, in the case last cited, the court said: "We hold that when the award is once made to a sole dependent the right to the compensation vests, and once vested there can be no condition attached except as to the time of payment, and it is equally immaterial whether the dependent subsequently dies or becomes independent."

Under the English act, it has been held that notwithstanding the death of a sole dependent relative of a workman shortly after the latter's death in the course of his employment, the personal representative of the said deceased dependent, even though the latter never presented a claim which he or she was entitled to make under the said act, may recover the compensation allowed thereby to dependent relatives. United Collieries v. Simpson [1909] A. C. 283, 78 L. J. K. B. 129, 101 L. T. N. S. 129, 25 T. L. Rep. 678, 53 Sol. J. 630, 2 B. W. C. C. 308, [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 19, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 780.

In the reported case it is held that a weekly allowance for a definite period under a workmen's compensation act to the dependent sister of a workman who had been killed in the course of his employment could not be abated because of her subsequent marriage. See also State v. Industrial Commission, 92 Ohio St. 434, 454, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1162, 111 N. E. 299, L.R.A.1916D 944.

Compensation which accrues to a dependent of a workman, killed in his employment, between the death of the workman and that of the dependent which occurs at a subsequent date, becomes part of the dependent's estate which the legal representative may recover. In re Towle, Op. Sol. Dept. of Labor 565.

As to whether an award vests in the beneficiary, see the note to State v. Industrial Commission, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1162.

Suspension.

JURISDICTION TO ORDER SUSPENSION.

As to the jurisdiction to suspend an allowance under the English workmen's compensation act, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., in Vessel Tynron v. Morgan [1909] 2 K. B. 66, 78 L. J. K. B. 857, 100 L. T. N. S. 641, 2 B. W. C. C. 406, said: "Then it is said on behalf of the employers that it has never been decided that there is any jurisdiction to make a suspensory award, and that the Scots courts in one case have expressed a doubt whether it is competent to do so. All I can say is that the court of appeal, to my certain knowledge, for many years has taken the view that it is competent to make such an award. There is probably not a county court judge in the country who has not acted on that view, and I think it would be entirely wrong for us now to raise any doubt whatever as to the jurisdiction of a county court judge, or of this court, in a proper case, to make what is called a suspensory award."

In the following cases also, the jurisdiction was sustained: Weir v. North British R. Co. 5 B. W. C. C. 595, [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1073, 49 Scott. L. Rep. 772, [1912] W. C. Rep. 332; Dempsey v. Caldwell [1914] Sc. Ct. Sess. 28; Clelland v. Singer Mfg. Co. Sc. Ct. Sess. 7 F. 975, 42 Scott. L. Rep. 757.

CIRCUMSTANCES AUTHORIZING SUSPENSION.

Under the English act, compensation awarded to a workman may be suspended on his emigration to a foreign country. See Harrison v. Dowling [1915] 3 K. B. 218, 8 B. W. C. C. 544, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 351, 113 L. T. N. S. 622, [1915] W. N. 262, 31 Times L. Rep. 480.

But it has been held that this rule does not apply to the case of a workman who has enlisted in the military forces of the United Kingdom and been sent on foreign service. Harrison v. Dowling [1915] 3 K. B. 218, 8 B. W. C. C. 544, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 351, 113 L. T. N. S. 622, [1915] W. N. 262, 31 Times L. Rep. 480. In that case it was said: "That it is said that the workman is no longer in the United Kingdom. Of course he is physically not within the United Kingdom; he is at Cawnpore. But the act does not say, and I am satisfied that it does not intend to say, that the mere fact that an injured workman is for the moment not in truth physically in the United Kingdom deprives him of his right to compensation or authorizes suspension. It contemplates the case of a workman having gone from this country, say as an emigrant to Canada, the United States, or what not."

Where an employer has been prejudiced by the delay of an injured workman in reporting the fact of his injury to the employer, compensation may be suspended during the period intervening the date of the injury and on which it is so reported. Sezerbowiez v. New Britain, 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 671.

A workman's compensation may be suspended during the period of a refusal by him to submit to medical treatment provided for him, Dowds v. Bennie, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. (Eng.) 268; Hill v. Guardian Casualty, etc. Co. 1 Cal. I. A. C. Dec. 415 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 678]; or on his unreasonable refusal to accept light work offered to him by his employer, Furness v. Bennett, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 195; Potts v. Guildford Syndicate [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 330; Jenkinson v. Steiner [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 104. See also Keevans v. Mundy [1914] Sc. Ct. Sess. 525, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 180.

It has been held that compensation to an injured workman may be suspended while he is in prison. Clayton v. Dobbs, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 488.

If the claim of a workman on a recorded memorandum under the English act, for injuries arising out of his employment, is for an amount which his employers have already paid him because of such injuries, a suspension of payments at the instance of the employers may properly be allowed. Wilson's etc. Coal Co. v. Cairnduff [1911] Sc. Ct. Sess. 647.

Where a workman is not shown to have completely recovered, a suspension of an allowance is properly refused. Fife Coal Co. v. Davidson [1907] Sc. Ct. Sess. 90, 44 Scott. L. Rep. 108.

Also, where there is no probability of a recurrence of the injurious effects of an accident and a subsequent incapacity for work, a suspensory award is not an appropriate remedy, but the compensation should be terminated. Leverington v. Dodman [1916] 1

K. B. 964, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 109, 114 L. T. N. S. 582, 85 L. J. K. B. 832; Wardell v. Cargo Fleet Iron Co. [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 77.

A suspension has been held to be improper where the workman continued paralyzed in his legs as the result of his injuries. Southampton Gas-Light, etc. Co. v. Stride [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 285, 115 L. T. N. S. 498, 32 Times L. Rep. 680, 9 B. W. C. C. 555.

An appeal from a decision of an arbitrator refusing to award compensation on an original application, on the ground that a suspensory award should have been made, has been dismissed for the reason that the record did not show that such an award had been requested. Harlock v. Steamship Coquet [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 73.

The suspension of an allowance to a workman under the English workmen's compensation act, on an application to review the said allowance on the ground that the workman, having enlisted in the military forces, had made it impossible to determine the extent of his recovery and his present capacity for work in his former employment, has been held to be error, inasmuch as, admitting the profession of a soldier not to be a "suitable employment" contemplated by the act, the arbitrator should have determined the value of any service which the workman was able to render in any industrial or commercial employment and made his award accordingly. Thomas v. Watson [1916] Sc. Ct. Sess. 23, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 498.

NOMINAL AWARD.

In England arbitrators under the workmen's compensation act, for the purpose of suspending compensation without risking the possibility of absolutely terminating the liability of an employer in cases wherein the employee, while completely recovered from his injury, may suffer a recurrence of his disability or a prejudicial change in his circumstances, have resorted to the device of what is probably erroneously termed, a "suspensory" award, to wit, the reduction of a previous allowance to a nominal award, usually of one penny a week. The effect of such an award is to keep alive the claim of the workman and, in case of a subsequent incapacity resulting from the injury, or change of circumstances, to obtain a review and continuance or increase of the original allowance. The object attained is the effectual termination of the employer's liability, conditioned on the continued capacity of the workman to perform his former or other duties, which capacity was lessened by the injury from which, however, he has apparently completely recovered. Suspensory awards of a nominal allowance were made in the following cases:

Hill v. Ocean Coal Co. 3 B. W. C. C. 29; Jones v. Cawdor, etc. Collieries, 3 B. W. C. C. 59; Wells v. Cardiff Steam Coal Collieries Co. 3 B. W. C. C. 104; Griga v. Steamship Harelda, 3 B. W. C. C. 116, 26 Times L. Rep. 272; Thomas v. Fairbairn, 4 B. W. C. C. 195; Braithwaite v. Cox, 5 B. W. C. C. 77; Brown v. Thornycroft, 5 B. W. C. C. 386; Potts v. Guildford Syndicate [1914] W. C. & Ins. Cammell [1913] 3 K. B. 665, 6 B. W. C. C. 735, 29 Times L. Rep. 703; Irons v. Davis [1899] 2 Q. B. 330, 68 L. J. Q. B. 673; Ogden v. South Kirby, etc. Collieries [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 463, 6 B. W. C. C. 573; Duberley v. Mace [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 199, 6 B. W. C. C. 82; Thayne v. Gray [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 64.

In Vessel Tynron v. Morgan [1909] 2 K. B. 66, 78 L. J. K. B. 857, 100 L. T. N. S. 641, 2 B. W. C. C. 406, it appeared that a seaman met with an accident while on a voyage and was ruptured. By wearing a truss, he sufficiently recovered to enable him to resume his work. In considering an application to reduce or terminate an allowance made to the seaman, the court said: "That the workman is now able to resume his work as mate is not seriously disputed by Mr. Hogg; but he says that the award ought to be made in a shape which would not end the workman's right to compensation forever by terminating absolutely the liability, but that it ought to be made in such a shape as to keep alive the employers' liability if it should appear, as is extremely probable, that the effects of the original accident, quite apart from a subsequent accident, would so far develop themselves hereafter that the workman might be entitled to have the award reviewed in his favor, just as it is now being reviewed in favor of the employers. The county court judge was asked on behalf of the workman to make what is sometimes called, not quite accurately, a suspensory award—that is to say, to award a nominal sum of a penny per week, or to make a declaration of liability, it does not matter which way you put it. I feel no doubt whatever in the case of an accident of this kind—in the case of rupture, when at the very moment it was before the learned judge the workman was wearing a truss—a suspensory award ought to be made."

The authority to make a suspensory award of a penny a week is not confined to the consideration of applications for a review of an original award of compensation. In determining the action to be taken on an original application, an arbitrator may keep alive a claim against an employer by making such an award in a case in which he is not willing at the time of the hearing to award a substantial allowance. Thomas v. Fairbairn, 4 B. W. C. C. 195; Chapman v. Sage [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 472, 8 B. W. C. C. 559, 113 L. T. N. S. 623; Paulizky v. Wandsworth, etc. Gas Co. [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 127, 9 B. W. C. C. 206; Green v. Cammell [1913] 3 K. B. 665, 6 B. W. C. C. 735, 29 Times L. Rep. 703. Thus, in the case last cited, it was said: "It was contended by Mr. Rigby Swift that there is no power to make, on an original application, what is known as a suspensory award for 1d. a week, and that Green could not have appealed from the first award. I am unable to agree with this contention. It seems to me that whether under an original application or under an application to review it is equally competent to the court to make an award of 1d. a week. The case of Griga v. Steamship Harelda, 3 B. W. C. C. 116, is a clear authority in this court on the point. I do not think it is open to us to depart from that decision. But having now heard the point fully argued, I may say that I feel no doubt that 1d. a week may be awarded on an original application, and that if no such award is made it is competent to the workman to appeal against the award."

While the authority to make a suspensory award of a nominal sum was definitely established by the decision of the English House of Lords in Taylor v. London, etc. R. Co. [1912] A. C. 242, 81 L. J. K. B. 541, [1912] W. C. Rep. 95, 106 L. T. N. S. 354, 56 Sol. J. 323, 28 Times L. Rep. 290, cited in the original note, the courts of Scotland in cases antedating that of Taylor v. London, etc. R. Co. supra, denied that the authority existed, Clelland v. Singer Mfg. Co. Sc. Ct. Sess. 7 F. 975, 42 Scott. L. Rep. 757; Rosie v. Mackay [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 714, 47 Scott.

L. Rep. 654; and disapproved the following decisions which held the opposite view: Freeland v. Macfarlane, Sc. Ct. Sess. 2 F. 832, 37 Scott. L. Rep. 599; Ferrier v. Gourlay, Sc. Ct. Sess. 4 F. 711, 39 Scott. L. Rep. 453.

DECLARATION OF LIABILITY.

The award, however, need not be in the form of a nominal allowance in order to save the workman from possible injury by prematurely absolving his employer from further liability. The employee is sufficiently protected if the award takes the form of a "declaration of liability" without any pecuniary allowance. Furness v. Bennett, 3 B. W. C. C. 195; Braithwaite v. Cox, 5 B. W. C. C. 77; Corbet v. Hains, 5 B. W. C. C. 372, [1912] W. C. Rep. 288; Parry v. Rhymney Iron, etc. Co. 5 B. W. C. C. 632, [1912] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 331; Howards v. Wharton, 6 B. W. C. C. 614, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 594; Burt v. Fife Coal Co. 8 B. W. C. C. 350; Beath v. Ness, Sc. Ct. Sess. 6 F. 822, 41 Scott. L. Rep. 631; Chandler v. Smith [1899] 2 Q. B. 506, 68 L. J. Q. B. 909; Vessel Tynron v. Morgan [1908] 2 K. B. 66, 78 L. J. K. B. 857, 100 L. T. N. S. 641, 2 B. W. C. C. 406; Nimmo v. Fisher [1907] Sc. Ct. Sess. 890, 44 Scott. L. Rep. 641; Baird v. McWhinnie [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 440, 45 Scott. L. Rep. 338; Clarke v. Knox [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 664, 57 Sol. J. 793, 6 B. W. C. C. 695; Dempsey v. Caldwell [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 738, [1913] Scott. L. T. 267; Chapman v. Sage [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 472, 113 L. T. N. S. 623, 8 B. W. C. C. 559; Thomson v. Watson [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 498, [1916] Sc. Ct. Sess. 23.

Thus, in Chandler v. Smith, supra, the court said: "It seems to me that the county court judge in this case might and should have made a declaration of liability and adjourned the question of the amount and duration of compensation. This seems to me to be in accordance with the spirit of the provisions of clause 12 of Sched. I, which provides that the weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review the weekly payment may be ended, diminished, or increased. If you may review the award when the facts have been ascertained for certain, it seems only reasonable that you may postpone the fixing of the amount of compensation until the facts are ascertained to which the measure is to be applied, and I prefer this course to that of awarding a weekly payment of a penny and then applying the provisions of clause 12 of Sched. I."

This latter practice has been followed in the United States, in Hunnewell's Case, 220 Mass. 351, 107 N. E. 934, wherein an industrial accident board awarded compensation to an injured employee and filed its finding to the effect that "total incapacity for work on account of said personal injury will cease . . . on October 19, 1913, subject to the right of the said employee to compensation on account of partial incapacity for work under § 10, Part II, of the workmen's compensation act, depending upon his ability to earn wages." In opposition to an application for a continuance of the award after the date on which the board found that the total incapacity of the injured workman would cease, it was urged that "because all weekly payments in fact stopped, there was nothing further for the board to deal with under Part III, § 12 [of the workmen's compensation act], and that it could not end, diminish or increase a weekly payment which had ceased to exist six months before the hearing." The court said: "That contention would be unanswerable if the earlier decision had been that weekly payments should end finally. But, as has been pointed out, that was not the earlier decision and the board in its decision now under review was proceeding strictly in accordance with the lines left open by express reservation in its former decision. . . . In substance the decision was that total disability was over, but whether there would be a partial disability arising out of the injury was a question as to which they were not at that time prepared to give a decision either way, but desired to leave it open still as a question to be answered as the facts might warrant at some future time. This course is justified by the act. It has been the custom under the English act to award compensation at the rate of a penny a week under these circumstances. . . . That course never has been followed, so far as we are aware, under our act. But it is not necessary even in England that this be done in order to keep the case alive, provided the purpose is plain not to terminate the claim definitively, but to keep it open for further consideration and order. . . . Taylor v. London, etc. R. Co. [1912] A. C. 242, 245."

SURGICAL OPERATION.

If, by undergoing a slight surgical operation which any reasonable person would submit to in his own interest, regardless of the effect it would have on his prospects of obtaining an award under a workmen's compensation act, an injured workman's capacity for work would be increased, or his full capacity restored, it is proper to suspend his allowance on his refusal to permit the operation to be performed. Paddington v. Stack, 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 402; Warneken v. Moreland [1909] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 184, 78 L. J. K. B. 332, 100 L. T. N. S. 12, 25 Times L. Rep. 129; Anderson v. Baird, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 373; Nimmo v. Fisher [1907] Sc. Ct. Sess.

890, 44 Scott. L. Rep. 641; Donnelly v. Baird [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 536, 45 Scott. L. Rep. 394, 1 B. W. C. C. 95; Gordon v. Evans, 1 Cal. J. A. C. Dec. 94 [cited in Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, page 681]; Sezerbowicz v. New Britain, 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 671; McNally v. Hudson, etc. R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 455, 95 Atl. 122.

Thus, in Anderson v. Baird, supra, the court said: "If risk to life or permanent deterioration of health would be occasioned by the operation, I do not think the workman is bound to submit to it in order to entitle him to the continuance of compensation. But where, as here, the operation is one not attended with serious risk or pain I am of opinion that if the workman refuses to submit to a remedy which would remove or lessen his incapacity for wage earning he must take the consequences." And in Donnelly v. Baird [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 536, 45 Scott. L. Rep. 394, 1 B. W. C. C. 95, it was said: "In view of the great diversity of cases raising this question, I can see no general principle except this, that if the operation is not attended with danger to life and health, or extraordinary suffering, and if, according to the best medical or surgical opinion, the operation offers a reasonable prospect of restoration or relief from the incapacity from which the workman is suffering, then he must either submit to the operation or release his employers from the obligation to maintain him."

However, where an operation would be attended with risk to life or health, the refusal of a workman to undergo such an operation is not unreasonable, and a suspension of his allowance under such circumstances has been held to have been properly refused. Rothwell v. Davies, 19 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 423, 5 W. C. C. 141. See also Anderson v. Baird, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 373.

Also, where there is a difference of opinion among medical authorities as to the existence or nonexistence of a risk to life or health attendant on a surgical operation, an allowance under a workmen's compensation act may not properly be suspended because of an injured employee's refusal to undergo such an operation. Sweeney v. Pumpherston Oil Co. Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 972, 40 Scott. L. Rep. 721. See also Dowds v. Bennie, Sc. Ct. Sess. 5 F. 268, 40 Scott. L. Rep. 239.

However, where there was admittedly no risk to life or health attendant on the performance of an operation, but an injured workman had been advised by his own physicians that the operation would be useless, and acting on such advice had refused to submit thereto, it has been held that, by such refusal, he was precluded from claiming a continuance of the compensation awarded to him. O'Neill v. Brown [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 653 [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 235, 6 B. W. C. C. 428.

BURDEN OF PROOF.

It appears that the burden of proof, that the liability of a workman to suffer from a recurrence of an affection, common among workers in his occupation, and with which he became afflicted in his employment, is due to the original attack and not to a constitutional predisposition, is on the employee, and unless this burden is discharged he is not entitled to a suspensory award, to keep alive a claim against his employer under a workmen's compensation act. Darroll v. Glasgow Iron, etc. Co. [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 387, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 80, 50 Scott. L. Rep. 226, 6 B. W. C. C. 354. See also M'Ghee v. Summerlee Iron Co. [1911] Sc. Ct. Sess. 870, 48 Scott. L. Rep. 807, 4 B. W. C. C. 424. Compare M'Callum v. Quinn [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 227, 46 Scott. L. Rep. 141, 16 Scott. L. T. 501, 2 B. W. C. C. 339.

Thus in Irons v. Davis [1899] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 330, 333, 1 W. C. C. 26, 68 L. J. Q. B. 673, 80 L. T. N. S. 673, 47 W. R. 616, the court said: "It is therefore understood that if in the future the ability of the respondent to earn wages is affected by this accident, the county court judge will have power, under clause 12, to review the award and to increase the amount of the weekly payment."

And in Safety Insulated Wire, etc. Co. v. Hudson County, 90 N. J. L. 114, 100 Atl. 846, it was said: "By section 21 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1911, p. 143, it is, among other things, provided that an award of compensation may be modified at any time after one year from the time when it became operative, and may be reviewed upon the application of either party on the ground that the incapacity of the injured employee has subsequently increased or diminished. It is to be observed that the term 'incapacity of the injured employee' is used. The legislature has thereby established the test of 'incapacity' as the determining factor whether an award shall be diminished or increased, as the case may be. The incapacity which the legislature had in mind was the incapacity to perform labor."

BLANTON

v.

WHEELER AND HOWES COMPANY
ET AL.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—December 19, 1916.

91 Conn. 226; 99 Atl. 404.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Procedure — Motion to Recommit.

Upon appeal from award of compensation commissioner, a motion that the finding and award be recommitted with direction should be in writing, where it appears that neither side will produce evidence.

Form of Findings.

A finding should contain the facts found, not the evidence from which they are to be found.

Same.

A finding that certain testimony is true is not the same thing as finding that some fact as testified to is true.

Same.

A finding that a claimant for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Acts 1913, c. 138) relied upon sums sent her by a deceased employee "for expenses" is not equivalent to a finding that she relied on them for living expenses necessary and proper for her class and station in life.

Who Is "Dependent."

Dependency is to be determined in accordance with the fact as the fact may be at the time of the injury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A married daughter living with her husband and supporting herself with his aid is not "dependent" upon her father, where she received no contributions from him for six months prior to his death.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under the workmen's compensation act, a dependent cannot be said to be one who has sufficient means at hand for supplying present necessities according to the class and position in life of the alleged dependent.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Mere ability to earn a livelihood will not prevent one from being considered a "dependent" under the workmen's compensation act, even though the person furnishing the support possesses less income than the alleged dependent; the test being whether the alleged dependent relied upon contributions of the employee, wholly or partially, for living expenses necessary and proper to the class and position in life of the claimant.

[See note at end of this case.]

Absence of Dependents — Award to State.

The failure of the court, after finding claimant was not a dependent of a deceased employee, to award the sum of $750 to the state treasurer can be objected to only by the state, and not by the claimant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fairfield county: GAGER, Judge.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Bertha L. Blanton, claimant, and Wheeler and Howes Company, et al., defendants. Claim disallowed by Compensation Commissioner. Decision affirmed by Superior Court. Claimant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

James P. Pigott for appellant.

William Brosmith and Robert C. Dickenson for appellees.

[227] WHEELER, J.—The appeal from the Compensation Commissioner was heard in the Superior Court at short calendar on an oral motion that the finding and award be recommitted with direction either that compensation be awarded to the claimant or to the State Treasurer.

The motion should have been in writing. Upon appeals of this nature it is preferable that reasons of appeal and an answer thereto be filed forthwith, and, if testimony is to be introduced upon the hearing, that the hearing be had speedily; if it appears that neither side [228] will produce evidence, a written motion for judgment for the short calendar should be filed and heard.

The questions upon this appeal are twofold: Did the Superior Court err in dismissing this appeal and in confirming the commissioner in holding that the claimant was not a dependent? Did the Superior Court, having confirmed the commissioner in his holding, err in not awarding $750 to the State Treasurer?

The claimant concedes that the question of dependency under the Compensation Act (Public Acts of 1913, Chap. 138) is one of fact. Her claim is that under the statutory definition of a dependent and the decision in Powers v. Hotel Bond Co. 89 Conn. 143, 93 Atl. 245, the conclusion of the commissioner that the claimant was not a dependent of her father is contrary to the subordinate facts of the finding, and that these facts require the conclusion that she was a partial dependent.

The claimant was the only daughter of a Mr. Garner of New Haven, and his employer was one of the respondents, and both were within the Compensation Act. Mr. Garner suffered an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondent, from which he died on July 7th, 1914. Mr. Garner left a small amount of property. His weekly wage had been $11.88. The claimant had enjoyed good health for a long time preceding her father's decease. She lived with her husband in Scranton, Pennsylvania, and he earned $40 a month. She herself earned about $10 a month, and she and her husband made a small profit from taking lodgers.

Mr. Garner, at the time of his wife's death, thirty-five years before, had promised her that he would look out for their daughter, the claimant. He told the claimant from time to time he would take care of her, and if she needed a home she could come to him. For [229] a number of years he had sent her every month or two sums varying from $2 to $5. In the holiday season of 1913 he sent her $5, but sent her no money thereafter, writing her that of she would come to New Haven in May he would give her money. The claimant and her husband have no property, and no one dependent upon them, and live in a small house, paying $13 a month rent. The claimant used the moneys received by her from her father upon her ordinary living expenses.

The finding quotes part of the testimony of the claimant, in which she says she relied upon the support sent her by her father, and used it to help meet her different expenses, and the court finds this testimony to be true.

Accepting, in this branch of his argument, the test of dependency to be as announced in Powers v. Hotel Bond Co. 89 Conn. 143, 152, 93 Atl. 245—"whether the contributions were relied upon by the dependent for his or her means of living, judging this by the class and position in life of the dependent"—counsel for the claimant insists that the subordinate facts require "a conclusion that claimant was a partial dependent of her father." Whether the claimant relied upon the contributions of her deceased father did not appear in the finding as originally made. All that appeared was that the moneys received were used by the claimant upon her ordinary living expenses.

Upon motion of claimant an amendment of the finding was made that "included in the testimony of the claimant were the following answers to questions as indicated, which testimony is found to be true." Then follows in some detail an excerpt from the testimony, a part of which was: "Q. You were asked if you relied upon the support which your father is supposed to have sent you, and you promptly answered yes? A. [230] Yes. . . . Q. Do you know the meaning of the word 'rely'? Will you please tell us? You have been asked if you relied upon the money which your father sent you, and you answered 'Yes,' now I want to know what the meaning of the word 'rely' is. A. Yes. Depend on. I always looked forward to what I got from him for certain expenses. Q. What expenses? A. I didn't always use it for just the same thing, but of course we had expenses and I always knew when we got that it would help out."

This excerpt has no place in the finding; that should contain the facts found by the court, not the evidence from which the facts are to be found. Finding that certain testimony is true is not the same thing as finding that some fact as testified to is true. Were we to consider these answers as the equivalent of each fact capable of being found from them, we should not inevitably be constrained to hold that the contributions were relied upon for the living expenses of the claimant. They may, so far as appears, have been used for expenses which were not properly in this class. Then, again, it does not appear in this testimony that the contributions were relied upon for living expenses which were necessary and proper for her class and station in life. They may have been neither necessary nor proper. We do not know, because the finding does not tell us. The finding does not disclose that these contributions affected her means of living, judging these by her class and station in life. Some of the facts found are inconsistent with the conclusions which must be found to meet this test. In the memorandum of decision, made a part of the finding, the trial court describes these contributions as mere offerings of affection, not as necessary and proper elements of support.

Dependency is to be determined "in accordance [231] with the fact as the fact may be at the time of the injury." Mahoney v. Gamble-Desmond Co. 90 Conn. 255, 257, 96 Atl. 1025, L.R.A.1916E 110. The claimant had received no contributions from her father for six months prior to his death. During that time she had been supported wholly by the joint efforts of her husband and self. We do not intend to imply that dependency cannot exist unless support is continued to the very time of injury, but a cessation of support for so protracted a period as six months, under the conditions and circumstances of this case, would not justify a finding of dependency to exist; and if the testimony were considered as the equivalent of the facts which might be drawn from it, and these taken in connection with the rest of the finding, they would admit of the conclusion that the trial court might reasonably have found that the claimant was not a dependent.

The claimant treats our test, that the contributions must have been relied upon by the dependent for his or her living expenses, as equivalent to contributions used for the living expenses. Under this interpretation, a condition of dependency might exist although the dependent was possessed of large present means of providing for the living expenses.

The Compensation Act does not contemplate support for any save the dependent, and one cannot be said to be a dependent who has sufficient means at hand for supplying present necessities, judging these according to the class and position in life of the alleged dependent.

The test we have adopted regards the fact that what is a necessity for one may be a luxury for another. What may be ample support for one may be a bare and wretched existence for another. We apply the same principle as would be applied in determining what would, for example, be necessities furnished a [232] minor. Each case is governed by ascertaining what, in the given circumstances, would be necessities, having due regard for the class and position in life of the claimant. As the application of this principle excludes the case where support has been given those who have at hand the present means of supplying their living expenses in their class and station in life, so it excludes the restriction of support to provision for the bare wants of existence.

We agree with the claimant, that mere ability to earn a livelihood will not prevent one from becoming a dependent; even though the person furnishing the support possess less income than the alleged dependent, this will not necessarily prevent the existence of a condition of dependency. An adult daughter, for example, entirely capable of earning her living, may be the dependent of a father in poor health and barely able to earn enough to support himself in reasonable comfort. The test is not what he possessed, not how great a sacrifice he made to aid his daughter, but rather whether she relied upon his contributions for her living expenses, wholly or partially, judging these by those which would be reasonable for one in her class and position in life. The test is not in a comparison between the relative ability of the contributor and the dependent, but in her reliance for her living expenses in whole or part.

The claimant further contends that dependency is not governed by the class and position in life of a claimant, and that so much of the test as makes the means of living dependent upon the class and position in life of the dependent is against authority and contrary to sound principle.

Lord Justice Collins first approved of the test we have adopted in Simmons v. White [1899] 1 Q. B. 1005, 1 W. C. C. 89. It was later repudiated [233] in Main Colliery Co. v. Davies [1900] App. Cas. 358, in an opinion by the Chancellor, Lord Halsbury, which seems to hold that no standard of living can be considered and hence no standard of dependency, but that each case is to be decided as a fact. If this doctrine be sound, it would follow that the mere use of the contributions, as Lord Shand points out, would be conclusive of dependency, irrespective of whether the alleged dependent was possessed of ample present means. We think Master of the Rolls Collins correctly diagnoses the later English decisions as negating the existence of any standard of dependency, and we share his difficulty in applying this rule. Howells v. Vivian, 85 L. T. N. S. 529, 4 W. C. C. 106.

Whether or not one is a dependent depends, as we think, upon first ascertaining what a dependent is and then applying the facts at hand to the standard found. As well might we abolish the standard of contributory negligence as that of dependency. The claimant will not be benefited by the change in our test which counsel urges, unless it be held that the mere use of the contributions for living expenses by the claimant makes the claimant a dependent; and this doctrine we consider unfair to the employer.

We have before indicated our reasons for making the means of living dependent upon the class and position in life of a claimant. Our view finds support in Dazy v. Apponaug Co. 36 R. I. 81, 85, 89 Atl. 180.

The trial court did not err, after finding claimant was not a dependent of her father, in failing to award the sum of $750 to the State Treasurer (Public Acts of 1913, Chap. 138, Part B, § 9). No such claim was made by any one in behalf of the State; indeed, at no stage of the case has the State been represented. And no appeal from the decision of the Compensation Commissioner, or that of the trial court, was taken by the [234] State. The State, and not the claimant, is the only party which could have made this claim, and, upon its overruling, which could have appealed to this court.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

Introductory.

It is intended in this note to review the recent cases involving the question who is a "dependent" within a workmen's compensation act. The earlier decisions are collected in the note to Lee v. Ship Bessie, Ann. Cas. 1913E 477.

With respect to nonresidence as affecting the rights of a beneficiary see the notes to Krutz v. Crow's Nest Pass Coal Co. Ann. Cas. 1912D 862, and Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, reported ante, this volume, at page 627.

In General.

It is generally held that unless a workmen's compensation act specifically sets forth who shall be considered wholly or partially dependent on the earnings of an employee, dependency and the extent thereof are to be determined as questions of fact in accordance with the facts as they exist at the time of the injury to the employee.

Rhode Island.—Sweet v. Sherwood Ice Co. 100 Atl. 316.

Wisconsin.—Jackson v. Industrial Commission, 164 Wis. 94, 159 N. W. 561.

In the case of In re Carroll (Ind.) 116 N. E. 844, the court said: "Our act does not define dependency, and does not specifically indicate who are dependents, except as to persons included within the conclusive presumption of total dependency features of the act. Courts as a rule, in determining questions of dependency and who are dependents, resort to description, to an outlining of the elements, rather than to definition. Stated generally, a dependent is one who looks to another for support and maintenance; one who is in fact dependent—one who relies on another for the reasonable necessities of life. Jackson v. Erie R. Co. 86 N. J. L. 550, 91 Atl. 1035; Tirre v. Bush Terminal Co. 172 App. Div. 386, 158 N. Y. S. 883. To confine the inquiry to the question whether the family of the deceased workman could have supported life without any contribution from him, or whether such contributions were absolutely necessary in order that the family might be reasonably maintained, is not a fair test of dependency, but rather the inquiry should include the question whether contributions from the workman were looked to, or depended and relied on, in whole or in part, by the family for means of reasonable support. Howells v. Vivian, 85 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 529; Hotel Bond Co.'s Appeal, 89 Conn. 143, 93 Atl. 245. Among the elements that are indicia of a state of dependency are an obligation to support, the fact that contributions have been made to that end, that the claimant in any case is shown to have relied on such contributions and their continuing, and the existence of some reasonable grounds as a basis for a probability of their continuance, or of a renewal thereof, if interrupted. We would not be understood as indicating that all these elements must exist in each case, in order that there may be a state of dependency. As a rule, to which there are exceptions, however, the fact that contributions have been made is an essential element of a state of dependency within the meaning of the act."

Where the statute provides that all questions of dependency shall be determined as of the time of the accident the question of the dependency of a mother on her married son is to be determined as of the time of his death without regard to the subsequent condition of the family or the contributions of the son before his marriage. Birmingham v. Westinghouse Electric, etc. Co. 167 N. Y. S. 520.

But it has been held that dependency is not based solely on a present legal obligation to support. The fact that the mother of a deceased workman has sufficient to live on for a few weeks or months does not take her out of the dependent class notwithstanding the statutory provision that the dependency is to be determined as of the date of the accident, since the legislature could not have contemplated a construction so literal and unreasonable. Parson v. Murphy (Neb.) 163 N. W. 847.

The word "dependent" has been held to mean dependent for the ordinary necessities of life for one of the claimant's class and social station in life, considering his financial and social position. The extent of the dependency is not important and if dependency exists at all the right to participate in the fund is established. Poccardi v. State Compensation Com'r (W. Va.) 91 S. E. 663, wherein the court said: "The question in these cases is not whether by skimming the claimant could have maintained himself or his family with the bare necessities of life, or have maintained himself without the assistance of the earnings of the injured or deceased employee, but whether he was actually dependent on such earnings at the time of the injuries for his reasonable support and maintenance."

It has been held that the test of dependency was not whether the petitioner by reducing his expenses below a standard suitable to his condition in life could secure a subsistence for his family without the contribution of the workman, but whether such contributions were needed to provide the family with the ordinary necessities of life suitable for persons in their class and position. Dazy v. Apponaug Co. 36 R. I. 81, 89 Atl. 160. So it has been said that a dependent is not necessarily one to whose active livelihood the contributions made on the employee are necessary; the test being whether the contributions are relied on by the dependent for his or her means of living, judging this by the class and position in life of the dependent. Hotel Bond Co.'s Appeal, 89 Conn. 143, 93 Atl. 245.

The reported case decides that one who has sufficient means at hand for supplying present necessities, judging those according to the class and position in life of the alleged dependent, is not within the act, but that the mere ability to earn a livelihood will not prevent one from being considered a dependent though the person furnishing the support possesses less income than the alleged dependent.

Members of Family Generally.

A provision in a workmen's compensation act that the compensation shall be distributed among the "actual dependents" of a deceased workman has been interpreted to mean dependents in fact and the fact that the provision is followed by the enumeration of certain relatives was held not to make them presumptively dependent. Miller v. Public Service R. Co. 84 N. J. L. 174, 85 Atl. 1030.

It has been held that testimony tending to establish that an employee gave his wages to his father and that such wages were devoted to the support of the family was sufficient to afford a legal basis for a finding that the family were actually dependent. Harvey v. Erie R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 444, 95 Atl. 124.

Under a provision that "dependents" should mean members of the employee's family or next of kin who were wholly or partially dependent on his earnings for support at the time of the injury, it has been held that a half brother in whose family the employee lived and who was partially dependent on him for support was not entitled to an award where he was not the next of kin. In re Kelley's Case, 222 Mass. 538, 111 N. E. 395.

It was held in Murphy's Case, 224 Mass. 592, 113 N. E. 283, that where a workman had no family of his own his mother was the next of kin who was entitled to compensation under the act, if she was dependent on him at the time of his death. The fact that the mother died subsequently was held not to warrant sending the case back for an award to members of the family of the mother. The court said: "The act provides that in case the employee dies of his injury, compensation shall be awarded to those persons who were in fact his next of kin or members of his family at the time of the injury and who in fact were dependent upon him for support at that time. It does not authorize an award of compensation to be made, for example, to persons who would have been his next of kin if his sole next of kin had been dead, and who were not in fact dependent upon him but might have been dependent upon him had it been that the next of kin who was dependent upon him had died. It follows that in the case at bar no order in favor of any one else could be made now."

Where a workmen's compensation act provides compensation if a workman leaves any widow, child, parent, grandparent, or other lineal heir, to whose support he contributed within four years previous to the time of his injury, it is not necessary that the surviving parent or heir shall have been dependent on the deceased, nor is it necessary to show that there was any regularity in the support furnished. Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 74, 115 N. E. 158.

In Walz v. Holbrook, etc. Corp. 170 App. Div. 6, 155 N. Y. S. 703, it appeared that a workman lived with his family, the members of which were his father, mother, sister, and a younger brother. The father was old and earned very little; the sister was a delicate school girl; the brother was nineteen years old earning about nine dollars a week, out of which he paid five dollars to his mother for his board. The weekly wage received by the workman in question was about thirteen dollars, out of which he paid into the hands of his mother about ten dollars each week to assist in maintaining the family. Under the circumstances it was held that his contributions were in excess of the cost of his maintenance and that the family were to a considerable extent dependent on such contributions for their maintenance and support.

It has been held that where the father's earnings were sufficient to cover the family expenses when the amount necessary to support a son was deducted, no compensation would be allowed for the death of the son although he contributed to the family fund, the fundamental principle underlying the law being compensation. Moll v. City Bakery (Mich.) 165 N. W. 649.

Where it appeared that a workman's father and sister worked and contributed their earnings to the general family support and his earnings were also used for that purpose, the amount contributed by him exceeding the cost of his board, lodging, and other expenses, it was held that there was a legitimate inference that the family received such substantial support as to justify an award of compensation. Conners v. Public Service Electric Co. 89 N. J. L. 99, 97 Atl. 792.

In Huard v. Clarke, 45 Quebec Super. Ct. 397, it was held that the widow of a deceased workman could claim the entire indemnity only by showing that there were no other persons who had a right to benefit under the law. Compare Croteau v. Victoriaville Furn. Co. 40 Quebec Super. Ct. 44; Roberge v. Jacobs Asbestos Min. Co. 45 Quebec Super. Ct. 304.

Parent.

Where a workman and his wife lived with his parents, giving his mother each week no more than the fair equivalent of what he and his wife received, and the mother's husband was earning sufficient to support her, it was held that the mother was not dependent on her son for any part of her support within the workmen's compensation law. Birmingham v. Westinghouse Electric, etc. Co. 167 N. Y. S. 520.

Under a provision in a workman's compensation act that in case of death compensation to the amount of fifty per centum of the wages of the deceased shall be paid to the widow and the father or mother, a mother who is an actual dependent is entitled to the award although the son leaves no widow. Blanz v. Erie R. Co. 84 N. J. L. 35, 85 Atl. 1030, affirmed 85 N. J. L. 367, 91 Atl. 1070. See to the same effect Quinlan v. Barber Paving Co. 84 N. J. L. 510, 87 Atl. 127; McFarland v. Central R. Co. 84 N. J. L. 435, 87 Atl. 144; Tischman v. Central R. Co. 84 N. J. L. 527, 87 Atl. 144. Under the same provision a father who had no other income or means of support has been held to be an actual dependent of the son and entitled to twenty-five per centum of his wages, although the son left no widow. Reardon v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 85 N. J. L. 90, 88 Atl. 970.

Where it appeared that a minor eighteen years old lived with his mother, who had seven small children and whose husband earned only eleven dollars a week, the son contributing five dollars each week to the family fund, the mother was held to be an actual dependent of the son. Krauss v. Fritz, 87 N. J. L. 321, 93 Atl. 578.

By the Minnesota act it is provided as follows: "Any . . . husband, mother, father, grandmother, grandfather, sisters and brothers who were wholly supported by the deceased workman at the time of his death and for a reasonable period of time immediately prior thereto shall be considered his actual dependents." In State v. District Ct. 131 Minn. 27, 154 N. W. 509, it was held that a widowed mother, without means, who was supported by her son, partly by his wages and partly by the yield of his land, was wholly dependent on him for support, and that it was not necessary that she should be supported wholly out of his wages to be totally dependent within the meaning of the act.

Under a statute providing that parents who were wholly supported by the workman at the time of his death should be considered "actual dependents" and that if they derived part of their support from the wages of the workman they should be considered partial dependents, it has been held that parents who were helpless invalids and derived their support principally from a son who contributed about fifty dollars a month to their support and an unmarried daughter who paid four dollars per week for her board were wholly dependent on the support of the son within the meaning of the act. State v. District Ct. of Hennepin Co. 128 Minn. 338, 151 N. W. 123.

In Smith v. National Sash, etc. Co. 96 Kan. 816, 153 Pac. 533, it appeared that a boy eighteen years old turned over all his wages to his mother and received from her money for his expenditures. The mother was supported by her husband but was an invalid and required medical and surgical attention, the expense of which was paid in part out of the wages of the son. It was held that the mother was partly dependent on her son's earnings.

A mother seventy-seven years old unable to work on account of illness and extreme old age has been held to be a dependent of her unmarried son although he had not actually contributed to her support before the date of the accident. Parson v. Murphy (Neb.) 163 N. W. 847.
